WM. H. BEERS, Actuary.

 Persons desirous of acting as Agents will please apply personally or by letter.

COOKING AND HEATING BY GAS.

EAGLE GAS COOKING STOVES AND RANGES,

GUARANTEED TO BAKE PERFECTLY.

HEATING STOVES, GUARANTEED TO HEAT ROOMS PERFECTLY.

Also,

KEROSENE OIL COOKING STOVES,

The best in market, have regular SIDE OVENS, and guaranteed to BAKE PERFECTLY, and not to Smoke or Smell.

EAGLE GAS STOVE MFG. CO.,
474 Broadway, N. Y.

☞ Illustrated Catalogues sent free.

DECKER & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS OF PIANO-FORTES,

419 BROOME STREET,

One Block East of Broadway, N. Y.

These Pianos stand unrivalled in regard to their singing quality; volume and purity of tone; sympathetic, elastic, and even touch; and durability of construction, which enables them to remain in tune much longer than ordinary Pianos.

JESSUP & MOORE,

27 NORTH SIXTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
128 WILLIAM STREET, NEW YORK,

PAPER MANUFACTURERS,

Have on hand, or make to order at short notice, all qualities of Book and News Printing Papers at current market prices.

UNITED STATES STEEL PEN WORKS,

FACTORY, CAMDEN, N. J.

R. ESTERBROOK & CO.,

STEEL PEN MANUFACTURERS,

WAREHOUSES, { 403 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia. / 42 JOHN STREET, New York.

Samples and prices on application. Lots made to order of any pattern or stamp required.

CAUTION.

These Pens are of genuine American manufacture, and equal in finish, elasticity, and fineness of point to the best imported. They are, therefore, sure to gain the confidence of the American public. The fac-simile of our signature is sufficient security against foreign imitation.

R. ESTERBROOK & CO.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

OF THE OLD STANDARD QUALITY.

TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Warranted.

or Descriptive Name, and Designating Number.
New Series, Good and Cheap, from No. 700 to No. 761.

TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Birmingham. With Designating Numbers.

For sale by JOSEPH GILLOTT & SONS,
91 John Street, New York.
HENRY OWEN, Sole Agent.

THE BEST PIANO-FORTE.

ONE THAT WILL LAST A LIFETIME.

Seven First Premiums in four weeks; two Gold and one Silver Medals; six State Fairs and the American Institute have decided that WM. B. BRADBURY'S New Scale Piano-Fortes are "THE BEST." They "Excel all others in the Essentials of a Perfect Piano-Forte," viz., in Touch, Tone, Power, and thorough Workmanship.

"They are the best square piano-fortes I have ever played upon."—HARRY SANDERSON.

"They are very superior instruments."—GOTTSCHALK.

"Their superior excellence fully proven."—W. BERGE.

"I admire them in the highest degree."—G. W. MORGAN.

Call or send for a Circular, with Illustrations and Testimonials of the most eminent artists and amateurs.

WM. B. BRADBURY,
425 AND 427 BROOME STREET, NEW YORK.

The Nation.

VOL. I.—NO. 21. THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1865. { SIX DOLLARS PER ANNUM / SINGLE COPIES, 15 CENTS

CONTENTS.

THE WEEK..... 641

Southern Indiscretion..... 646
French Morals and French Politics.... 647
Gleanings from the Foreign Press 648

CORRESPONDENCE:
The Sovereignty of the States..... 648

The South as It Is..... 650
England.—The New Ministry..... 653
A Fragment of Irish Military History 654

LITERATURE:
Literary Notes..... 655
Saadi's Gulistan..... 658
Concerning Timothy Titcomb..... 659
The Irish Prison System 659
History by the Yard..... 661

FINE ARTS:
The Sixth Annual Exhibition of the Artists' Fund Society of New York..... 663

Six Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Four Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, PUBLISHER, 130 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

The Week.

GENERAL GRANT made the longest of his speeches at the Union League Club on Wednesday of last week. It contained three sentences and one "point," which looked very like a warning to Maximilian. He was followed by the Rev. Dr. Osgood, who gravely announced that "the Christian Church had stood by" Grant and was, like Grant, a friend of law and order and a "peacemaker."

THE cholera has made no progress on this side of the water, and the doctors are using the respite to good purpose in telling people how to avoid it. If the Legislature will do its duty this winter, by turning a deaf ear to Inspector Boole, we shall be thrice armed in the spring.

THE Fenians are said to have taken the house on Union Square in this city, formerly the "residence" (nobody lives in a house now-a-days) of Mr. Moffatt, the noted pill-vender, and propose to play at republic in it. They are to have or have now a "Bureau of War," a "Bureau of Finance," and a "Bureau of the Navy," and so on, and will continue this pleasing little game as long as the funds last. There is, however, a serious side to this wretched farce. The money which the lecturers, "head centres," and ministers of state, spend on their amusements comes out of the hard earnings of the poor all over the United States, and we dare say the "Bonds of the Irish Republic" will find a sale amongst the same class. This fact converts what might otherwise be considered simple folly into something worse, and as there is no sensible or intelligent man who supposes that Colonel O'Mahony is likely to overthrow the British Empire, any encouragement given to his antics is neither more nor less than connivance at a very heartless kind of fraud.

AT the meeting held at the Cooper Union, last week, to provide for the relief of Southern destitution, Henry Ward Beecher reiterated his demand for more "faith in Southern" men, while declaring that the freedmen, as "the wards of the nation," must be protected by guarantees. Now, it is mainly with regard to the negroes that the good faith of the Southern men is doubted, and as long as guarantees of any kind are necessary, if these are exacted, professions of confidence in Southern honesty are mere forms. You either trust a man or you do not, and when you ask him to give security for his good behavior you say in a very emphatic way that you do not.

THERE has been a very amusing correspondence between the editor of the New York Times and a Mr. Killian of the "Fenian Brotherhood," in reference to a very proper denunciation of the organization which appeared in that journal, for extracting money from the pockets of the poor for objects which, the leaders know well, can never be attained. Mr. Doran Killian asks for a "retraction;" Mr. Raymond refuses it; Mr. Doran Killian replies, beginning in the third person, and breaking out, half way down, into the first, as the manner of half-educated people is, reads Mr. Raymond a bombastic lecture, and asks for the name of a "gentleman," with whom arrangements may be made for something nameless. At this stage of the performance, the police court loomed up on Mr. Killian's horizon, who thereupon retreated incontinently from the scene, leaving President John O'Mahony to hand Mr. Raymond down to the execration of posterity in a characteristically ridiculous card.

THERE has been a tremendous smash on the New Jersey Railroad in the streets of Newark; two persons were killed outright, and several others injured. This time, luckily, the blame can be fastened on a switch-tender, who, as his name is O'Brien, and he has no friends, will doubtless be made an example of. He is committed for manslaughter. It appears that the city had actually permitted the company to run its trains through the streets at the rate of twenty miles an hour.

THE latest device for encouraging emigration to the South we find in a recent number of the Richmond Republic. According to this respectable authority, "it is an authentic historical fact that no case of Asiatic cholera ever occurred in the basin of country embracing the mineral springs of Virginia." All, therefore, who dread the contagion of the approaching pestilence, may be cheered by the thought that there is "a safe and certain refuge" in the mountains of Virginia. Anticipating an unprecedented rush to this region, the Republic warns the proprietors of the great watering-places to put their premises in order, and urges the completion of the Central Railroad from Jackson River westward to the White Sulphur and Sweet Springs. In a parallel column is inserted a prominent advertisement of the mineral wealth of Virginia, addressed to capitalists. Who shall say that the South is not a part of "the universal Yankee nation?"

HOWEVER unpleasant the fact, it is just as well to know that investigations pursued at Marseilles, by an eminent French physician, have shown, that while the first cases of cholera officially declared in that city in the present year occurred on the 23d of July, numerous deaths from that disease had previously occurred, and can now be traced as far back as June 9, or fifty-four days in advance of the official declaration. It is now about three weeks since the Atalanta arrived at this port; but we cannot assert that before this there were not instances of passengers landing without detection who had come from some one of the infected countries of Europe, just as at Marseilles, one at least and probably several of the passengers of the ship which brought the first tidings of cholera from Alexandria, died without the physician's suspecting the true cause.

THE Mississippi Legislature has revised its refusal to allow negro testimony to be received against whites. It now proposes to admit it in all civil cases in which negroes are parties, and in criminal cases only the testimony of the persons against whose persons or property the offences have been committed; but no negro, it is provided, shall be examined in any case except upon the stand and in open court. These saving clauses may prove very useful, as it would exclude the ante mortem deposition of a murdered man, and would, in fact, prevent prosecution for the murder of a negro if not committed in the presence of whites.

THE notorious Dick McCann, who is now in custody in Tennessee under an indictment for murder, for having sat on a rebel court-martial on the trial of Haun, one of the Union bridge-burners who were captured in 1861, has applied for a habeas corpus. Judge Trigg, the U. S. District Judge at Nashville, refuses it on the ground that, although the war was a civil war, and the court-martial a regular court-martial according to the law of nations, the federal courts have no authority in the premises.

THE Evangelist offers us some advice, in a friendly spirit, as to the "heaviness" of our articles. Literary weight, we beg to remind it, is a relative term. There is a large public to whom the "Waverley Novels" are laborious reading. We know a gentleman whose head aches over the "Pickwick Papers." Anybody who seeks literary matter which everybody will pronounce "light," can hardly stop short of "Mother Goose" or "Jack the Giant Killer." The real trouble with the Evangelist, as with a great many other good people, is that everything seems "heavy" that is not broken up into short paragraphs—a trick introduced by the daily papers for the better display of their wares.

WHAT we remarked last week about the appointment of Gen. Kilpatrick as Minister to Chili applies substantially to the appointment of Gen. John A. Logan as Minister to the Republic of Mexico. The meritorious services of the appointee as soldier and politician cannot be questioned, nor is it any drawback that he "is known," as the telegraph informed the Associated Press, "as a strong and earnest friend of the Liberal cause" in the country to which he is sent. But something more is needed than a successful military or political campaign to fit a man for the delicate post assigned to Gen. Logan. He may not be wanting in this essential; but the presumption is strong almost to certainty that the possession of it was not his original or chief recommendation, while his army title will alone be regarded abroad, and regarded as an additional proof of the Administration's intention to pick a bone with Maximilian, and, if need be, with Napoleon himself.

CONNECTICUT has company in Wisconsin and Minnesota in regard to admitting negroes to the suffrage. In the former State there was a majority of ten thousand against it, while the general republican ticket was carried by upwards of seven thousand majority. It is reported that the friends of the measure intend to fall back on a similar amendment submitted to the people in 1849, when by law it must have been "approved by a majority of all the votes cast." So it was, on its own merits, but the law was construed to mean that the number of affirmative votes must equal a majority of the highest number cast on any subject; and the amendment was accordingly pronounced rejected. In order to test the validity of this ruling, two colored votes were offered at the late election, and the cases thus made up will be carried through the courts. We do not hold it likely that anything will come of this well-meant and possibly well-founded effort. It is too much to expect that a judicial decision can oppose, not only the popular acquiescence for sixteen years, but the latest and most positive expression in the same sense.

THE first report of Lieutenant-General Grant is in a completed state, and is said to cover no less than eighty foolscap pages. Of course it can only treat in outline of the military operations from the spring of 1864 to the close of the war, nor will the military events which it records be in any way new to the public. Its most interesting revelations will be the part which the general sustained in initiating operations in Virginia and elsewhere, and especially General Sherman's march to the coast.

THERE was a story afloat in the earlier part of the week of the violation of the Maine frontier by a company of English marines in pursuit of deserters, followed by the desertion of the marines themselves. As nothing more has been heard of it, we presume that either they did not cross the line at all, or they deserted before they crossed, and that, instead of a company, there was only a corporal's guard. The kernel of a "special despatch" is often found to be very small after one has worked his way through the pulp.

THE case of Daniel Miller (with two aliases), the noted "confidence man," is a curious illustration of the facility with which men can get married in this country. This person figured in various boarding-houses here and at the West as a Southern refugee of large property, and sustained his pretensions by that elaborate "deportment" which passes in the South-west for "gentlemanly manners," and was able to marry two respectable women in rapid succession, neither of whom, it now appears, had the least knowledge of any of his antecedents. There can be little doubt that this sort of confidence is fostered, if not bred, by boarding-house life, in which presentation at the common table and a punctual settlement of the weekly bills gives men and women a sort of ex-officio respectability, which some of the most dexterous swindlers often use to procure what reporters call the "entrée into the best society."

THE point has been raised that the ratification of the anti-slavery amendment by South Carolina is of no value, she not being a State in the Union at the moment of ratification, and that, therefore, she would be entitled hereafter to repudiate the pledge. The discovery is, however, of no practical utility, except as a warning. If her ratification can do no good, it can do no harm. If Congress admitted her representatives without exacting it, we should all cry shame; and after they had been admitted nobody would have any power to exact it. If she be not now a State, and therefore incapable of ratifying, the moment we make her a State we lose the power of exacting anything from her whatever. If, on the other hand, she is a State, she can ratify or not as she pleases. The doubt, however, ought to make Congress doubly cautious as to the conditions of restoration which it imposes.

IT is now ascertained that the number of colored soldiers enlisted into the United States service, from the summer of 1862 to the suspension of hostilities, did not exceed one hundred and twenty-three thousand. The casualties, including also the losses by desertion for this period, amounted to sixty-six thousand, leaving but fifty-seven thousand upon the muster-rolls at the close of the war. The decision of the Attorney-General, by which these men were entitled to the very same bounties as white volunteers and conscripts, was overruled by the President, on the ground that it was in conflict with plain provisions of the acts of Congress. The difference to the Treasury was about fifteen millions.

THE plausible attempt of the Southern people to make a virtue of their necessity, and palm off their unavoidable submission to accomplished facts as a complete surrender of their late disloyalty, is well enough exposed by the Raleigh Daily Progress when it asks, How stands North Carolina? and answers:

"If our Northern brethern, and those who administer the Government at Washington, want to know how things stand in North Carolina, according to our impressions, we have no objections to speak out. We give it as our honest conviction, based upon the information at hand, that were either Jefferson Davis or Zebulon B. Vance, the one about to be tried for treason and the other a paroled prisoner under the same charge, to oppose Andrew Johnson for the Presidency, and the election to be held to-morrow, they would beat him twenty thousand votes in the State. All the Vance and Davis leaders will be against Johnson when his name is brought before them."

THE Georgia Convention had a sorrowful time over its work. It declared slavery abolished because it was abolished, but reserved all claims that slave-owners might have for compensation on "the justice and magnanimity of the Government." It "repealed" the ordinance of secession, but did not declare it null and void, thus leaving the right of secession untouched. It repudiated the war debt of the State, but with many wry faces and after much tribulation. The president's closing address was as an oratorical performance of considerable pretensions. At the end he produced "sensation and applause" by a metaphor in which "our old mother" (the State) is "reduced to extremity," and the convention is "gathered round her bedside to nurse her, to reinvigorate her wasted body, and now almost paralyzed limbs." But he proposed to accomplish this by "driving back into her heart the vital blood." We must warn him plainly, however, that, as any book on physiology will tell him, if he attempts treatment of this kind he will certainly kill his "old mother," as the trouble with her, as with most aged persons, to judge from what he says of her symptoms, is not that the blood does not reach her heart, but that it does not reach her extremities.

One of the most singular incidents of the reconstruction process is the difficulty which President Johnson, as well as most other people, seems to have in deciding whether the rebellious States are in or out of the Union. He holds firmly to the theory that they are in, but he as firmly acts as if they were out. He probably makes the schoolmen's distinction between their "essence" and their "accidents," and believes that the accidents seceded, but the essence remained behind. The point is one over which Thomas Aquinas and Duns Scotus would have gloated, and on which, were they now living, they would probably write a large quarto each.

The population of Massachusetts, which in 1850 was 994,499, and in 1860 1,231,066, appears from the census just completed to be 1,267,329, or an increase of 36,263 in the past five turbulent years. The number of legal voters is at present 246,037, nearly 20 per cent. The same ratio would produce for 1860 246,213; and that it has not increased, but rather the contrary, is probable from the well-known growing preponderance of the female portion of the population.

It appears, according to the New York correspondent of the London Times, that the list of Confederate bondholders in England came from Mr. Bigelow. It was announced at one time with that mysterious semi-official air which "Our Washington Correspondent" knows so well how to assume, that it was Mr. Adams who sent it; but we happen to know that Mr. Adams first saw it in the New York papers.

Professor G. W. Greene sends us, apropos of a paragraph in our last number touching the Papal troops, the following verse, well known in Rome, of which we subjoin a translation:

Soldati del Papa!
Ce ne vonno sei per cavar una rapa.
E se non viene il Tenente,
Non se ne fa niente.

Soldiers of the Pope!
Six of you it takes to pull a turnip up.
If the Lieutenant stays away,
'T will not budge an inch all day.

The Archbishop of Rhodes, in a pastoral lately issued, speaks of modern philosophy as "guano used by the press for the cultivation of the empty and barren minds of literary and scientific Bœotia." It is not often that a pastoral gets hold of as savory illustration as this.

Mr. D'Arcy McGee thinks the Fenians have nearer work to engage them than the liberation of Ireland:

"Why do n't they," he asks, with some propriety, "liberate the Ireland at their own doors from the poisonous and murderous surroundings of the tenement houses of New York and Boston? Why do n't they liberate their own young Ireland from sanitary destruction—that Ireland in America which, according to the New York Times, contributes 88 per cent. of the deaths of children on the whole number of deaths in that great city? Why do n't they," he continues, by a powerful effort of the imagination, "try to liberate the Irish laborers in New England, where they rank in the social scale below the negro, and hardly above the beasts they drive for their Yankee bosses?"

The orator divined that this sort of work would encounter an insuperable objection in the Fenian mind: "It is practicable, it is possible; therefore it is avoided and despised." May these agitators not have taken a cue from their religion—"credo quia impossibile?"

The insurrection in Jamaica is reported suppressed, but it is at present impossible to ascertain exactly its causes. Besides the considerable slaughter effected by the military, several of the colored leaders were hung, among whom the brothers Paul and Moses Bogle were most conspicuous. A white man also met the same fate. Indeed, he is charged with being responsible for the whole unhappy business, and his name, George Gordon, is suggestive of riot. He was, it is said, not only a respected citizen, but a prominent member of the Assembly, and was led to incite this outbreak by his desire to revenge a private wrong. We can scarcely believe that the support he received was independent of a popular discontent, whose origin, perhaps, it would not be difficult to trace. Meanwhile, we wait for further information.

The following characteristic anecdotes of the late Lord Palmerston have never, we believe, appeared in print before: On one occasion, when a vote of censure was proposed in Parliament upon his ministry, a friend asked him what the Government intended to do. "Well," he said, "there are three distinct propositions before the House. We shall take a few words from the first, add a few from the second, and transpose a few from the third, and then we shall have a resolution of our own which will be as clear—as mud." Again, at the time that the Schleswig-Holstein embroglio was just beginning to bore the world, in the autumn of 1863, an eminent English diplomatist went to call upon the Premier to ask for information on the subject. After hearing his request, Lord Palmerston thought a while, and then answered in his short, jerky manner, "Yes, quite right to come to me. Very difficult question that of Schleswig-Holstein, and there never were but two people who really understood it—myself and ——. But then you see the misfortune is, that —— is dead, and that I have forgotten it."

The alarm created throughout Germany by the menacing attitude of Austria and Prussia toward the Senate of Frankfort is moving the minor states to the adoption of various measures of precaution and defence. The Senate of Hamburg is considering, and will probably approve, a proposition forbidding any citizen to accept a decoration, diploma, or honorary title from a foreign prince or government, under pain of losing his citizenship.

In the electorate of Hesse they have a constitution, and a legislature which amuses itself greatly by meeting in accordance with its provisions. Recently the members exhausted at one sitting the order of the day for the whole session, and laughed over the drolly insignificant propositions submitted to their consideration. Hessian patriots fear that this merry body will bring the country to grief by aggravating popular discontent, and provoking a crisis that will probably result in the annexation of Hesse to some larger power.

The Duke of Augustenburg recently passed through the territory of Schleswig, and the silly people of that country, who seem to believe that Prussia will permit them independence and a sovereign prince, gave him an escort, and illuminated their houses in honor of him. Consequently, the Prussian Commissioner has received instructions to repress such demonstrations in future, and it is officially announced from Berlin that the Duke of Augustenburg will be placed under arrest if he dares to "violate" the frontier of his duchy again.

Jules Janin breaks into rapturous applause of Victor Hugo's new book of poems, "The Songs of the Streets and Woods." Of the poet he says: "He sings; he talks; he intoxicates himself with the limpid wave; he kneels at the feet of oaks strengthened by storms; he knows what the willows ponder, and what the ripe wheat-fields say. It is truly song, but also plaint and prayer, and the accent of the street where everything passes, and the murmur of the forest speaking without mystery to the clouds."

A terrific tempest lately swept over the town of Annonay in France, almost with the suddenness and violence of a bursting waterspout. The rains began about two o'clock in the afternoon, and by five the streets were the beds of furious and impassable torrents. Annonay is built in a sort of amphitheatre, and the peculiarity of the site afforded greater scope to the rage of the elements. Houses were submerged to their second stories, and in some cases they yielded to the force of the waters, and fell. The flood broke the gas conduits, and a total darkness brooded over the devoted town during the whole night that the tempest lasted. Five lives were lost, and damage was done to the value of several million francs.

A SINGULAR case of poisoning, in Paris, will furnish the enemies of tobacco a new argument against its use. An old man, living on the road to St. Cloud, received from his nephew a bag of snuff, which he placed in the cupboard where his wife kept ground coffee. In his absence, his wife, wishing to make coffee, took the snuff by mistake and used it for the infusion. In spite of the disagreeable and singular taste of the drink, she and her husband both partook of it, and were shortly seized with agonizing pains. Physicians were able to save the life of the woman, but the man succumbed to the effects of the nicotine.

A CURIOUS and terrible accident has happened in the tunnel of Mt. Cenis. The workmen are now cutting through a mass of flinty rock, which they are obliged to blast with great frequency, and which emits sparks of fire at the slightest stroke. A man was filling a hole preparatory to blasting, when an unlucky attrition ignited the powder, and a premature explosion ensued, communicating itself to other mines, and inflicting severe wounds upon the laborers and killing one of them. Naturally, there is great reluctance among them to continue their perilous work.

THE Director of the Archives at Naples is about to publish a complete edition of the Greek manuscripts existing there, as well as those found in the archives of Monte Cassino and Cava, and the archiepiscopate of Nardo. They are chiefly chronicles of the ninth and tenth centuries, when the Neapolitan provinces were occupied by the Greeks, and their publication will offer to historical research rich and valuable material.

THE Italian elections have resulted, so far as their result is known, in the triumph of the liberal party, and the defeat alike of the clerical faction, which dreams of the restoration of the old order of things, and the partito d'azione, which looks to the immediate and violent acquisition of Rome and Venice. The Journal des Débats justly attaches the greatest importance to this result, which it regards as a part and sequence of the liberal and prudent policy which has continued to preside over the destinies of the new kingdom. Ricasoli, the old minister of the interior (one of the best and ablest men in Italy), is returned by the moderate party from Florence. Garibaldi is elected by the radicals in Naples, of course; in Naples they will continue to vote for Garibaldi when he is dead; and the enthusiastic love of the people finds like expression everywhere. Garibaldi refused to take any part in the election at Milan, where, next after Naples, Garibaldini most abound, but his name was used in spite of him at Turin, where he received the homage of eighty-five useless votes. At Genoa, Mazzini (although an exile from the kingdom) was a candidate, and had a very respectable minority. Correspondence of the Débats sums up the result as one which will give the liberals a majority, show a slight gain for the radicals, and leave the clericals in such small number as scarcely to afford material for organization.

THERE is a rumor and its contradiction that the ex-King of Naples, in the expectation of unpleasant changes at Rome, had accepted, as his residence, the island of Locnoma, near Ragusa, on the eastern shore of the Adriatic, which is said to have been offered by our neighbor Maximilian.

THE Italian war frigate Magenta is about to sail on a voyage round the world. She will leave Montevideo, where she is now stationed, double the Cape of Good Hope, visit China, Japan, and Australia, cross the Pacific to California, touch at Peru, and, passing through the Straits of Magellan, return to Italy.

SOME of the Italian journals are disposed to regard the retirement of the Pope's Secretary of War, Mgr. de Merode, as an event favorable to the adjustment of the existing difficulties between Italy and St. Peter. It is thought that Antonelli, whose opinions will probably be the inspiration of the new secretary, General Kantzler, is more inclined to accept the situation resulting from the convention of the 15th of September than Mgr. de Merode, not because he is friendlier to Italy than Monsignor but because he is a wiser man, and can see no good for the Holy See in the prolonged quarrel with Victor Emmanuel. General Kantzler commanded a brigade under Lamoricière, and has held, since 1848, the post of inspector of infantry in the Papal army. His administrative abilities are said to have recommended him to St. Peter.

A RUSSIAN paper describes a recent Mohammedan execution at Batum, in Asia, which the French journals characterize as "truly patriarchal" in its simplicity. The murderer was brought into the market-place, and made to kneel with his head on the block, while his kinsmen appealed to the relatives of his victim for the mercy which, according to the Turkish law, they have the power to extend at the last moment. All consented to the pardon but the grandmother of the murdered man, and she failed to find among her kindred any who would be the criminal's executioner. At last, a stranger in the crowd consented to assume the office for twenty piastres. Advancing to the condemned, he encouraged him with the hope that when the grandmother saw the naked knife displayed she would relent, and then, seizing him by the hair, and crying, "Look, old woman!" struck off his head at a blow.

IT is hard to read the diary of Captain Wirtz, late of the Confederate service, and more recently hanged at Washington, without being reminded of the peculiar moral and intellectual qualities of two well-known characters of fiction. The body-snatcher, in "The Tale of Two Cities," who habitually spoke of himself as an honest tradesman; and the murderous rogue Riderhood, in "Our Mutual Friend," who almost persuaded himself that he got his living by the sweat of his brow, had nothing stranger in their habits of thought, nor anything more improbable in their composition, than the late Captain Wirtz, who quitted the world in a resolute humor of injured innocence, and left it the reproaches of a murderer convinced of his martyrhood. There is something strangely horrible in the way this wretched man reiterates, day after day, in his journal, protestations of guiltlessness which he could not himself have originally credited; and the effort he makes to believe himself the victim of perjured witnesses and unjust judges is not less ghastly. It need not be said that there was, of course, no earthly reason why anything should have been done, but from a sense of truth and justice, to procure the death of a person of so little individual account as Captain Wirtz, and so far as human intelligence can decide, there is no doubt that he died for murder done, and for cruelty more pitiless than murder. It is probable, moreover, that there has not been a throb of sympathy for his suffering, nor will be one of regret for his fate, throughout the whole world. Men were not touched with respect for the courage with which he died; but as the drop fell from under him, and he swung trembling in the noose, a yell of loathing for the man, even in the agony of death, and an irrepressible execration, burst from the multitude of witnesses, and found a mute echo everywhere.

Now that he is dead, there has scarcely been an effort to touch those chords of popular feeling which have been known to respond to the story of the most ferocious criminals' careers and expiations; and one reads the diary which he has left behind with a dull horror, passing into shuddering disgust when such a man likens his death in its innocence to that of the Saviour of the world, and only finds the difference in the fact that Christ died to atone for sinners, while he is to die for no just reason that he knows. He struggles hard to find grievances against the Government, and mixed with his prayers and protestations is a sort of fierce and ironical drollery. The diary may well be read as a study of the kind of European character which absorbs from our civilization its vulgarity and grotesqueness, and mistakes these for the American spirit, while it remains essentially unchanged in its native qualities of subjection and baseness. It is the character which is naturalized to our institutions by lewd politicians and the low-pitched slang of newspapers, which is disgusting at all times, and as embodied by Wirtz, in the presence of death, revolting. Wirtz had never grown to understand our liberty but as something that gave evil impunity, nor our law but as something that violated the fundamental principle of liberty. Certainly, having spent a great part of his life in the South, where law and liberty were alike ludicrous lies, he was not altogether to blame for his error of theory, but it was one which even a Southerner, if native born, would not have made. Full of this delusion to the last, he considered himself wronged by accusation and oppressed by trial; and he says, with a strange touch of the popular oration and the railing editorial, in the humility of his inborn slavishness:

"I have heard when I was a boy that the eagle was the king of birds; if he is, how is it that he stoops so low to tear with his talons an humble captain, and is afraid to strike men such as I could name? Poor eagle, I pity thee! thy arts are more like those of a buzzard."

Viewed in a light of more universal interest, the character of Wirtz is not less instructive. We refuse to think that he originally believed himself guiltless of the crimes imputed to him, but it is probable that he did not consider himself a very wicked man. Conscious depravity does not always follow sin, and a man may continue long in a career of evil, and even of violence, and yet be aware of such possibilities of good in his nature that he may doubt if indeed he be a bad man. Crimes he may have committed, but he is sensible that he is not without pity and a willingness to do good where it will serve as well as evil. He looks into his heart and finds there tender memories of childhood, regard for friends, gratitude to benefactors, love of wife, children, father, and mother, and a hope, dumb and helpless for the most part, certainly, but still a hope—of heaven. Such a man may well question if he be black as his guilt has made him, but his doubt is not the less a delusion, and he is all the more dangerous and desperate for it.

THE FREEDMEN.

Gen. Howard addressed the colored citizens of New Orleans at the Orleans Theatre on Sunday evening, Nov. 5. The audience was as ample as could be accommodated, and manifested great enthusiasm for the honored head of the Freedmen's Bureau. His speech, as reported at length in the New Orleans Tribune, contained his customary explanation of the object of the Bureau—to break the shock of the transition from slavery to freedom. The necessity, on the part of the colored people, of forbearance towards their former masters and oppressors was dwelt upon, and their duties as industrious and intelligent citizens clearly pointed out. Especially were they to seek to educate themselves and their children, emulating in this the spirit of their brethren in Tallahassee, who had established and supported exclusively six schools, of which he had found two in cellars under grocery stores. Gen. Howard addressed the freedmen of Jackson, Mississippi, on the 11th, and returned to Washington via Cairo on Saturday.

Gen. Baird relieved Gen. Fullerton as assistant commissioner for Louisiana on the 11th.

On the 27th ult. Gen. Tillson, acting assistant commissioner for Georgia, addressed the members of the State Convention at Milledgeville, in compliance with a resolution of that body. His remarks were admirably adapted to explain the relation of the Federal Government to the entire population of the States lately in rebellion, as exhibited in the aims and organization of the Bureau. The general freely acknowledged that the freedman retained the vices of the slave—the vices of weakness and poverty—lying and theft, and that he must be subjected to a proper guardianship against the consequences of these inbred habits. On the other hand, he could not overlook the fact that the contracts made by many proprietors with their laborers often gave very inadequate compensation, and were framed so as to leave the latter in debt at their expiration. He reminded the convention that acts of cruelty and injustice were of common, he might say, in some places, of hourly, occurrence.

"I know that you, as representatives of the State, would be shocked, mortified, and indignant at this hideous array. There are not a few instances in this State where freedom has been a bitter mockery to these people, and where they have been subjected to cruelty from which they would have been protected as slaves. Now I do not propose to be guilty of the short-sighted stupidity and injustice of judging the whole people of Georgia by men mean, brutal, and cowardly enough to practise useless, unnecessary cruelty on a race already poor, ignorant, and suffering. Such miscreants were never a part of the real people of Georgia; they are the rowdies, blacklegs, and scoundrels of the State, who now take advantage of the disturbed and unsettled condition of affairs to indulge in their natural brutal propensities. I know that you must despise and abhor such men and their acts."

He was gratified to inform them that there was a noticeable and gradual improvement of the freedmen, and a promising diminution of crime among them. Against the notion that as soon as civil government is restored and the army removed, the negro will be forced back into his former condition or something akin to it, the general asserted in the most positive terms the intention of the nation to protect those whom it had freed. In the discharge of that duty the officers of the Bureau would act firmly and impartially, as became the interests of both classes of the population.

The circular of Col. Whittlesey, assistant commissioner for North Carolina, indicates the purpose of Government to reduce to a minimum the number of those who are now dependent upon it for subsistence. The members of freedmen's camps and colonies are directed to find employment at once, and no more rations will be issued to those who refuse situations where they might obtain support. Idleness and wilful vagrancy are to be punished. Paupers are to be turned over to the "Wardens of the Poor." The laws of the State concerning white apprenticeship will be applied to orphans, the children of those who have no honest calling, and other minors with the consent of their parents.

Rev. John Kimball, superintendent for the Bureau of freedmen's schools in the District, reports the whole number in Washington, Alexandria, Georgetown, and vicinity to be forty-one, of which all but seven are free, the latter being private enterprises. These schools represent fifteen societies, employing ninety-one teachers, and embrace 4,884 scholars, with an average daily attendance of 3,566. There are, besides, at least thirteen night-schools—the largest numbering a hundred and fifty, the smallest twelve or fifteen scholars. A majority of these are free, but in some a tuition fee of seventy-five cents or a dollar is charged. They are attended altogether by adults. There are also three industrial schools, conducted by Mrs. Griffing, Mrs. Barnard, and the New England Friends. Miss Walker will presently start a fourth at the Campbell Hospital. The soldiers' free library has been turned over to the Bureau, and will be used as a depository for all books donated in the District. Donations are requested. The colored people have purchased ground at Falls Church and Hall's Hill as school sites, and will undertake to move buildings there if Government will loan them. Secretary Harlan has granted the use of several valuable lots in Washington for educational purposes.

—It will be remembered that the freedmen's school at Tullahoma, Tennessee, was destroyed by incendiaries not many weeks since. Gen. Thomas gave orders that the citizens should rebuild it, and they not complying, he put every one of them under guard until his requirements were obeyed.

—Reports from Fort Smith, Arkansas, describe a merciless persecution by the rebel Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians of the colored people among them, especially of those who, during the war, left their families to join the Union forces either in loyal Indian or colored regiments, and who have since returned. This patriotic service, coupled with the emancipation of their late slaves, has stimulated the doubly savage masters to atrocities in which the barbarism of slavery vies with that of nature.

—Gen. Augur has ordered that hereafter no colored man, within the limits of his department, shall be whipped under any law of Virginia.

—Certain sentences recently obtained against the negroes of Maryland foreshadow the "protection" which the race is likely to receive from the still more southern courts, when the military shall have been withdrawn. A colored woman named Julia Handy was convicted of enticing her children to run away from Col. Walton, to whom they had been bound apprentices. The children swore positively that they alone were responsible for their conduct, and that their mother urged them to return. The colonel testified only that he had seen them together; but the jury were ready to fill the hiatus with an inference. In another instance Judge Tuck, of the Circuit Court now in session at Annapolis, is declared, though the statement is scarcely credible, to have sentenced two girls convicted of larceny to be sold for two years within the State, and a negro woman for six months out of the State. Yet Maryland was third in ratifying the Constitutional Amendment!

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which vertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

SOUTHERN INDISCRETION.

THE wisdom of the old adage recommending people not to "halloo till they are out of the wood" has received a striking illustration from the history of the "reconstruction" process during the last few weeks. We have already commented upon the remarkable power of adaptation and the great practical sense displayed by the Southern people after the resistance in the field had ceased. They at once prepared themselves to do whatever might be required of them as the condition of their release from the position of conquered provinces. They laid down their arms, denounced all attempts at guerrilla warfare, acknowledged that their slaves were free, and, in fact, gave the Government to understand that it had only to name the terms on which it would restore civil government in order to have them formally acceded to. The North was still heated by battle, maddened by Mr. Lincoln's murder, and Mr. Johnson was generally supposed to be a furious sans-culotte who thirsted for aristocratic blood. At that time, in fact, most Southern men looked forward to exemption from hanging and forfeiture of goods as the utmost they could hope for.

The suddenness and completeness of this submission seem to have completely disarmed Mr. Johnson. The amnesty proclamation was already out with the $20,000 clause, which was to smite the leaders to the dust; but he at once set to work to take the sting out of it by wholesale pardons. He then entered on his plan of reconstruction, which was so much more favorable than the South ever hoped for that it electrified it once more into something like its old political activity. He turned a deaf ear to all the warnings addressed to him from the North showing that in the condition of the negro was to be found the key to the Southern problem, and treated this condition as if the really important matter was not what it should be, but who should regulate it. He created machinery for the restoration of the States to the Union, and put its management into the hands of the very men who had borne a more or less active part in the rebellion, and asked for no modifications of the old State constitutions which the fortune of war had not already rendered unavoidable.

Now, the two things which the South feared most of all, as consequences of their defeat, was the confiscation of their property and the interference of the North with the political status of the negro. They had no more objection to the abolition of slavery than they had to wet weather, short crops, or any other dispensation of Providence, and were no more disposed to resist it. It did not cost them a single pang, either, to repeal the ordinances of secession any more than it would cost them to surrender their old colonial charters. Sacrifices of claims which people have not the slightest hope of ever making good are never very painful. And yet, at the outset, these two things were virtually all that Mr. Johnson asked of them in return for the restoration of their civil rights. They were, of course, astonished at his moderation, and with good reason.

We confess we were of the number of those who thought that he ought to have seized the opportunity offered by the state of depression in which he found the South at the close of the contest, not to humiliate, or insult, or trample on her people, but to exact of them such changes in their political system as he was satisfied were necessary for the future peace and prosperity of the nation. He told Major Stearns he thought such negroes as could read and write, or as owned property, or as had served in the army, ought to be allowed to vote. We presume when he said this he meant that it would not only be just to allow them to do so, but expedient. He might have exacted this from every State at the South, just as readily as he has exacted the repudiation of its war debt, the abolition of slavery, and the adoption of the Constitutional Amendment. The plea so much relied on at one time, that he could not constitutionally interfere with State suffrage, was always an almost absurd one, and, we are glad to see, is now never put forward. The negroes whom this modification of the law would have admitted to vote might have been very small in all the States; in some it might have admitted none at all. It is possible, too, that the immediate value of the vote to the colored race would have been very trifling; but the concession of it on any conditions with which a man could comply without the working of a miracle, would, at least, have settled a great principle and put an end at once to a troublous agitation. And what was almost as important, it would have taught the South a lesson which, in our opinion, would have powerfully influenced both their opinions and acts during the remainder of their reconstructive labors. He refused, however, to touch the matter, and some people are now of opinion that he finds some justification for his refusal in the recent vote in Connecticut—an argument which will have some value when it can be shown that he has a right to prescribe what white men shall vote in Connecticut, or to set up a "provisional governor" beside Governor Buckingham.

The result of his excessive tenderness was, as many shrewd people expected, to rouse in these Southerners their old audacity. The submissive tone which followed Johnston's surrender was soon laid aside, and we began speedily to hear of things which the South would not do, and which Mr. Johnson ought not to require. The conventions first began to make wry faces over admitting negro testimony in the courts, and this pill they never would have swallowed if it had not seemed the only way of escaping the jurisdiction of the Freedmen's Bureau. They are now wringing their hands over the repudiation of the rebel debt, and during the coming week will probably be engaged in swallowing the Constitutional Amendment; but Mr. Johnson has had to exact all these things from them by successive stages, supplementing his original plan little by little, as the spirit and purpose of the men he has had to deal with became more fully apparent. We do not say that this is not a wise, prudent mode of action. Under ordinary circumstances it is always a safe one, and it is a way of reaching political results with which nobody but geniuses can always dispense; but his resorting to it shows that it was not the radicals who were wrong last June.

It has had in this instance the good effect of betraying the South into a revelation of its real feelings and intentions, and of satisfying the President that he was too hasty in reaching his conclusions as to its temper. His refusal to withdraw his provisional governors, even from the States which have complied with all his requirements, reveals the full measure of his own disappointment, though his is probably not half as great as that of the Southerners themselves. The secrets they have betrayed, however, in their hurry to get back under "the old flag," may, if we be wise, prove invaluable. We now know that there is really hardly a man at the South who believes that the negro can be elevated above his present condition. The great mass are satisfied, moreover, that he ought not to be, and are determined that he shall not. Governor Humphreys has said as much in his message to the Mississippi Legislature; the newspapers of the State re-echo the sentiment, and we hear already, before the sound of the last shots of the war have well died out, the old threats of lynching Northern men who may venture to open their lips about the negro's condition. There is a vagrant bill before the same Legislature, the very reading of which is a disgrace to American civilization, and which, if enacted and put in force, would not only restore slavery in a modified form, but stamp us at the North, if we looked on calmly at its working, with indelible disgrace.

The other States have not got so far yet as Mississippi, but we hear already from South Carolina, which is next in the reconstruction race, talk of "labor laws" which will almost restore the negro to his old state, minus the liability to sale. The South Carolinian press openly warns all whom it may concern that that State will neither provide education for the blacks nor allow others to do so. The most moderate and intelligent and humane Southern men now, if pressed hard, confess their belief that the negro race is doomed to "die out," or as the common run of Southerners less mincingly call it, to be "killed off," and everybody who knows anything of human nature knows how apt prophecies of this kind are to bring about their own fulfilment.

We say nothing here of the stories which reach us of wholesale assassination of negroes in every direction, and of the terrible mortality amongst them from hunger and exposure, and of the general indisposition at the South, as revealed in all the acts and words of the people, to regard the life of a negro as that of a human being. But from no quarter does there come, or has there come from first to last, the slightest proof of the existence of any widespread willingness to do anything, or allow anything to be done, to raise these unfortunates above their present condition, or to give them even a fair chance in the race of life. What Mr. Johnson insists upon is done, and that grudgingly; but he has insisted upon nothing which will prevent the reduction of the blacks to a condition but one degree removed from, and in some respects more marked by physical suffering than, slavery itself, the minute the States are restored to the Union and the military force withdrawn. In short, unless Congress does its duty, we shall, in our opinion, witness at the South, during the next few years, one of the most tremendous and revolting crimes ever perpetrated by a community laying claims to civilization, and we shall witness the substitution for slavery of a social organization marked by every feature which made slavery politically dangerous.

FRENCH MORALS AND FRENCH POLITICS.

THE letter which we published in our last number gave a picture of society in Paris so repulsive that, we presume, those who have not watched the growth of the arts by which the empire has been built up and consolidated, must have had a good deal of difficulty in believing that it could be faithful. But, unhappily, the very same story is told by all who have enjoyed reasonable opportunities of observation.

Partly owing to the example of the court, and partly to the extraordinary love of luxury produced and fostered by the great commercial activity which the empire has undoubtedly created, the distinction between the monde and the demi-monde, which, unsatisfactory as it may have been in the best of times to the moralist, at all events proved that there was still something respectable about virtue, has been all but effaced. There is hardly a species of triumph valued in society which the fine ladies of the Quartier Bréda are not now as able, even better able, to achieve than the fine ladies of the Faubourg St. Germain. Accordingly we hear that parties are now given by women whose name would, a few years ago, never have been mentioned above a whisper in a respectable house, which in everything that makes a party attractive far surpass those of the best women in Paris. The rooms are as handsome, the lights as bright, the flowers as fresh and costly, the wines as fine, the cookery as delicate, and the music even better than any duchess can furnish, and what is worse than this is, that the company, at least as far as the gentlemen are concerned, is as "select" as any which can be got together by any species of attraction under an honest roof. And worse even than this, the demi-monde has at last succeeded in acquiring the last and sweetest of all distinctions, that of setting the fashions, in clothes, hair-dressing, attitudes and gestures, and even intonation. Of course, where their manners are copied, so are their morals. M. Dupin, in the speech, which we may now call famous, delivered a few months ago in the Senate, on female extravagance, gave utterance to opinions as to the effects of the prevailing rage for fine clothes on domestic morality, which called forth hearty expressions of concurrence from his audience, and the correctness of which neither the press nor the public has ventured to question. There has, however, always been a good deal of elegance and refinement about French vice. To the imperial régime belongs the credit of having stripped it of these attractions, and made it hideously coarse. We are assured that it has for some time been a favorite amusement in court circles to sing barrack-room songs, with appropriate gestures; and now the climax is capped by the practice, which our correspondent describes, of dragging the most notorious and least fastidious warblers of the cafés chantants into aristocratic salons to entertain the company with the coarsest songs in their répertoire.

Unfortunately, the example of the court was never so contagious in France as now. Government has at all periods occupied the position of a providence to the population in that country in a greater degree than in any other in Europe, and been its guide, philosopher, and exemplar. But, under the ancien régime, the strict and well-defined division of society into classes prevented the morals or manners of the court, let them be ever so bad, from influencing anybody but the noblesse of the capital. The bourgeoisie never thought of aping the aristocracy. In Paris, as in all the provincial towns, there was, down to the time of the Revolution, a large middle class, composed of the families of lawyers, belonging to the various "parlements," and of those of traders and manufacturers, whose life was sober, austere, secluded, to a degree that a Puritan would have almost called "godly," amongst whom traditions of simplicity, probity, and decorum were preserved with religious care, and who looked out upon the gay and licentious life of the court circle as something with which they had no concern, and by which they were neither touched nor tempted.

That class exists no longer. There is now hardly such a thing as a class in France. Every position, social as well as official, is attainable by everybody; but the influence of the court, while as powerful as ever, extends, of course, over an area proportionately wider than ever. There is nobody who does not thirst, and even hope, for a share in court amusements, and who does not feel himself entitled, if he pleases, to imitate court manners or adopt court morals. It is in this fact that is to be found the full atrocity of the modes of distracting public attention from the great game of politics to which the Emperor, or the men he has about him, is resorting.

What will be the ultimate result of the experiment which he is making, whether a Cæsarist despotism can really be founded by such arts as those in a Christian country, and in the middle of the nineteenth century, time only can tell. Our correspondent, who is well qualified to express the feelings of all that is best in the French nation, is confident that the heart of the people is still sound, and that a terrible reaction against the debasing process to which French society is subjected will take place before very long. There is no question that there is in the French people of all conditions a capacity for appreciating whatever is lovely and of good report, such as is found in other European countries only among the cultivated and refined; that the sentiment of personal honor, of dignity, and self-respect goes deeper down in society there than anywhere else, and that in the heart even of the peasant or the private soldier, the poet or orator or preacher may find a response for which, amongst any other people of a similar class, he might look in vain.

But when we come to calculate what the influence of the spirit of this commercial age on French manners and morals, and consequently on French politics, is likely to be, we are met at the outset of the enquiry by the disagreeable and embarrassing fact, for fact it is, that almost all that portion of the population which has extricated itself from the bonds of superstition is completely given over to materialism, has little or no faith in anything above or beyond this solid earth that we live on. Nor is this something altogether new. Frenchmen have always tended strongly in this direction. One of the ablest of French writers has wittily described French want of spirituality by saying that "the truth is that France has never been thoroughly convinced of the vanity of the world; an exact and firm appreciation of the things of the earth—this is her heritage." It is, however, one of the most important and suggestive facts in political history that no people has long maintained its public any more than its private virtue after it has generally lost faith in things unseen, or ceased to consider this world as but the passage to a better one. Whatever political force the consideration of the effect of one's conduct on the happiness of one's fellow men may acquire hereafter, it is certain that up to this time the cause of freedom and good government, as well as of domestic virtue, has been found to languish just in proportion to the popular devotion to merely material pleasures. And just as there has never been an age in which the tendency to decide all great political questions by considerations of profit and loss, of more or less clothes or jewelry or furniture, was stronger than in this, so there has never been an age in which it was in so great a degree men's duty to keep their eyes fixed steadily on remote results, and to refuse to submit either their conscience or their conduct to the regulation of accountants or custom-house officers or upholsterers. Imports and exports may rise, cotton may be plenty, the consumption of beef, silk, and jewelry may increase, but the last word is still not said. The goodness or badness of government has still to be judged by another standard, and it is a standard which no people has ever yet successfully applied to whom, however keen their enjoyment of the things of this life, the nothingness of time and the vastness and importance of eternity were not constantly present.

GLEANINGS FROM THE FOREIGN PRESS.

THE Continental journals have had a good deal to say about the dismissal of Mgr. de Merode ("from considerations of health") and the appointment of General Kantzler—more subservient to the will of Cardinal Antonelli—in his place.

"Now that this dismissal," says a correspondent of the Indépendance Belge, "has made more noise than was desirable, an attempt is made to color the act with a pretext, and to throw a cushion to break monsignor's fall. To this end quite a little family romance has been imagined. . . . It is from excess of affection that the Holy See has shown its pro-minister to the door. It is from excess of affection that he has been withdrawn from duties which were undermining his health, and a salary which was exhausting his purse, for he found means to expend six times as much as he earned. A little more of this excess of affection and he would have been conducted to the frontier from brigade to brigade."

The Moniteur having published, after more than a fortnight's delay, the sanitary advice of the Council of Hygiene in regard to the cholera, the Journal des Débats surmises that the interval was intended as a respite for the epidemic in which to repent and betake itself elsewhere.

"As for the advice in itself," it continues, "we are unable to appreciate it with our moderate capacity. We shall merely remark that it formally invites the public to 'put no trust in the pretended modes of prevention and cure whose properties are asserted and extolled.' After making as large an allowance as you please for quackery, which never fails to flourish in such deplorable circumstances as those in which we now find ourselves, it may still be asked of the Council of Hygiene if they are themselves in possession of sure means of combating the epidemic. By their own avowal, they know of none. How, then, can they affirm so positively that there is no virtue in the preventives and remedies that are heralded on all sides? . . After all, when we have read the Moniteur's instructions, we know very little more than we did before, except that the essential thing is to adopt a good hygienic regimen, that this regimen is rarely observed, and that the majority of the victims of the epidemic are themselves to blame. Of course, those who die are always to blame for dying, and the accident which befals them, having possibly the appearance of an act of opposition, irritates the official journal. This uncomfortable feeling is, besides, very natural; the Moniteur is unwilling that the cholera should exist, or, at least, could wish that it existed so slightly as not to be worth mentioning. We and everybody else could wish this also; but, to our thinking, the wisest course would be to exhibit things as they are, rather than to leave the popular imagination unbounded latitude for magnifying the evil, and assigning it proportions which it fortunately does not own."

The disastrous and almost mysterious explosion of a gasometer at the London Gaslight Company's works, at Nine Elms, on the Thames, has startled not a little the inhabitants of the metropolis. The accident appears to be quite unprecedented, and has naturally caused much anxious discussion in the press. The Times remarks:

"It is well known that ordinary gas is not inflammable except when combined in certain proportions with atmospheric air or with oxygen, and the reason why it is said to be impossible for a gasometer to explode is that the gas within it is supposed to be free from any such intermixture. It is suggested, therefore, that the gas must have escaped in the meter-house, must there have become sufficiently diluted to be inflammable, and that this explosion ignited the gas in the first gasometer, which, again, ignited the second. It will be observed that the second gasometer, though ignited, did not explode. The gas simply burnt away at the escape which was opened for it, just as it does in the ordinary gas-lights in our own houses. It is certain that if there was anything in the form of an explosion in the first gasometer the gas must in some way have become mixed with air or oxygen. It is also suggested that the present system of manufacture renders it possible for such an admixture to occur, but it is difficult to believe that the gas could be so diluted as this supposition implies without becoming nearly useless for purposes of illumination. The injury to the roof appears to be nearly all the damage inflicted upon the first gasometer, and one would certainly expect more serious injuries if the explosion of the gas within had been complete."

The Post rehearses at length "a strange chapter in the annals of crime" which was opened recently at the Marylebone Police Court, and of which it says:

"The subject-matter of it affords a curious illustration of modern civilization and the advantages of a cheap literature of fiction. A band of juvenile thieves—the eldest of whom was only fifteen, and the youngest and presumably the cleverest, the most adroit, vigilant, and trustworthy of the gang, only ten years of age—were brought up charged by the police with being concerned in stealing a couple of pairs of boots, and charged by themselves with no end of other robberies. They seemed ashamed of being placed in the dock, or at least ranged in a row in front of the solicitors' table—for the dock would not hold them—on so puerile a charge as the robbery of only two pairs of boots, and volunteered a statement of their recent thefts. One is struck by the exploits of these young robbers, and the business-like way in which they carried on their depredations. It is a melancholy, deplorable narrative from first to last. These wretched children manifest no small skill, daring, and intelligence; and they appear to have possessed at least enough education to enable them to become acquainted with the names of the worst thieves who have ever lived, and who have strangely been made the heroes of romance. Each of these incipient embryotic highwaymen and housebreakers, if not murderers, had a professional pseudonym —a nomme de guerre selected from the literature of crime—and by which he was known among his associates in the small war which they jointly carried on against property and society."

The hope is expressed that these unfortunate children, some of whom are said to have respectable parents, will be sent to a reformatory; but the Times gives the story of a lad, fourteen years of age, who ran away from the Stoke Farm reformatory in Worcestershire, and whose representations, with all due allowance, are not flattering to the institutions in question:

"While he complained of the severity of the discipline, and particularly of the food served out to himself and his companions in winter, he entered into a description of the way in which they employ their liberty of intercourse with each other. 'The boys all associated together, and told each other the particulars of the burglaries, highway-robberies, and thefts they had severally committed, and how they had committed them, and he who had perpetrated the most daring offence and robbed the public to the largest extent was always considered the cleverest in the reformatory, and before he left he generally gave full instructions as to how the other boys could best plunder their friends and neighbors when they came out."

The Spectator, in an article on "Drawing-room Politics," having affirmed that "Mr. Gladstone in a cellar would be Mr. Gladstone all the same, but Lord Palmerston minus Cambridge House and all the influence Cambridge House involved, would not have been quite the same," finds it "a curious speculation to discover why," and says:

"The truth is that the assistance of a salon, at once popular and fashionable, places in the hands of the Ministry a patronage almost as valuable as that of the Government. No sensible man would deny that the latter is a source of strength, and so also is the former. As there are influential persons who secretly hunger for office, and pay, and patronage, so also there are influential persons, and influential persons' wives, who secretly thirst for social promotion, distinction among their friends, and envy from their inferiors. Why they should thirst is a matter beside the question. It is very ridiculous for Brown, the millionaire, to want to be seen in a room where he is utterly out of his element, and still more ridiculous for Smith, who has immense real power, to care for the visible stamp on that power which the entrée to certain houses places. The 'rank is but the guinea stamp,' and all that, but without the stamp the guinea is only gold, not coin, and this particular kind of guinea wants to be current. We do not see that the ambition, imbecile as it is, is much more imbecile than that which tempts Brown to give champagne when he can only afford sherry, or Robinson to try dinners à la russe when he and his guests too would much rather have plain mutton. The fact remains that there is such a thirst, and that the possession of social patronage is therefore a great power. Look at the list of candidates for seats—three thousand of them in Mr. Brand's list alone—and see how many of them are willing to sacrifice thousands, and give up their ease, and lead lives which are a burden to them, simply for the sake of social promotion. They are getting up to the light, as they think, though in fact that eminence is perhaps the dreariest of all, and they cry 'Excelsior!' as eagerly as if they were following a great idea or were buoyed up by a great hope. What they get by entrance into Parliament their wives get by certain invitations; and the right of issuing them, of writing a card which makes the unknown less unknown or even well known, is a formidable right. It is a power all the greater because it belongs to so few. No position requires such a combination of rank and tact, none can be spoiled so easily by want either of tact or industry."

Correspondence.

THE SOVEREIGNTY OF THE STATES.

II.

THEIR STATUS UNDER THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AND THE CONFEDERATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

In my previous letter I attempted to show that the Anglo-American Colonies, though indisputably enjoying and exercising, under the British crown, larger political powers and higher political prerogatives than those which are possessed by the States under the federal Constitution, neither were nor could be, at any time before the National Declaration of Independence in 1776, in any just sense, individual sovereignties. Upon a hasty view of the subject this might seem a superfluous labor, for nothing is more certain than that, so far from claiming the attribute of sovereignty for themselves separately, they never even held themselves absolved from their allegiance to the British crown until the summer of 1776, when the progress of events had gradually changed the political relations as well as the military position of the belligerent parties. But, as I shall have occasion to repeat hereafter, the mere opinion of the colonists as to their political condition is of little moment; for that was, in great part at least, matter of law. The declarations, resolutions, laws of the colonial legislatures, alone, neither made nor unmade the commonwealths in whose behalf they spoke. The individuality of the State is a continuation of the individuality of the colony, and it has never yet been shown, though often enough passionately asserted, that any new political element had ever been introduced into that individuality. A transfer of allegiance, indeed, there has been. The people of the Union have inherited the sovereign rights of the British throne, and to that people the States now owe the allegiance which as colonies they owed to that throne.

It is, therefore, very important that we understand thoroughly not so much what the American publicists of the Revolutionary period thought about their political status, as what that status really was; for in no other way can we come, historically or logically, to a true conclusion as to what the political condition of the States now is.

Persons who have not made themselves well acquainted with the history of the war of 1775–83 are apt to suppose that, because the revolt ended in a revolution, it began with one. Such is by no means the fact. The insurgents of 1775 looked for redress of their grievances from a just administration of the constitutional powers, and a just discharge of the constitutional duties, of the British government, not for a separation from the parent state. The Congress of that year adjourned with an expectation that wiser counsels would prevail in the royal cabinet, and that thus the harmony between the metropolitan and the colonial territories would be restored. It declared that the American people were waging hostilities against "a corrupt administration," not against the British people or the common hereditary ruler of both. All public authorities professed allegiance to the British crown, prayers for the king continued to be offered up in the performance of divine service, and in the proclamation of a fast by Congress the clergy and people were requested to beseech the Almighty "to bless our rightful sovereign, King George III., and inspire him with wisdom."

It was, indeed, found necessary to treat the royal authority as suspended until these prayers should be granted and the needed "wisdom" vouchsafed. It was not, however, for a moment imagined that the sovereignty was in the interim lodged anywhere except in the whole people of the united colonies, the chief ultimate organ and exponent of whose will was, not the local authorities, which, in every colony but two, derived their power from the British government, and were legally its agents, but Congress, which was a body unknown to the British crown, and created by the colonies as the guardian of the public liberties.

The distinction thus early made between Congress and the colonial legislatures is a fact of vast historical and legal significance. From the moment that a national Congress was constituted, the people looked to it as the immediate source of all official power and jurisdiction, and they considered their own domestic legislative and executive bodies as deriving their legality from Congress—the mouth-piece and interpreter of the national will—and not merely from their direct constituents. It was by the assent and upon the recommendation of Congress that the colonies—except in the case of Rhode Island and Connecticut, which had always chosen the members of their colonial governments by virtue of the provisions of their charters—established first temporary, and afterwards more permanent, local governments, which, by a resolution of the national legislature, were warned against intermeddling with national affairs, by even so much as separately petitioning the king or parliament. When these governments had been thus established as dependencies of Congress, not of the crown, that body declared further adherence to British supremacy to be a crime, the crime of treason, and because it had not yet established courts of its own, it remitted the trial of persons accused of this greatest of political offences to the colonial tribunals, and requested the colonial legislatures to pass laws for its punishment.

The declarations of independence by individual colonies, to which far too great historical and legal importance has been attached, were not spontaneous movements of the people of this or that one of the several colonies or of their legislatures. They were, as Marshall observes, brought about by "the influence of Congress." The object of Congress in stimulating these proceedings was to familiarize the citizens of the colonies with the ideas of separation from Great Britain and national independence, to prepare them for the solemn declaration of sovereignty by the organ of the whole people of the nation, which it was foreseen would soon become both expedient and necessary, and to commit them, so far as possible through their legislatures, to the support of Congress in this great measure.

It now becomes necessary to examine the true import and value of the Declaration of Independence by Congress, on the Fourth of July, 1776, and of the Articles of Confederation, framed in 1777 and ratified in 1778. Before we proceed to the discussion of the force of words, phrases, and provisions in these remarkable instruments, attention must be drawn to three preliminary considerations which should always be borne in mind in scanning the action of Congress and of the people under them, and in estimating the actual relations between the people, Congress, and the provincial legislatures:

First. The organization of the Federal Government was not yet completed. It had no executive head, no judiciary, no direct personal relation between representative and constituent, and, therefore, no immediate organ of communication between Congress and the people. For this latter reason the legislative assemblies of the individual colonies, and for some time afterwards those of the States, were the most direct, though certainly very imperfect, exponents of the will of the people—the only means through which Congress could act on the nation or be acted upon by it. Besides this, emergencies often arose in which prompt action on the part of the colonial, the State, or inferior local officers was indispensable, without waiting for consultation with, or authorization from, Congress or each other. Hence the provincial organizations had, from necessity, a temporary importance which did not inherently belong to them, and which was lost for ever the moment Congress came, by virtue of the Constitution, to have an immediate constituency in the people, a Federal judiciary, and an executive who was the chief magistrate of the nation—not an instrument of the State legislatures, or the mere presiding officer of a deliberative body. Under such circumstances we are in danger of ascribing too much weight to instances of the exercise of independent power, and the assertion of independent right, by provincial jurisdictions, and to treat as substantial indicia of sovereignty colonial or State declarations, which were really only the will of the whole people through one or more of its thirteen mouth-pieces, public acts, done in the name and by the authorization of the local legislatures barely because there was not time, opportunity, or means for the intervention of a higher or even a co-equal power.

Secondly. In examining the written documents and the reported public discourses of the Revolutionary period, we must be on our guard against attaching to the terms of the political vocabulary the precise and uniform sense which more recent general usage has given to many of them, and especially against conceding that certain technical expressions were authoritatively employed with the distorted signification which commentators and interpreters of the sectional Southern school have long striven to affix to them. At the epoch in question there existed no special dialect suited to the discussion of the topics which the experiment of reconstituting American political society on a new and broader basis was forcing upon the minds of men. The language of the great English publicists of the seventeenth century had become somewhat obsolete, and, in any case, was by no means familiar to the social theorists of the united colonies; and there had as yet been no necessity for reviving that half-forgotten vocabulary, or of creating a new phraseology to serve for new conditions of associate life. We observe, therefore, a vagueness, a hesitancy and uncertainty, in the language of the political theorists and statesmen of the day which sometimes seems to extend even to the very grammatical forms of words familiar enough in their ordinary applications. This indistinctness of expression was augmented by the necessity of extreme caution and reserve on the part of public writers and speakers. Hostilities, as we have seen, had already existed more than a whole year before the public mind was prepared for the announcement of a conclusion which the boldest of the Revolutionary leaders had but lately found themselves obliged to accept—the conclusion, namely, that these hostilities were no longer an insurrection organized for the purpose of resisting the infringement of the commercial and municipal rights and privileges of the colonies, but had grown into a justum bellum inter partes, an international war, in which the original question of colonial rights and charter powers and obligations had been quite lost sight of. Men who had as yet but doubtful anticipations and dim conceptions of American independence and sovereignty would naturally be shy of committing themselves by positive and precise expressions, and the habit of using equivocal or, at least, indefinite language in relation to these great matters would continue for some time after they had taken a new position. The opinions, too, of American statesmen were necessarily more or less unsettled as to the ultimate form which the institutions of the new commonwealth would assume, and as to the precise legal relations of its constituent parts to each other and to the central power. They had as yet had no time for the consideration of such questions. They were struggling to establish the fact of a new national existence, and the definition of the particular mode of existence was not, for the moment, a want so urgent as to make it necessary or even prudent for wise men to become committed to each other or to themselves on the subject. Besides, in the diversity of interests and of views which, in spite of the harmonizing influences of time and increased mutual intercourse, still existed between the various sections of the new republic, there was great fear of irreconcilable political difference, and men sometimes systematically avoided the use of forms and phrases which might provoke discussion or prematurely suggest questions the determination of which it was wiser to adjourn; sometimes yielded to the apprehension of discord, and allowed to pass, without criticism or objection, words or propositions which might possibly be interpreted as pledging them to views quite opposite to their own. For these reasons the style of congressional debate and of all public state papers was eminently what we now call non-committal on all points except the one cardinal question of national independence; and such others as absolutely must be determined in order to secure the necessary efficiency to the military operations, upon whose success the fate of everything Americans held dear depended. The provisions of congressional legislation and of all governmental ordinances were few and elastic. For the present, concert of action was indispensable, the future must be left to take care of itself; and all good patriots trusted to time, the development of common interests, the good-will growing out of community of action, the consciousness of the necessity of mutual sacrifices, to reconcile conflicting opinions and bring about a satisfactory solution of problems the discussion of which might for the time be safely postponed.

Thirdly. If we admit that the opinions of a majority of American publicists as to the legal character of the State organizations, and their relations to the federal Government were well settled and harmonized, and were also clearly expressed in the Declaration of Independence, the Articles of Confederation, and the Constitution, it does not necessarily follow that we are in all possible cases absolutely bound by those opinions. So far, indeed, as the provisions of the latter instrument were stipulations between parties competent to contract, they are doubtless obligatory; but mere abstract propositions embodied in either of the three are subject to be reconsidered and overruled. In fact, Southern politicians of the State-rights school and their Northern allies have long maintained that no parts even of the Constitution are binding, except such as express compacts made upon a consideration, not only sufficient at the time but continuing sufficient in the opinion of all parties to the agreement. They hold, indeed, that the famous Virginia Resolutions are authoritative expositions of constitutional law, but, at the same time, they deny—and here they have had a majority of the Supreme Court with them—that the Ordinance of 1787, which prohibited slavery in the North-western Territory, has any validity at all, though it was framed by a body substantially the same as that which formed the Constitution, and was universally understood, at the time, as not merely a compact between the North and the South, but as a counterpart and condition of the Constitution itself, co-ordinate with that instrument and equally binding and obligatory. The advocates of extreme State-rights doctrines, then, have no right to complain if we fairly apply a principle which they have declared and perverted to most mischievous ends.

The political status of the revolting colonies and their relations to each other and to the Federal power as the exponent and organ of the sovereign will of the nation, are matter of law, and a large proportion of the legal principles applicable to these questions are in no sense dependent on imaginary compacts between the legislatures of the colonies—bodies whose authority to enter into political contracts was of a very limited nature—but they necessarily arise from the condition of the colonies as integral parts of one and the same empire, owing allegiance to one and the same sovereign head, bound by common interests, and acting together for the attainment of a common end, security, namely, against oppressions which, though often purely local in their operation, were nevertheless felt as violations of a common right because they injuriously affected parts of a common whole.

Hence the language of congressional and provincial debate and legislation, of official proclamations, of the declarations of independence, and even the Constitution, are to be interpreted in the light of contemporaneous FACTS, and words are not to be held to express meanings irreconcilable with the possibilities of governmental action or with the iron logic of events.

What, then, are the great and leading facts which, either in accordance with, or in spite of, the opinions of the time, determined the legal condition of the colonies, and, of course, the legal effect of all utterances of word or deed by their legislative assemblies, their executive officers, or their representatives in Congress?

The colonies were, in fact, always substantially parts of one commonwealth, but they did not constitute a formal and organized whole until they united for the common defence of their liberties and of their constitutional rights as British subjects whose government was administered by special jurisdiction created for that purpose and instituted by the colonial charters. This original union was not formed for any purpose of conquest, of aggressive warfare, or even of securing independence, but solely for the defence of the privileges which the colonists claimed by grant from the British crown. It contemplated no change in their condition or their relations to the mother country, aimed at no enlargement of their rightful powers, and sought only to secure that which they believed themselves already entitled to by the terms of the original concessions from the throne. In the course of a single year the character of the contest, the objects of the war, had undergone a total change, and it is a matter of extreme importance to observe that this revolution was the cause, not the consequence, of a corresponding change in the opinions, the feelings, and the aims of the people of the States. It was the folly and the obstinacy of the British Government, and the events to which such folly and obstinacy necessarily gave rise, not the will of the colonists, that absolved them from their native allegiance and made the American people sovereign and free. George the Third forced separation upon them. They accepted, and Congress declared their independence, not as a right to be conquered by force of arms, but as a fact already accomplished by agencies which they had not put in operation, and which they could not control. Having, then, proclaimed their acceptance of this cardinal fact, they took it with its natural and legal consequences, the most important of which was the ultimate transfer of the prerogatives of sovereignty to a new jurisdiction. When the British crown had forfeited, or, to use the apt expression of the Declaration of Independence, had "abdicated" the rights of government over the colonies, the sovereignty over them no longer resided in it. Where then did it lodge?

A nation or a people may be independent without a government, that is, it may be so conditioned that no foreign state has the right, the will, or the power to control it; but it cannot be recognized as sovereign without a general political organization and a visible head. The lawless hordes of nomad savages which roam over the Asiatic and African deserts are independent, but it would be an abuse of language to describe them as sovereign peoples; and it implies no contradiction in terms to affirm that there was a period when the Anglo-American colonists had been released from the dominion of England, and were, therefore, independent, but when they had not yet waked up to the consciousness of the national life that slept within them, and when, therefore, the attribute of sovereignty was only potentially, not actually, existent in the American people. In the meantime, the national sovereignty may properly be considered to have been, as was said in an article in the first number of THE NATION, "in abeyance," while the colonies were in the condition of "minors lawfully emancipated from the tyranny of an unnatural parent, but who have not yet chosen a legal guardian."

I think I have shown that the colonies, though, like many inferior municipal corporations, exercising certain attributes of sovereignty, were never, while colonies, truly sovereign political bodies, and I am aware of no sufficient grounds for contending that the one sovereignty of Great Britain, upon its forfeiture by that state, divided itself, polypus-like, into thirteen new sovereignties, and that these lodged themselves in municipal corporations which never even claimed to be independent until a national Government had been organized and proclaimed independence in the name and by the authority of the people of the United States. Then, indeed, the latent sovereignty became potent. It manifested itself as an indivisible attribute of the American people, in whom it still inalienably resides; and the various local organizations through which its functions are discharged, towns, cities, counties, States, the federal Government itself, are but its ministers.

G. P. M.

FLORENCE, Italy, Oct. 28.

THE SOUTH AS IT IS.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

XVIII.

KINGSTREE, S. C., Oct. 30, 1865.

THE traveller from North Carolina passes but a little distance into this State before he finds the outward indications of a widely different social organization. The scenery in its general aspect is the same. There, as well as here, for a hundred miles from the coast, the surface is very flat and traversed by many sluggish streams; pine barrens alternate with swamps, and by far the larger portion of the country is covered with forests. But the clearing of the small farmer is rarely seen; the fields of the great plantations spread wide on either hand till their bounding lines of woods appear as irregular black walls; the negro cabins, often neatly built, are gathered into little villages of twenty or thirty houses, and often it is possible to ride three or four miles in a straight line within the limits of one man's land. The valleys of the creeks and rivers are possessed by the rich planters, the poor whites, whose local designation is "Backwoods People," occupy the ridges between. Their dwellings are seldom to be seen from the public thoroughfares, and one is surprised to hear that this class constitutes a great majority of the white population.

Yesterday morning, just after leaving Marion village, I turned from the main road, and, with the intention of making my ride a couple of miles shorter, followed a cart-path leading through the estate of a large cotton planter. Very soon I lost my way among the intricacies of the field-paths, and rode aside to the negro-quarters to ask for information, and, after the road had been pointed out, I said to two of the negroes: "Well, boys, have you raised much cotton and corn this year?"

"Raise corn, sir? Did n' plan' cotton; dis yer san' hill fiel' don' bring cotton nohow. We jus' done broke corn."

"You 'll make cotton this next year, I suppose?"

"Dunno, boss, dunno. We 's waiting till Jenewerry come. Den we kin know."

"Are you going to stay here another year?"

"'Spect so, sir. Major G—— was own dis place. He was master for all we. He says we kin stay ef we work, and we kin have half the cotton we make."

"But you won't make a contract till January, you say?"

"No, sir," said an old man, "we heares dis an' dat, dis an' dat, an' we told him we 'd hol' on tell Jenewerry."

While this conversation was going on several men and women had come out of the neighboring cabins, or were standing in the door-ways, and though they pretended to be engaged with something else, and did not approach me very closely, I could see that they all gave careful attention to overhear what was said.

"Well, I should say that Major G—— had made you a very fair offer. Why not sign the agreement now? You do n't want to put it off till it 's too late to begin work on next year's crop?"

"I ain't agwine to bin' myself," said one young fellow, "not till I kin see better."

"Hush you," said the old man, "you dunno what you talk about. Let de gen'l'man talk."

I waited, however, to see whether or not they would broach the subject of a division of lands among the negroes, for I am told that such an opinion is universally prevalent in the lower districts of this State. But they also waited, and seemed disinclined to speak plainly, so I asked if that was what they were expecting to take place in January. "Yes," they said with some hesitation, "they 'd been told so."

"Yes," said another whom I had not before seen, "we 's agwine to wait anyhow. We dunno whar we 'll be next year, nor what they 'll do with us. They tell what they 'll do at Columby, and they tell another thing over to headquarters, and I goes for waitin' anyhow."

When I told them it was very unlikely that any land would be given away by the Government, they listened to what I said, but appeared to receive it with dissatisfaction and incredulity. In Virginia and North Carolina I found but one negro, an old man living near Charlotte, who entertained any expectation of this kind. In this State I have talked with the people of five plantations in Marion and Williamsburg districts, and all seemed to be fully persuaded that some such provision was to be made for them. The terms which they refused these negroes pronounced fair and reasonable, but they declined to accede to them, and it seemed that their refusal was as much dictated by a profound distrust of the promises made them as by the hope that they themselves might, perhaps, become landholders.

The house at which I stayed last night was that of a planter who lives midway between the Great Pedee River and this village, and it furnished me with exceptionally pleasant and comfortable quarters. Its owner was a Northerner by birth, who, having come out from Connecticut as a trader many years ago, had married a Southern woman and become a wealthy rice and cotton planter. Everything in and about his house was ordered with a methodical neatness not at all common in this region, for he seemed to have retained many of his New England habits. His political opinions, however, were entirely South Carolinian. The Southern States he still called the Confederacy, and he spoke of the battle of Chattanooga as a great calamity. "Your Government," he said, "ought as a matter of policy to deal gently with President Davis." "Why," said I, "does anybody in the South care particularly about him?" "I am sure," said his wife, "if the Yankee Government wants the good-will of the females of the South, it will set him free at once, for we all admire him."

"Yes," said he, "and everybody knows that he had less to do with bringing on the war than many others. He seemed to be more unpopular towards the close of the war, and there was a certain party in this State, with the Rhetts at the head of it, which made a great outcry against his administration and charged every disaster on him; but the mass of our people always thought him a pure-minded statesman and patriot."

He saw it stated in the papers, he went on to say, that Mr. Davis was to be tried for treason. A Northern jury would probably find him guilty, but he had no idea that any punishment would be inflicted. To put him to death would shock the South beyond expression and disgust the whole civilized world, so he had no fears that any such extreme measure would be adopted. And, as he had said before, to conciliate the Southern people, who never would believe that Davis had done wrong, it would be well to release him without trial.

I told him that I had heard a good deal said about a probable negro insurrection, and asked him for his opinion.

"I look for it, sir, in January. I regard it as almost certain to occur."

"Why, who was that nigger," said his wife, "who said right out that there had n't been any war to what there would be? One nigger man said that to Mr. B.'s nephew, sir."

"It is a general fear," said Mr. B. "The negroes have made up their minds that land is to be given them at New Year's, and of course it will be a great disappointment to them when they find that that time has gone by and nothing has been done for them. Our negroes here are more intelligent than those thirty miles below us, and we have more white men among them, but I think there will be a rising on the coast. Of course it could n't extend far, but some families will be murdered and some property destroyed, and a deplorable example will be set to both white and black. It will begin the work of extermination."

In reply to my questions, he said that more than half of his neighbors, he thought, shared his fears. He had no intention of moving his family away, because he expected the fighting to be confined to the tier of counties on the coast. The United States officers would not believe in the possibility of an insurrection. They seemed to despise the negroes too much to think them capable of becoming dangerous.

As for work, the freedmen were doing absolutely nothing. He had overheard one of his girls saying that she had n't seen any freedom yet, she had to work just as hard now as ever. And that was the feeling of a great many of them. Then, as he had said, they were waiting for January, and nothing could be done with them till they became convinced that they must work for wages. They were stealing everything that they could lay their hands on. In old times, when a slave was caught stealing he was not prosecuted, for the owners had too much respect for each other; but his master was informed and made restitution to the loser, and the thief escaped with a whipping. He never was whipped severely on such occasions, he had no character to lose, and in a month the whole thing was forgotten. In this way the negroes were made a race of thieves.

"Oh, Mr. B——," said his wife, "I 'm sure they were all thieves in Africa. Wherever you read about them they 're always the same."

"And there is a class of white folks," he continued, "meaner than the negroes, who have been made more lawless by the war, who never would work, and they now encourage the negroes to come about them. One man just over the creek, who never earned a dime in his life, has got more than forty negroes on his farm; if you can call it a farm—he never made corn enough to feed himself three months. They steal whatever they can, and he sells it for them, and the whole parcel expect to live off their neighbors. It is these people who demoralize the negroes. What with the one and the other, I do n't know how we are to live in the country at all. The two classes together are so numerous that I 'm afraid we could n't enforce a good, strict vagrant law if we had it. I candidly confess that I look forward to the extermination of the freedmen."

This gentleman was very desirous of leasing out either his rice or cotton plantation to some Northern man. Then, he said, if he could find some one with five thousand dollars capital, he would engage in the lumber business, or in distilling spirits of turpentine, for he owned about five thousand acres of woodland, and had a turpentine orchard containing a hundred thousand boxes.

This village of Kingstree is garrisoned by a company of soldiers, and the people of the tavern seem to be in a state of considerable excitement on account of a conflict that has just occurred between the military and civil authorities. The landlord was arrested some three weeks since by the special agent of the Treasury Department on a charge of having secreted, and afterwards sold as his own private property, several bales of cotton which, at the time of Johnston's surrender, were owned by the Confederate Government. To-day the sheriff of the district arrested the Treasury agent on a charge of false imprisonment, but his prisoner was immediately taken away from him by the commander of the garrison. This occurrence gives rise to much denunciation of the tyranny of martial law. The landlord, a Bavarian, who can hardly speak English, has been declaring his determination to appeal to General Gillmore, at Charleston, and is exhorted by his friends and his wife to do so.

"That 'll do no good," said one young man; "knock the scoundrel down the first time you meet him."

"And if he does," said a lady sitting near, "the Yankees 'll put him into jail, and he 'll have to buy out. We 'll all just have to leave the country, and let the Yankees have it. Do n't I love them from the bottom of my heart! Once I had my trunks all packed, ready to start as soon as I could sell my furniture and find a vessel, for it seemed as if I could not stay. Oh, if ever there was a rebel I was one. The agony I suffered when we first got the news of General Lee's surrender was perfectly indescribable. I did n't close my eyes, you know; I walked up and down; it seemed I could n't believe it, yet I knew it was true, and I just cried and cried. I did say that the Yankees should never make me shed a tear, but that broke me down. That was the time I was going to emigrate. I remember it was the next day Mrs. S. run over to the house. 'Oh,' says she, 'good news! I 've got good news for you.' 'I do n't know what good news there can be any more,' says I. 'Old Lincoln 's dead,' says she; 'assassinated in Washington city.' Well, I did n't see how that was going to do us any good then; but I could n't sell my furniture, and I just unpacked my trunks about as fast as I 'd packed them, and here I am yet. But I only wish I had plenty of money, and I 'd go to some place where I would n't have to see a Yankee again as long as I live."

CHARLESTON, S. C., November 3, 1865

On Tuesday morning I set out from Kingstree in a thick mist, and rode all day through the dripping trees and over a very thinly peopled country. Just after sunset I succeeded in getting a lodging at the house of a planter, who hospitably took me in, although the arrival of two relatives to pay him a visit had filled his only spare chamber. But it was his rule, he said, never to turn away a stranger, and I should have a bed before the fire in the parlor.

His property, as he informed me in the morning, consisted of something more than sixty-five hundred acres of land, divided into two plantations, one devoted to rice and one to cotton, and a grazing farm stocked with sheep and cattle. His house was a large, weather-beaten building, with piazzas at the front and back, but appeared to contain only four rooms, the windows of which were unglazed and the walls unplastered. In the parlor, which also served as the dining-room, there was but little furniture, and nothing for purposes of ornament.

At supper the conversation, in which I took no part, turned upon the negro.

"I met Dr. M——," said one of the ladies, "as I come on down, and he said they 'd begun to form a company to protect us against the niggers. He was goin' to be the commissary, he said, and they 'd chosen the commander, too. I told him that 's what ruined us before; there was too many wanting to be officers, and not enough of soldiers."

"I had n't heard anything of that," said her uncle, "but it 's going to be necessary. I 'm told that the nigger soldiers in Georgetown have been getting very independent latterly; but the Yankee officers, they say, make short work of it with 'em. I hear that one or two of 'em were shot down last week, and tumbled into the river, man and gun."

"Who did it?"

"Their own officers, the Yankees. That 's a case of nigger shooting that won't be trumpeted all over Lincolndom, I expect."

"I wish they 'd shoot 'em all," said his wife; "I 'm glad when I hear o' one of 'em got out o' the way. If I could get up to-morrow morning and hear that every nigger in the country was dead, I 'd just jump up and down."

"I do n't want 'em to go quite so soon as that. They 'll go fast enough for me if they last a few years longer."

"You want to get a little more out of 'em first, do n't you, uncle? So do I; but I do n't know how it 's to be done. Mine raised me just a hundred bushels of corn this year; not enough to feed the horses."

"A hundred bushels? That 's pretty well. I 've got thirteen able to work, and I did n't get quite sixty bushels for myself, and I 'm sure they hav' n't got enough to last them into May."

After supper he showed me the prospectus of an emigrant aid society which it is proposed to establish in Charleston. Land-owners are invited to take shares in the stock of the company, paying for them in money or in land, and European emigrants are to be induced to settle in South Carolina, and purchase or lease farms from the society, which will pay out dividends to its stock-holders from the funds thus accruing. If the scheme should obtain the sanction of the Legislature, and some aid from the State, he proposed to subscribe for as many shares as he could pay for with five thousand acres of rice land. His cotton plantation he intended to divide into small farms, and to make his former slaves tenants upon it, they to pay him as rent one-third of their cotton crop and two bushels of corn to the acre. He had no intention of attempting to carry on planting with free negro labor. By the time affairs were a little settled, so that he could get rid of his negroes, he hoped to be able to get German tenants or laborers. As to the stock farm, he would attend to that himself. In the spring of 1863 he had over five hundred head of cattle; he believed that to-day he had n't more than a hundred and fifty. At the same time he sheared three hundred and seventy sheep, and it was doubtful if he had a hundred and twenty-five left. The Backwoods People all had a gun and a dog, and they had been living at the expense of the cattle and sheep in the woods, and they were expecting to do the same for the next two years. Perhaps by close attention he might be able to prevent such wholesale destruction. At any rate, watching cattle would be less vexatious and unprofitable than trying to drive free niggers.

In the morning, while we were waiting for breakfast, we sat in the piazza, and seeing two human skulls in a corner, I asked if there was any story connected with them.

"Yes, sir," he said, "they belonged to two d—d robbers who got their deserts at my hands one morning in May last. General Gillmore, you know, sent out a raiding expedition under Brown and Potter just before the time of Johnston's surrender. They stripped the country of mules and horses and every description of property, and, of course, they encountered little or no resistance, so that some of our colored friends in Georgetown began to think stealing from what they called a 'reb' was a safe and profitable business. I think it was about the 15th of May—hostilities had ceased, at any rate—when a party of something like twenty came out of Georgetown, and, going further up into this district, began plundering the plantations. When they had got all the horses and carts they could drive, and loaded them down with plunder, they started back. But they did n't all get back. I thought we 'd stood enough of that kind of thing; so I got some of my neighbors together; we armed ourselves, and pursued. There were about twenty of them, and only six of us, but I knew we could rout them. I did n't follow too close. I knew the country perfectly, and I wanted to get them where there was no bog or swamp for them to take to. When I had them in the right spot, we closed in at a canter. They showed fight, sir, but 't was no use. We scattered them easily. Seven of them fell, five of the seven killed on the spot. That fellow, you see, never knew what hurt him."

He handed me one of the skulls as he spoke, and pointed to a hole made by a pistol bullet. I asked how he had prepared the trophies; if he had removed the flesh by boiling.

"No, sir," he replied; "we let them lie where they fell, and the weather prepared them. I did n't bring them in till August."

Leaving the house of this gentleman, a ride of seven miles brought me to the Santee River. The water was so low that the ferry-boat, or scow, could not ply at the regular place of crossing, and for nearly a mile I was obliged to flounder through the tenacious mud of a cypress swamp, my horse often sinking above his knees in the slimy mire and ooze.

At noon I stopped and gave my horse a feed, more for the sake of talking with the people who sold it to me than for any other reason, for they were such as might serve very well as samples of the poor white population of South Carolina. Their house was a poor log cabin, standing alone in the solitude of the pine woods, and around was a little clearing of an acre or two of sand, in which had been made an ill-rewarded attempt to raise a few rows of corn. There was no furniture in the one room which served for all the uses of the family, except a bench and two dirty beds. The children were puny, unwholesome-looking creatures, with tangled whitish hair and complexions of a dingy straw color. All gathered round me and stared while the horse was eating, but to all my remarks and questions the reply was silence or answers as nearly monosyllabic as possible, and I gave up the attempt to draw them into conversation and rode on my way.

At night I stayed at the house of an aged couple, the husband being eighty-two years old and almost childish. He was a poor man, his wife said, who had begun life as a laborer. Then he had risen to be an overseer, and by dint of hard work and close saving had been able to buy himself a small farm and to stock it with five or six negroes. But now he was poor again, and had been obliged to work as hard this season as he ever worked forty years ago. Emancipation had taken away all his laborers, and, as if that was not enough, Potter's raiding party had camped beside them for a whole week, and had carried off his mules and horses. She did n't know why the Yankees done her so bad, for she never harmed one of 'em. There was a heap of Yankee storekeepers in Charleston, and she had always preferred to trade with 'em and had never spoken bad of their nation. But they took away everything they wanted, and dug up the yard to see if she had n't buried silver or a watch or some jewelry. She thanked God that Sherman did n't come that way, for they told her if he had she would n't have had her house left.

On the following morning I was awakened by the rain pattering on the roof of my chamber, and it continued to pour steadily down all day, so that the last forty miles of my journey to this city I performed without stopping at any house by the way, and without seeing much more of the country than the muddy road just before me.

ENGLAND.—THE NEW MINISTRY.

LONDON, October 26, 1865.

ON Saturday the first cabinet council of the new Ministry is to be held, as it was considered indecorous for the ministers to meet in council before their late Premier was buried. Considering that they have been meeting privately and semi-officially from the day on which he died, this pretext appears to me rather unsatisfactory. The real truth I take to be, is that any delay was welcome to Earl Russell at the present conjuncture. Public opinion was strongly in favor of his being called upon to supply Lord Palmerston's place; but then this was because the public regards the expedient of a Russell-Gladstone Ministry itself as a convenient temporary arrangement. Very naturally, Earl Russell does not take the same view of the subject, and hopes to form a government which shall not only secure him a continuance of official power, but re-gild his somewhat tarnished reputation. I do not say that the task is an impossible one, but the chances are terribly against it. Taken by himself alone, Earl Russell is just the sort of man who in ordinary times might aspire to a long lease of the premiership. His early connection with the Edinburgh Reviewers gave him a reputation for ability which has stood him in good stead throughout his career. He is a man of fair, though not first-class, talents, and of good parliamentary experience. Circumstances have connected his name with the great questions of our days. Though by nature the most aristocratic of Whigs, and that is saying a good deal, yet he has enough of the popularity-hunter element about him to make him acceptable on the hustings and at Exeter Hall meetings. He has all those prejudices which are common to all classes of Englishmen; his private life has always been eminently decorous; and, above all, and before all, he is supported by the whole influence of the great house of Bedford. It is this which has caused his success throughout life, and will make him a power in the state to the end. It is strange how immense, even at the present day, is the political power of our great governing families. The present Duke of Bedford is a complete cypher. For some cause or other, about which there have been many rumors, he leads a most retired life, and is scarcely known even to his own tenantry. But, for all this, the Bedford influence in and out of Parliament is an element which must be taken into consideration in every political calculation. Now, on this influence Earl Russell can rely securely; and, therefore, though his own class dislike him, though his party distrusts him, and though the country has no ardent attachment for him, he might, I think, reckon on a long lease of power, if it were not for the absolute necessity of taking Mr. Gladstone for his colleague.

The relations of these two men, and their respective importance, seem to me to illustrate the mixed composition of our Government, which in one sense is the most aristocratic in the world, and in another is perhaps the most popular. You can hardly exaggerate the importance, politically speaking, of belonging to one of our great houses. The mere fact of so belonging will give a young man of ordinary capacity, like the Marquis of Hartington, a standing and position which a self-made man could not acquire till his hairs were grey. But, on the other hand, when once a politician with us has got hold of the public mind, all the aristocratic influences in the country cannot unseat him. All the Russells, and Howards, and Grosvenors, and Stanleys put together could have done nothing against Lord Palmerston nor Sir Robert Peel, nor could they effect much against Mr. Gladstone. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is the son of a Liverpool trader; he is not even connected by marriage with the aristocracy; he is a man of no large fortune; he has no power of returning a single member for Parliament, nor of influencing a single election except by the weight of his reputation. And yet he is so strong in the esteem of the country that he can dictate his own terms as to the composition of any ministry he chooses to join. Earl Russell has had to ask him what office he would choose to accept, and to offer him the position for which, in the Premier's opinion, he was best fitted. It has been said that the Government of Turkey is a despotism, limited by the right of popular revolution. I should say that our Government was an oligarchy, limited by a right of popular nomination to the ranks of the oligarchy.

Thus the new cabinet will have, in fact, two heads. The Ministry could not live a week with Mr. Gladstone in opposition to it. I doubt if it can live many months with Mr. Gladstone in coalition with it. Lord Russell might truly say of his chief colleague: "Nec sine te nec cum te vivere possum." Mr. Gladstone cannot now be the second personage in a cabinet: and yet I extremely doubt the Premier's being willing to content himself with endorsing the policy of the leader of the Lower House. Moreover, even if he could submit to do so for the sake of the honor of being Prime Minister of England, it is not likely that men like Lord Clarendon, Earl Granville, and the Duke of Somerset would accept patiently the supremacy of a colleague who was nominally their equal. Then, too, it is most difficult to see how Mr. Gladstone can lead the House of Commons unsupported as he is at present. Lord Palmerston, during the latter years of his premiership, filled up the chief offices of the cabinet with peers, partly because it was convenient to do so, still more because he liked accumulating the whole business of representing the Government in the Lower House in his own hands. The ministers for war, foreign affairs, the colonies, and the post-office all sit in the Upper House. So also will the President of the Council and the Premier. Thus, if things remain as they are, Mr. Gladstone will be left to lead the House of Commons single-handed, without the benefit of Lord Palmerston's extraordinary tact and personal popularity. Upon the Treasury bench at present there is really nobody who can render him any effective aid. Sir Charles Wood, Sir George Grey, and Mr. Milner Gibson are all of second-rate calibre, and have no power of effective speaking. Sir George Grey has the advantage of looking, in popular phrase, "every inch a gentleman;" but though this goes a long way with the House of Commons, it is not sufficient to compensate for an unhappy knack of always saying the wrong thing at the wrong time. Mr. Layard is probably the ablest of the Treasury subordinates; and, on foreign subjects, the House listens to him with respect. Sir Roundell Palmer, too, is a high authority on legal matters, and he is, moreover, one of the few personal adherents of whom the Chancellor of the Exchequer can boast. Still in debating powers the Government in the Lower House will, as at present constituted, be decidedly inferior to the opposition. The speaking power of the liberal majority is to be found amongst the non-ministerial members. It will, therefore, be necessary to strengthen the Treasury benches by the introduction of outsiders. The question from which section of the majority these recruits are to be taken is a very important one. If the Whig influence carries the day, Mr. Lowe, or Mr. Bernal Osborne, or some other of the "tried reformers," who are known not to be dangerous on trial, will be added to the Ministry If however, the counsels which Mr. Gladstone is understood to have given are accepted, an attempt will be made to strengthen the Government by obtaining recruits from the ranks of the advanced liberals; and, in this case, Messrs. Forster and Stansfeld would be the candidates selected. But these gentlemen would not, I believe, accept office—or if they did accept it would bring no strength with them—unless the Government pledges itself to initiate a policy of reform.

I do not feel convinced, in spite of the reports current on the subject, that Mr. Gladtone himself has made the introduction of a reform bill next session a sine quâ non of continuing in office. He may reasonably enough hold that the Russell administration cannot last any time, and that if it breaks down by its inherent weakness, not by his defection, the country will then demand his accession to supreme power. The truth is, that the demand for his assuming the premiership at present would have been irresistible, had it not been for a lingering want of perfect confidence in Mr. Gladstone on the part of the public. If, throughout his public career, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has done many brilliant things, he has done also many foolish things; and the recollection of the latter diminishes the public respect for the former. The country cannot forget his dallyings with the Puseyite party, nor has it lost recollection of the mess that Mr. Gladstone got us into through his phil-Hellene vagaries in the Ionian Islands. Nor, above all, has it forgotten his most unfortunate speech about the Southern Confederacy. The very party which approved most cordially of the speech at the time it was delivered make it a charge against the Chancellor now. And I think most justly so. Success was the only thing that could have mitigated the imprudence and impolicy of such words spoken by a man occupying his position. His friends say that he only made a mistake which nine-tenths of his countrymen made also. So it was; but still a man who aspires to govern the country ought not to make such mistakes; and, above all, ought not to pledge himself to them without the slightest necessity. The very earnestness of Mr. Gladstone's nature makes him liable to do, or still more to say, imprudent things. It would be well for him if he would ake to mind one of Lord Palmerston's sayings: "In this country," he once said to a friend, "it does not matter a d—— what you do, it is not of so much consequence what you say; but it is the devil and all if you write anything."

Meanwhile, there are evident symptoms of renewed activity in the opposition ranks. The calculation of the leaders is, that the new cabinet will either break to pieces through dissensions among its members, or that it will fail through the introduction of a reform bill. If any genuine extension of the franchise is proposed, it is thought the Palmerstonian Liberals will join the opposition; if the measure is only a pretence, the advanced Liberals will unite in throwing out the Government. All such calculations are very problematical. But still as in fact, though not in name, the majority of the House of Commons are opposed to any rapid change in our institutions, I believe that before long we shall have a Tory anti-reform ministry in office. Till we have passed through this phase, I myself have no hope of any real reform.

The non-political news of the week is small. In spite of the change of the weather to wind, rain, and frost, the Rinderpest goes on spreading. However, the cholera has not appeared, so I suppose we are safe from it till next summer. The only other piece of intelligence I think worth recording is, that "Gladiateur," the great French horse who has carried every race before him since the Derby, has at last been beaten. In the Cambridgeshire stakes he ran with the enormous weight of nine stone twelve pounds, while the ground was heavy and soaked with wet. He struggled most gallantly, but failed to accomplish a task which no horse, I believe, ever yet has done. However, the British sporting public are pleased to find that the "Frenchman" is not invincible. The plain truth is, in spite of all the nonsense that has been written about "Waterloo" being avenged at Epsom, that "Gladiateur" was no more a French horse than Mr. Thackeray—as he observed of himself—was a Hindoo because he was born at Calcutta. "Gladiateur" was got out of English horses, trained by English trainers, and ridden by English jockeys. He was born across the channel, and his owner is a Frenchman. That is all.

A FRAGMENT OF IRISH MILITARY HISTORY.

[The following document has been handed to us for publication by a Mr. Zacharie, who lays claim to the good fortune of being the "seventh son of a seventh son," and therefore gifted with "second sight." He professes in virtue of the possession of this faculty to be exempt from the necessity under which ordinary historians labor of waiting till events have happened in order to describe them, or till documents are written in order to reproduce them. The genuineness of the subjoined report rests on his authority, and what the value of this is the reader must determine for himself.]

[official report.]

Headquarters Expeditionary Forces,
April 1, 1870.

Colonel: I have the honor to submit the following report of the victorious operations of the army under my command in the late disastrous attempt to achieve the independence of my oppressed native land:

Under the instructions contained in "Special Order No. 3,307" I proceeded to the organization and recruitment of the forces composing the expeditionary corps. In obedience to the expressed wishes of the Senate, that the proposed landing should remain a profound secret, I issued to my countrymen and the American public a call for volunteers, in which I fully explained the nature of the enterprise. Within the incredibly short space of three months I recruited my forces to their maximum strength, viz.: 200 men for the infantry, 50 for the cavalry, and 25 for the artillery. In this arduous duty I was assisted by the staff-officers detailed from headquarters—Surgeon O'Cuttle; Capt. Maguire, A.A.A.G.; Lieut. O'Shale, A.D.C.; and Col. O'Toole, Asst. Commissary-General. The tact and energy displayed by these gentlemen enabled me to confine my attention exclusively to those important details so necessary to the success of secret military operations. The mustering in of the enlisted men was proceeded with at the rate of one per day. I regret, however, to complain of the tardiness of the quartermaster's department, although I presume the equipment of the boys was effected with as much rapidity as was consistent with official propriety.

The choice of a proper base of supplies was, as you are aware, a source of ore solicitude and anxiety. Thanks, however, to the experience gained under that great leader who conducted the "Peninsular Campaign" against Richmond, I was enabled to act with a sagacity and circumspection that otherwise might have been productive of untoward results. Various localities on the American coast were suggested as suitable for our purposes, but, after a mature consideration of the distinct merits of each, I selected the town of ———, in the State of New Jersey. Three sound military reasons influenced me in this decision: 1st, The place was in direct communication by rail with the city of New York; 2d, It was totally inaccessible except to schooners of very light draught; 3d, It was not to be found upon the existing maps of the country.

My first care was to provide transportation for the infantry, cavalry, and artillery. This was an affair of no small importance, for not only was it necessary to elude the vigilance of the American authorities, but likewise those of Great Britain. I determined, in view of the many embarrassments, to divide the infantry, and despatch one-half in plain clothes by rail, at the rate of one man per day, and the balance, disguised as laborers, by the regular line of sloop packets. To each man of the first division I gave an excursion ticket and a railway guide. To each individual of the second I furnished a pocket compass, with the needle securely fastened at the southwest, in order to point out the course the vessel should steer, and to prevent treachery on the part of the captain. The cavalry I dismounted, as, although horses had never been given them, they considered themselves mounted. As the force consisted of but six men, I transformed them into pedlars and ordered them to march by parallel roads—to divert suspicion—and to concentrate at a signal agreed upon. The artillery—a 6-pound mountain howitzer—was a source of galling anxiety. In my dilemma I consulted with Surgeon O'Cuttle, who, with remarkable quickness, suggested that the gun be packed in a metallic coffin, and the wheels boxed and shipped as furniture. The surgeon overcame the difficulties of the burial certificate, and kindly volunteered to see the right arm of the service safely to its destination. My plans for the transportation of the troops to the designated rendezvous having been well conceived and executed, they were brought to a successful issue. I was thus enabled to give my exclusive attention to the next great military question, viz., the securing of a proper vessel for the conveyance of the expedition across the Atlantic to the Irish coast. To invite competition and avoid publicity, I issued proposals through the daily papers stating the nature of the service to be performed. I received but one answer, and that from the commander of the schooner Pompous, 170 tons, who expressed great interest in our cause, and his willingness, for a proper recompense, to accept the hazardous contract. The necessary papers were forthwith stamped and signed, and the preparations commenced to transfer the clothing, ammunition, and provisions to the hold of the vessel. This most delicate duty I entrusted to Col. O'Mahara Borru, who performed it to his own and my very great satisfaction. I surmounted the difficulties of a clearance at the New York Custom-house, as you will see by "Exhibit 77,093," and "Receipted voucher 8,808," for ten million dollars in bonds of the Republic, and two hundred dollars in United States currency.

It now behooved me to embark with myself and staff, Brig.-Gen. O'Fraggerty, A.A.G.; and chief of staff, Col. O'Mahara Borru, A.D.C.; Surgeon O'Cuttle, medical director; and Col. Flapcracker, C.S. Subsequent to my departure I telegraphed Col. O'Toole, in charge of commissary stores in New Jersey, that I was about to proceed to the rendezvous, and ordering the concentration of the various detachments which, to avoid suspicion, had been scattered here and there about the country. I also ordered the purchase of three hundred untanned calf-skins. The embarkation of myself and staff was effected quietly and without ostentation. As soon as we reached the vessel's deck, the captain pushed out into the stream and made sail. Baffling head-winds detained us in the lower bay, but after many vexatious delays we arrived in safety at our base of supplies. Our entire success depended upon an absolute secrecy. Every indication suggestive of the service in which the vessel was engaged was, therefore, removed, and, as a precautionary measure, I ordered my staff to retain the captain and crew on board the Pompous, while I landed, in plain clothes, to confer with Col. MacWhorter. To dull suspicion I entered the warehouse and purchased a bunch of onions. While in the act of receiving the vegetables from the colonel and commissary of subsistence, I gave the countersign "Erin." We retired to the private office, where the following arrangements were completed, namely: The troops having been concentrated, they would be held in readiness to embark at the signal of a rocket fired from the schooner's deck; the Colonel O'Toole to remain in charge of the base of supplies; requisitions for stores to be made, in cases of urgent necessity, via Atlantic Telegraph Cable, a schooner to be kept in readiness to depart at a moment's notice with the needful supplies. I bade the colonel farewell and returned to the Pompous. At 8 P.M. the signal agreed upon was made, and the boats left the schooner's sides to embark the troops. This service was performed with great rapidity, so that at roll-call, at 9 P.M., 200 infantry, 50 cavalry, and 25 artillerists responded to their names. Our complement was now complete, and with one wild Celtic yell we weighed anchor and made sail for the broad Atlantic.

Thirty miles out at sea I opened the "sealed orders" that were prepared under my direction at the general headquarters. I was surprised to find that my staff, as well as a majority of the troops, were familiar with their contents. Our destination was Dingle Bay, on the south-western coast of Ireland.

Three days after leaving the land the weather became somewhat boisterous and the troops sick, with symptoms of mutiny. I immediately caused a special order—No. 1—to be prepared, which, upon being read to the men, produced the desired effect. Up to the thirty-ninth day the voyage passed without incident of importance. The infantry, when the weather permitted, was exercised in brigade drill, and when the sea was calm Col. O'Mahara Borru, A.D.C., practised the cavalry—dismounted—on the main boom of the vessel in the art of attaining a perfect seat. I cannot too cordially recommend to commanders of future sea expeditions this novel mode of exercising the horse soldier. It not only gives him self-reliance, but likewise a firmness and tenacity of muscle highly conducive to a thorough effectiveness. For obvious reasons artillery practice was dispensed with; in its stead, and in order to keep up the artillerists in their drill, Brig.-Gen. O'Fraggerty, A.A.G. and chief of staff, exercised them at the ship's pumps.

On the morning of the fortieth day out, when about six hundred miles from the Irish coast, H.B.M.S. Liverpool hove in sight. I made instant preparations to meet the anticipated danger. I had caused, as I have already mentioned, a number of untanned calf-skins to be purchased and placed on board the expeditionary vessel. These were so arranged as to serve as a means of concealment for the men, and at the same time produce the effect of forming a portion of the cargo. The steamer fired a gun and lowered a boat, but ere it touched the water my troops were all perdus in the hold of the schooner. In consideration of the issues involved in the preservation of my life and the safety of my person from capture, I did not think it a degradation to conceal myself with my staff in a cask already entirely filled with hams. In view of the extraordinary circumstances of the case, and of the instructions prepared by me at general headquarters in New York, I felt justified in acting as I did. I consider this explanation due to the brave army I had the honor to command. The English officers boarded the Pompous, but the captain was prepared with a manifest, for expenses of obtaining which please see "Exhibit No. 73,778," and "Receipted voucher No. 8,809," for two hundred dollars. The brutal Saxons returned to their ship, raging with hunger and disappointment.

The fiftieth day after cutting loose from our base of supplies in New Jersey we sighted Dingle Bay. Within a few hours we passed in without molestation, and anchored under the lee of Rossbey Point. Our arrival attracted but little attention, the inhabitants evidently laboring under the delusion that our vessel was merely an American trader come in to make a harbor. At 9 P.M. I ordered the disembarkation of the troops and matériel, a delicate operation most successfully performed. We advanced without opposition upon Carra, a small village about three miles distant. Of this place we took undisputed possession, much to the surprise of the inhabitants, who were prepared to greet us as if we were a party of harmless fishermen. Our paper "promises to pay" quickly undeceived them, and without more ado they assumed a position of hostility and defiance.

I was not long in deciding in my own mind that we should need reinforcements. I intimated as much to my chief-of-staff, who concurred in my opinions. Without, however, waiting for the proper permission, that officer proceeded to the telegraph station, and forwarded a message to New York, via London and the Atlantic Telegraph Cable, asking urgently for help. As soon as I learned of the unpardonable blunder committed by my subordinate, I hastened to the telegraph office and despatched, via the same route, the folowing telegram: "General O'Fraggerty is mistaken. I do not need reinforcements. I have one hundred and fifty effective men, and I can hold my own against any force." I have since learned that the clerks in the electric company's offices no sooner detected the purport of the two despatches, than they immediately violated the oath of secrecy and communicated with the British Government officials. In view of the hostile attitude of the inhabitants of Carra, I thought it expedient to order up the artillery. After much delay this was accomplished, and the piece planted so as to command the streets of the village. This precautionary measure was productive of good results, at least it cleared my immediate front of the threatening peasantry. I now sent out foragers in search of horses for the cavalry, and at the same time despatched a peremptory order to the captain of the Pompous to hold himself in readiness for any emergency. The mariner evidently misconstrued my command, for he hove up his anchor and stood out to sea. My foragers met with good success, as they shortly returned with a large number of serviceable animals. I now threw out pickets, and established the posts for the night. The artillery I ordered to occupy its present position until morning, when the whole army would advance upon Killorglin, a village about twelve miles distant. The occupation of this place would secure the protection of my front, while my flank would be guarded respectively by the Magillicuddy's Reeks and Dingle Bay. The enemy evacuated the town at our approach, and we took immediate possession of the abandoned works, which consisted of the common fences of the country. The capture of this impregnable position enabled me to await with calmness the onset of the savage foe. On the morning of the third day of our occupation of Killorglin, my cavalry pickets were driven in by overwhelming numbers. I allowed the enemy to approach within about fourteen yards of my works, when, at the word of command, the troops delivered a terrific fire, which, however, failed to check the advance of the insolent minions. As they still continued to push forward, I again gave the order to fire, which was instantly obeyed, but with the same mortifying results as on the previous occasion. Determined to learn the cause of the harmlessness of our shots, I despatched Col. O'Maharra Borru, A.D.C., to the front, with orders to investigate the affair. Upon his return, he reported that through the carelessness of the ordnance officer in New York the army was provided with nothing but blank cartridges, and that the artillery ammunition was of the same quality.

. . . . . .

In my desire to save a further effusion of blood and to stop all needless carnage, I sent out a flag of truce; but the insolent and bloodthirsty Britons treated it with disrespect and ordered us to "surrender without conditions." I was forced to accept the terms; but, contrary to all the usages of modern warfare, no sooner had we laid down our arms than the "constabulary" rushed in upon us and manacled one and all without regard to rank or condition. I regret to report the loss of all our matériel, artillery, arms, clothing, colors, provisions, ammunition, and stores of every description. It gives me great pleasure, however, to state that we did not lose a man, either killed or wounded, but I am sorry to add that the enemy was equally fortunate. I have called the engagement the "Battle of Killorglin," and I suggest that the Senate permit the survivors of this ill-fated expedition to inscribe upon their colors the words "Killorglin."

In conclusion, I beg to call your attention to some of the causes of the failure of the attempt to achieve the independence of our native land. First, The force was unequal to the work required of it. Second, An entire ignorance of the country. Previous to the sailing of the expedition I was informed that Ireland was flat, open, and unfavorable for the movements of cavalry. To my surprise I found it densely wooded, hilly, and well suited to horse men. I would suggest that in future we endeavor to gain our information from Irishmen rather than from books. Third, It will ever be a waste of time and money to attempt the liberation of Ireland unless we are able to equip, feed, and clothe an army of five hundred thousand veterans, and sustain an enormous and effective iron-clad fleet. Fourth, The English Government is stupidly obstinate, determined, and powerful, while the great mass of the Irish people is indifferent to our cause.

The strict seclusion in which I now find myself will prevent my acceptance of a future command.

I have the honor, colonel, to subscribe myself,

Your very obedient servant,

MAURICE FITZPATRICK O'SHAUGHENESSEY,
Maj.-Gen. Commdg. Expeditionary Forces.

THE O'RORKE, Colonel and A.A.G., Irish Republican Army, New Jersey.

Literature.

LITERARY NOTES.

THE Rev. C. Merivale, the historian of Imperial Rome, is continuing his studies on the effect of the Christian element in civilization and the world's progress by a new series of the Boyle Lectures for the present year—"The Conversion of the Northern Nations" forming a companion to his late volume, "The Conversion of the Roman Empire," republished by Messrs. D. Appleton & Co. In this latter work he came in competition with Gibbon, Milman, and other authors who had incidentally treated the subject; but in the forthcoming lectures he enters on a field scarcely touched by any English writer, except by Mr. Maclear in his valuable "History of Christian Missions during the Middle Ages," a Cambridge prize essay, published in 1863. The Boyle Lectures are delivered in accordance with an endowment bequeathed by the Hon. Robert Boyle ("the father of modern chemistry and brother of the Earl of Corke"). For the first fifty years after their establishment in 1691 they were regarded with great interest, being preached by men like Dr.

Samuel Clarke, Whiston, Bentley, etc., and were considered to afford the best defence of revealed religion ever produced. In the last century they suffered from the general deadness that prevailed in ecclesiastical matters during the era of George III., and were only occasionally printed at long intervals. A reviving impulse was given by the choice of Rev. F. D. Maurice as lecturer in 1847, when he delivered his course on "The Religions of the World in Connection with Christianity," and the lectures bid fair to resume their ancient reputation under men of Mr. Merivale's class.

—If our publishers could spare time from the herculean task of manufacturing books for the South and Western country sufficient to look around them for new speculations, they would find a lively and pleasant work, that would meet with a ready sale, on "Shooting and Fishing in the Rivers, Prairies, and Backwoods of America," by a French sportsman, Benedict Henry Revoil, editor of the Journal des Chasseurs, just translated and published by a friend in an English dress, in 2 vols. post 8vo. Mr. Revoil's preface relates how he resided for nine years in the United States, during which time his love of field sports was continually tempting him away from civilized districts to desert wilds and distant frontiers in search of birds and beasts unknown to the annals of European sport. The freedom from the restraints that guard the animals of chase in the Old World quite intoxicated him on his arrival in America, and he naïvely recounts his surprise at being brought before a country justice at Hastings-on-the-Hudson, with eleven woodcocks in his pocket, for which he would have had to pay a fine of fifty-six dollars—because they were shot during the breeding season, on June 25, in contravention of the laws of New York—unless he could prove satisfactorily that, as a foreigner, he was ignorant of the laws. As it was, he escaped with the confiscation of his game, "which (he says) the judge's clerk, I afterwards learnt, made into a capital pie." Mr. Revoil's sketches range from the buffaloes of the North-west to the alligators of Florida, from the whale and cod fisheries of Labrador and Newfoundland to the "blind gudgeons of the mammoth cave of Kentucky." They show unvarying good humor and skill in sprightly narrative, worthy of competing with the best English or American writers of the sporting school.

—All who were afraid that romance would vanish and the varying rainbow of fancy die away at the march of science and the screech of the locomotive, may be re-assured of the vitality inherent to "Folk Lore" by the appearance of two handsome volumes, "Popular Romances of the West of England, or the Drolls, Traditions, and Superstitions of Old Cornwall." Incongruously enough, the collector and chronicler of these fragments of a former world of belief that still linger in the minds of the peasantry, is Robert Hunt, F.R.S., editor of Dr. Ure's scientific dictionary, and connected with the School of Mines and the Cornwall Polytechnic Society. Thirty-five years since, inspired by the recollections of childhood, he commenced collecting the genuine household tales of the people amongst whom he was brought up, in the identical language in which they were related. The result is before us in as large and curious a gathering as has ever been united in one work, of traditions arrayed under the heads of "Giants, Fairies, Mermaids, Lost Cities, Fire Worship, Demons and Spectres, Death Superstitions, Holy Wells, Sorcery and Witchcraft," etc., etc. With the partiality of a discoverer, Mr. Hunt claims for the giants of Cornwall a "character peculiarly their own; they were true Celts, fond of home, and we have no record of their ever having passed beyond the wilds of Dartmoor." The Cornish fairies, he admits, "do not exhibit the same marked individuality." The wandering minstrel and story-teller has only vanished before the newspaper and penny magazine within twenty years; from the two last of their race some of Mr. Hunt's stories are derived. To Sir Walter Scott or Jacob Grimm few books could have afforded a greater treat than Mr. Hunt's popular romances, and they have an ethnological value in completing the cycle of Celtic popular fiction, already illustrated as it exists in the Western Highlands of Scotland, Ireland, Wales, and Brittany, by the labors of J. F. Campbell, Crofton Croker, Keightley, Villemarqué, and Emil Souvestre.

—Mr. Gladstone's Address, delivered before the University of Edinburgh on the 3d of this month, is just issued by Mr. Murray. One of the leading ideas most dwelt on is that "among the auxiliaries required to complete the training process for our race," some were needed, "I will not say as a corrective to Christianity, but as a corrective to the narrow views and the excesses which might follow on certain modes of conceiving and applying it." These correctives Mr. Gladstone finds in the value attached in Greece to physical beauty and physical training of all kinds, and its counteraction to the asceticism of the church, which included all things material as under a curse, and at war with the supposed Christian duty of abstraction from worldly pleasures and interests. The connection of the mythology of Greece with some primitive form of patriarchal revelation, it will be remembered, is a favorite theory of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's "Homer and the Homeric Age," and he evidently prefers to dwell on the resemblances and harmonies discoverable between the two systems in the beneficent spirit of a philosopher, rather than to exaggerate their discrepancies with the unreasoning ardor of a zealot, as was formerly the fashion.

—Dr. Rowland Williams, the boldest, if not the most prudent and politic, among the writers of the once famous "Essays and Reviews," has in press an important work on Biblical criticism, "The Hebrew Prophets translated afresh from the Original Tongue, with constant reference to the Anglican Version and with Illustrations for English Readers." By a novelty of arrangement it is intended to distribute the prophets chronologically according to the three or four great Eastern empires to which they refer, giving, first, a translation; secondly, critical variations; thirdly, a running paraphrase which will occasionally swell into a commentary; and, lastly, an introduction to each prophet. The first part, constructed on this plan, is devoted to the prophets during the Assyrian Empire, and will contain Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Hosea, Micah, Isaiah (to chapter 39), and Nahum. This is now in press and will shortly appear, to be followed in due course by the succeeding volumes. Dr. Rowland Williams's scholarship is allowed by those who are most offended by his want of orthodoxy. It would seem that one good accruing from present disputes will be to direct attention to Hebrew learning and literature, so shamefully neglected of late years in England.

—Though the original application of photography to the purposes of book illustration was made in New York, by Mr. G. P. Putnam, by the introduction of photographic views in his "Homes of American Statesmen," the art has never been made available for this object here to anything like the extent that prevails in Europe. This is the more remarkable from the fact that our photographic artists rank among the first in the world, if, indeed, they do not alone form the very highest class itself. Among the embellished volumes got up for the nearly approaching Christmas and holiday season in England no less than eight are illustrated entirely by photographs. Two of them relate to the "prince of painters"—"The Great Works of Raphael, a series of Twenty Photographs of his most Celebrated Paintings," with his life by Vasari, and a complete list of his authenticated works by Passavant, published by Messrs. Bell & Daldy; and "Christianity in the Cartoons, referred to artistic treatment and historic fact," illustrated with twelve photographs and four plates, by W. W. Lloyd, issued by Messrs. Williams & Norgate; another is "Salvator Mundi: Photographic Illustrations by Great Painters of the Life of Christ, with brief Meditations in Prose and Verse selected from Great Divines," by Messrs. Seeley. The other works of this class are Scott's "Marmion" and "Lady of the Lake," with photographic illustrations of the scenery of the poems; and "Flemish Relics: Architectural, Legendary, and Pictorial," and "The Ruined Abbeys of the Scottish Border" and of "Yorkshire," embellished by the same process. So great are the advantages for the representation of many classes of subjects, as, notably, elaborate architectural views, afforded by photography, that it has entirely supplanted line engraving for that purpose. The art that produced the beautiful engravings that illustrated Britton's "English Cathedrals" and other similar works is now entirely disused, if not quite extinct, and it is probable that in a few years they could not be executed by any living artist.

—The Spectator, generally candid and impartial in its critical judgments, has a review of Hon. Henry J. Raymond's "Life, Public Services, and State Papers of Abraham Lincoln" that shows a comprehension of the true character of the man and his work almost unique among foreign journals. The book itself is warmly commended. The reviewer says: "We have seldom read a book with a profounder and more unflagging interest, for it really contains the history of the greatest revolution of this century—perhaps in any century—compressed into, and absolutely identified with, the life of one man. Not a single state paper, scarce even a telegraphic despatch, is to be found that is not stamped deep with the impression of a mind at once singularly representative and singularly personal. Mr. Lincoln's mind was a political transparency, in which the nation could see an individual character of great power working out the problems set before them all, working them out slowly, indeed, but upon a method in which they all felt the most perfect confidence; working them, too, with a sincerity that was unmixed with the faintest pretension, and showing evidence of a long and patient, rather than passionate, grappling of his powerful intellect with the difficulties of each question presented to him—evidences which must have touched as well as convinced the great people who followed so anxiously the slow tentative progress of his thought. No wonder that such a man, thinking intensely, and thinking aloud, as it were, for five years, in all sorts of public manifestos and addresses, should have carried the best thought of America with him as no man has ever carried it yet."

—The new work by the Emperor of the French, "On the Policy of France in Algeria," was published on the 10th of the month at Paris. It is the result of the late Imperial visit to that dependency, and foreshadows a change of measures in the administration tending to promote the progressive advance of the Arab race, as shown in the duties and responsibilities of local government. The book is a small quarto, printed at the Imperial press, and takes the shape of a letter addressed to Marshal MacMahon, Duke of Magenta.

—The organ of the publishing trade in London gives but a doleful account of the present state of the commerce of literature, apparently difficult to reconcile with the undoubted activity of the press. It says: "While the cotton, the iron, the woollen, and the stationery trades, in common with most others, have, during the past twenty years, increased in a ratio perfectly marvellous, the book trade, on the contrary, has made but small progress. The number of country booksellers is, if anything, smaller than it was twenty years ago, and is scarcely larger in London with its three millions than it was when the population was one million less. Reading is on the increase, but book-buying is not. The race of intelligent booksellers is dying out, and there are no new men coming forward to take their places. The trade was formerly of the most reputable description, the bookseller ranking next to a professional man, while his shop was the resort of the rank and intelligence of the locality. Book-buyers consulted him about additions to their libraries, and he, knowing the tastes of his customers, took care to lay in a stock of such books as they were likely to choose. This he does no longer," etc. One reason for the change is attributed to the systematic practice of underselling, the prevalence of which has destroyed the confidence between the seller and the buyer, and allows unprincipled and dishonest parties to fatally injure the trade without benefiting themselves. A committee of the most respectable houses has been formed to investigate the subject, and to propose such means as they may consider adapted to elevate bookselling as a business to its former standing.

—Mr. Tristram, a well-known naturalist, who has published books of travel on Syria and on the African Zahara, is engaged to furnish to the publications of the Ray Society a distinct volume on the "Natural History of Palestine." Though a country which exhibits in such a remarkable manner the various species of so many climates, yielding to the naturalist, in the neighborhood of the Dead Sea, the plants of the tropics, while arctic birds hover round the heights of Hermon, it has, hitherto, been almost a terra incognita to scientific observers, and more important illustrations of the Scriptures may be expected in this department than in any other branch of enquiry.

—The original designs, drawings, and writings of Leonardo da Vinci are among the choicest treasures of the Royal Library at Windsor Castle. It was the habit of that great man to set down indiscriminately the results of his studies in art and researches in physical science in note-books and loose sheets, sketches and drawings intermingled with remarks, etc., written backward with the left hand, so as to read more easily when reflected in a mirror than in any other way. The English collection comprises about two hundred detached sheets, and a further portion of Leonardo's manuscripts are in the Imperial Library at Paris. Some extracts were published from them by Venturi, so remarkable in substance that even the cautious Hallam declares "they strike us with something like the awe of preternatural knowledge," and seem "more like revelations of physical truths vouchsafed to a single mind than the superstructure of its reasoning upon any established basis." The drawings and writings now at Windsor it is now proposed to publish in fac-simile, on account of their combined artistic and scientific value. The work will form about 250 plates in folio, with the text of the MSS. deciphered and printed in full, a translation and all needful notes and illustrations, under the charge of Mr. Panizzi and Dr. Sharpey, secretary of the Royal Society, for the scientific portion. It will be issued in twenty parts at one guinea each, the publication to commence early in the year 1866.

—The fifth "Annuaire," or yearly report, of the Ethnological Society of France, is just ready for publication, and will complete the first series of its works. Among other interesting matter it will contain chronological annals by the Japanese Mokados; Papers on Jewish History, and its connection with Babylon and Persia, the Books of Esther and of Judith, by M. Oppert; articles on the Siamese and Pali Languages, etc. The publications of the English Anthropological Society also show the lively interest that prevails on the subject which it is its mission to illustrate. The American Ethnological Society continues to accumulate facts more especially bearing on the early history and condition of the races of the New World, and has just resumed its meetings for the season. A former laborer in the field who has not lately been heard from, Mr. George Catlin, announces for publication in London, through Messrs. Trübner & Co., "O-Kee-Pa, a Religious Ceremony of the Mandan Tribe of Indians," with twenty-three colored illustrations, in one volume quarto. Mr. Catlin has also addressed a letter to the press on the present condition and treatment of the North American Indians, denouncing in the severest terms the inhuman massacre of the Cheyenne tribe, and the general conduct of the United States officials, etc., by whom the national relations with the red man are managed.

—"The History of the American War," by Lieut.-Col. Fletcher, of the Scots Fusilier Guards, with plans of battles, etc., is just completed by the appearance of the second volume in London. It is the only work of any pretension yet written in England on the subject. Colonel Fletcher has had the advantage of visiting the Union armies during the command of General McClellan, and writes with fairness and impartiality, without adding much, either of new ideas or actual information, to the existing stock of knowledge. Meanwhile materials rapidly accumulate, principally on the Southern side, to an extent that threatens to be embarrassing to the future historian. Mr. Pollard, author of the secession "History of the War," in four volumes, is engaged on a résumé of the transactions of the past four years, to be entitled "History of a Lost Cause." In "Blackwood's Magazine" is being published the narrative of Colonel Von Borcke, a Prussian officer whose services in organizing the rebel cavalry were of the highest value; and we are promised by Messrs. Lippincott & Co., at an early day, "Secret Rebel Diary of the War: Containing the Transactions of the War Department of the Confederate States Government during the whole period of its existence until the evacuation of Richmond and the surrender of General Lee, embracing copies of all important documents and despatches pertaining to the War Office, with a History of the Rise and Progress of the Events which finally compassed the Destruction of the Confederacy," by J. B. Jones, Clerk in the Confederate States War Office—to form two volumes 8vo.

—"Club Life of London, with Anecdotes of the Clubs, Coffee-houses, and Taverns during the Seventeenth, Eighteenth, and Nineteenth Centuries," is the title of a new book by that industrious compiler John Timbs, whose works, under his own name and various well-sounding pseudonyms, as "Horace Welby," etc., would almost fill a small library. Mr. Timbs is one of the best workmen of his class, and in his books of "Curiosities" and "Anecdotes" usually brings forward some interesting matter from recondite sources. The taste for reproducing and dwelling upon the life of the past which usually characterizes a period when original creative power is in abeyance in a nation, has caused the growth of a mob of compilers whose performances are of the most wishy-washy kind. Since Thackeray brought the eighteenth century into fashion, the literary and social characteristics of that period are the favorite themes of these gentry. Dr. Johnson wished he might never again hear of the Punic War. We should heartily rejoice if Goldsmith's "bloom-colored coat" should be buried in the same oblivion. It is continually turning up, along with Sir Joshua Reynolds's ear-trumpet, Dr. Johnson's tea-drinkings, Miss Burney's bashfulness, Garrick's love of saving a penny, and other scraps of worn-out anecdotes, referred to with an easy air of familiarity by writers of the Sala and Thornbury type to show their intimate acquaintance with the arcana of the past. The social and literary history of England is a mine which could hardly be exhausted by any number of genuine workers, so copious are the materials at command for its illustration. These this class of authors in question have no knowledge of. Evelyn and Pepys, Boswell and Burney, Walpole and Wraxall, form about the beginning and end of their stock in trade. It is impossible to take up an English magazine without meeting with a rehash of this old matter, destined to form a book served up under some taking title.

—The brilliance and versatility of the talents of M. Ernest Renan are well exemplified in a work, the joint production of himself and a literary colleague, V. Leclerc. It is the introductory portion to the last volume published of "Histoire Littéraire de la France," a work commenced by the Benedictines, and now carried on by a Government commission, to which we have unfortunately no parallel in England or America. The account of each century commences with a preliminary general survey of the era. The age now treated of, the fourteenth century, is prefaced by a "Discours sur l'Etat des Lettres," par V. Leclerc, and "Discours sur l'Etat des Arts," par E. Renan. The merit of these dissertations has been so universally recognized that they have been published in a separate form, in two vols. royal octavo. After M. Leclerc's survey of the intellectual elements of the age, Renan takes up all that relates to its material progress, especially architecture and the fine arts, and shows, with abounding learning and eloquence, the mutual interdependence of the conditions on which civilization depends, and the characteristics that distinguish a progressive state such as Europe then exemplified from one merely stationary and conservative. The "Discours" is said to form the best account and philosophy of the arts of the Middle Ages that has ever appeared.

SAADI'S GULISTAN.*

THE rise and career of the modern Persian literature is on many accounts one of the most striking passages in all literary history. For a long succession of centuries the Persian muse had been mute, the energies of the people absorbed in the wars, tumults, and revolutions which make up the ordinary staple of the historian's account. Indeed, if Persia had ever before produced a varied popular literature, all trace and remembrance of it had become lost. In the very earliest period, before the beginnings of history proper, the followers of Zoroaster's religion had their sacred books, a part of which, mixed with matter of later origin, has come down to us as the Zendavesta. But all the literary activity of the race, so far as we know aught of it, had been since expended in preserving, translating, and expounding that ancient and revered record. The external fates of Persia, in the meantime, had been full of vicissitude. Under Cyrus and his successors the Persians had been the foremost among the branches of that grand division of mankind to which we ourselves belong—the Indo-European race—to take their part in the drama of universal history. They had been first checked, then conquered, by Greece; Persian tradition still accuses Alexander of Macedon of having burned the records and overthrown the altars of the pure religion of Ormuzd. Governed for a while by his generals, the country had then submitted for near five hundred years to the yoke of the Parthians, until, in A.D. 226, a native dynasty regained the throne, re-established the ancient religion and customs, and revived the memory of Persian power and valor by its desperate and often triumphant struggles with the Roman Empire. Then came the avalanche of Moslem fanaticism and fury, before which so many thrones went down. Persia was overthrown, and it seemed for three centuries as if her nationality and religion were crushed and annihilated together; Arab language, faith, and culture threatened to usurp the place of what was distinctively Persian, and the land to become socially and intellectually, as it was politically, a mere appendage to the empire of the Caliphs. There must have been an extraordinary force and persistency in a national character which, after so long and changeful a history, could rise to a new and more vigorous life from beneath such an overwhelming blow. And this was what took place in Persia. No sooner did the Moslem servitude begin to relax, as the caliphate went to pieces and independent dynasties arose here and there in the eastern provinces, than the national spirit revived, and marked its new birth by a burst of song. The land had become thoroughly Mohammedanized during the long period of the Arab domination; the faithful votaries of Zoroaster's doctrine were feeble and persecuted communities in the desert, or exiles in India. Yet signs of such resistance as the circumstances made practicable were to be seen in the general adherence of the Persians to the Shiite heresy and in the rise and prevalence of the Sûfî mysticism, which spurned the narrow bounds of Moslem orthodoxy, and sought for beatitude only in transcendental contemplation and spiritual union with God. To their ancient historical traditions, too, the national mind clung closely; and the first great work of the new national literature was the gigantic epic of Firdusi, the "Shah-Nameh," or "Book of Kings," in which was wrought out the whole history of Persia, as it lay in the popular mind of the period, founded in no small part on legends whereof the Zoroastrian books themselves contain the germs. What a wonderful energy there was in the poetic ardor which fired the national spirit is to be seen, not only in the popular enthusiasm which accompanied it, and the long career of literary productiveness which followed, but in its effects on the other races. The wild tribes of Turan, the hordes of Turkish descent, who were then commencing the movement which brought them later across the Hellespont and to the very borders of Germany, were taken captive by it; their barbarous dynasties, as they succeeded one another upon the thrones of Iran, became without exception the lovers and patrons of the Persian literature; and, to the present day, the polite language of Constantinople is full of Persian elements, then learned and borrowed, and nearly the whole Turkish literature is an imitation of Persian models.

The golden age of Persian literature covers about five centuries, from the beginning of the eleventh to the end of the fifteenth. It was throughout essentially of a belletristic character: epic, legendary, lyric, and romantic poetry, panegyric, philosophic allegory, aphoristic apologue, are its staples. Even history, though an important, is a subordinate department, and science is but scantily represented—in part, because the Persian savans have chosen to write in Arabic rather than in their own tongue. And it has, upon the whole, more of that quality which is independent of clime and circumstance, which appeals directly and with power to the universal human heart, than is possessed by any other Eastern literature.

Most conspicuous among the many brilliant stars in the literary firmament of Persia are four, which rose and set at nearly equal distance from one another: they are Firdusi, Saadi, Hafiz, Jami. Of these, Firdusi is superior in dignity, and the mingled historical and literary interest of his great poem is elsewhere unequalled; Hafiz has the intensest poetic fire; Jami exhibits the most varied genius; yet Saadi is the one most known and enjoyed in the West. This is not without its sufficient reason. Saadi's life was one of extraordinary length and of greatly varied experiences. He died near the end of the thirteenth century (the exact year is a matter of dispute), more than a hundred years old. He is said to have written his best works in his old age, depositing in them the wisdom gathered in an active career prolonged much beyond the usual period of senile quiescence. He had been all his life a wanderer, and had, among other things, fought against the Crusaders in Palestine, and languished for a while as their prisoner. This sort of life was not unusual among the savans and beaux-esprits of Asia; they were accustomed to pass from country to country, from court to court, enjoying the consideration which their reputation brought them, extending and strengthening it, winning new patronage, and learning more of men and manners. It was the highest culture which the circumstances of the place and time permitted. Upon Saadi it seems to have had a more than usually happy effect, purifying his nature of local and religious prejudices, softening down the peculiarities of the Oriental character in him, teaching him practical wisdom and all-embracing charity, making of him a cosmopolitan in genius and sympathies. Its fruits are to be seen in his two most popular works, the "Bostân" and "Gulistân," or "Fruit-Garden" and "Rose-Garden," the latter of which is now for the first time put before the American public, in an elegant form and under the care of an American editor whose name commands universal attention and respect. The "Bostân" is in verse, the "Gulistân" in prose, with intermingled verse; both are made up chiefly of anecdotes, brief stories with a moral, incidents illustrative of some weighty practical truth, distributed into books according to their subject and the nature of the lessons they teach. The tone and aim of these anecdotes are, almost without exception, truly admirable, their philosophy a genuine love of humanity and justice. Not a few of them are already familiar to us, having found their way, through more or less devious channels, into the common stock of literature.

While Saadi's other works—being to us of less attractive contents, and in a far higher degree than these dependent for their interest upon their poetical form—are comparatively unknown in the West, the Bostân and Gulistân have been repeatedly translated into almost every language of Europe. Of the latter, there exist nearly twenty versions, four of them in English. The most popular of these English versions, that of Gladwin (it first appeared in 1806, and has since gone through a number of editions in England), is here reproduced, along with the introduction to another, that of Ross (published in 1823), giving an account of the poet's life and works, an estimate of his genius, and a eulogy of the Persian literature and culture. The volume receives unity through the preface of Ralph Waldo Emerson, which has the interest, of thought and style, always belonging to whatever comes from his pen. Gladwin's translation is a respectable one, but by no means all that we could ask for as a representation of its original. No literature is more dependent than the Persian upon the charm of style for its attractiveness, and Saadi especially, as we are reminded in the preface to this volume, valued most of all his gift of "sweet words;" he was willing to lose anything else sooner than that. And, although it would be doing the solid worth of the Gulistân signal injustice to represent its style as its chief merit, it is very easy to see how much an eloquent diction must add to these moral anecdotes, giving beauty to what in the version may even appear tame or commonplace, and brightening and commending the lesson drawn from each significant narrative. Gladwin is simple and unaffected only, not eloquent. It detracts sensibly, too, from the effect which the stories should have, that the verses in which their lessons are usually summed up are rendered by him in prose. What here sometimes seems an unmotived repetition had a very different value in the original.

That a translation, however, should be found unsatisfactory, is too common and obvious a matter to be worth dwelling upon. Every one knows, who knows aught upon the subject, that a perfect translation is the despair of every true scholar. To translate a work of art in literature is like copying the painting of a great master; nay, it is vastly more difficult; it is like copying a picture in the colors of another prism than ours. The Oriental scholar is not always a man of that fine literary sense and power of criticism which should enable him to feel keenly and analyze truly the peculiar beauties of the author he reads; still less often has he the artistic power which should enable him to reproduce those beauties. We would rather have trusted Saadi to the hands of a man of genius like Mr. Emerson than of a scholar like Gladwin. Yet we thankfully accept what is here presented us. We recognize with pleasure the motive and aim of the publication—a loving appreciation of the merits of the Eastern poet and sage, and a desire that his name and works should become as familiarly known in America as they are in Europe. Respecting the laudableness of such attempts to bring the East to the knowledge of the West, we have already sufficiently expressed ourselves in a recent number of this journal, and we must commend the judgment which has chosen so promising a means to so good an end. We wish the book the wide circulation and cordial reception which, in our opinion, it fully deserves.

* "The Gulistan, or Rose Garden. By Musle-Huddeen Sheik Saadi, of Shiraz. Translated from the original by Francis Gladwin. With an Essay on Saadi's Life and Genius by James Ross, and a Preface by R. W. Emerson." Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1865. 12mo, pp. 379.

CONCERNING TIMOTHY TITCOMB.*

SINCE the "Country Parson" has been called a prose Tupper, there is, unhappily, nothing left within the whole range of epigram for the characterization of "Timothy Titcomb." The situation is perhaps inevitable, but it is not the less desperate. No doubt a future age, should his work descend to posterity, will have the courage and wisdom to express in some comprehensive phrase a sense of their quality; for the present we can only hope to suggest their nature vaguely and unequally.

Fortunately, a great number of readers have already some idea of our author. He has written a good many books, which have had large sales. He has a wide reputation as poet and novelist; and it seems to us he has done his best things in these characters. As a lecturer he is quite as well known, and in the volume before us he publishes the lectures which he has written and delivered during the last six or seven years. These are nine in number, and of such quantity and quality that it exalts our respect for the national sweetness and patience when we consider that they must have each been delivered to popular assemblies at least a score of times.

It might not be without a measure of sadness, however, that we considered this, for the fact suggests uncomfortable ideas of the facility of literary success in this country, and goes far to prove that reputation is the only thing still to be had cheap among us; that while overcoats, butter and eggs, rents and fuel, are exorbitantly dear, fame, like consolidated milk, is within the reach of the humblest resources. But it would be unjust to the public to judge it by what it endures rather than what it likes; and it is doubtful whether the popularity of such writers and lecturers as Mr. Holland is other than apparent. A slovenly and timorous criticism has been the bane alike of readers and of writers, and an order of mind has been allowed to flourish up into a thistly rankness in our literature fit only to browse donkeys. But we doubt greatly whether most people have any genuine appetite for the growth, and we question if even among those to whom harsh dispraise of Mr. Holland would come with almost the shock of a personal affront, there has not sometimes been a suspicion that he was heavy and trite. It would be difficult, certainly, to find anything in these popular lectures which is not dull if new, or old if good. The lecturer himself has sometimes a sense of this, and once expresses the belief that a great deal he has been saying must seem to his audience like the recitation of a schoolroom. We must do him the justice to say, however, that this concession is made in a moment of rare consciousness, and that, for the most part, he rehearses his commonplaces with a dignified carefulness and a swelling port of self-satisfaction inexpressibly amusing. He does not wonder, this eloquent lecturer, he is "smitten with wonder," he says, when he thinks "of the power which bold assumption has in the world," though we suspect that he is merely smitten with wonder that he should have thought of the tremendous fact; and he might have marvelled at his hearers for submitting to his own pretence of having something wise and novel to tell them. He loves to say "Now, mark you," when there is nothing to mark, and is fond of the sort of metaphor which, like bear's meat, grows as you chew upon it, and can neither be swallowed nor ejected. Nothing daunts him, and he does not hesitate to electrify you with the idea, for example, "that hate is not so good a motive as love, and, thank God! it is not so powerful a motive as love!"

Throughout these lectures Mr. Holland patronizes the good, the true, and the beautiful. He encourages these amiable abstractions, and tries to keep up their spirits by a constant testimony to their good behavior. He is also friendly to the domestic and public virtues; but the great object of his philanthropic condescension is the Christian religion. He cannot say enough in favor of its many winning and useful qualities; and if he sometimes suspects that his platitudes on other subjects might seem like the recitations of schoolboys, he has every reason to believe that his attitude toward our common faith is that of a pedagogue. He wishes to bring this faith out and have its merit recognized, and will never give up his protégée, even though people should think his constancy unfashionable. Religion he finds lamentably absent from politics and society, and, above all, from fashionable literature. He does not find Thackeray Christian, even when he takes "into account the sulphurous satire which he points with such deadly fire at the very society which makes him fashionable;" and he objects to the pen of Charles Dickens that, although "thrilling to its nib with the genius which inspires it, he has never written, in good, honest text, the name of Jesus Christ." The rebuke of worldly-mindedness and vanity and uncharitableness which breaks forth from Thackeray, the unfailing advocacy of the cause of the despised, the poor, and the prisoner in the novels of Charles Dickens, prove nothing of their love of Christianity, because the name of Christ is not in their works. Does Mr. Holland wear a crucifix about him? Kingsley, although a traitor to the cause of popular reform, and the inventor of the odious muscular piety of second-rate modern fictions, is Christian, because he calls on the name of the Lord; and Ruskin, who has lately discovered the divine beauty of slavery, is likewise a Christian for the like reason. Mrs. Browning, also, is a Christian writer; and whereas fashionable unchristian writers are doomed to perish, our lecturer is led to the anti-climax of saying: "The earth is not broad enough, the earth is not deep enough, to bury Mrs. Browning in."

It may be objected to the censure of such writers as Mr. Holland that, granting their popularity to be factitious, they do a great deal of good to commonplace people; that they reach a large class of hearers and readers who could not be reached by men of genius; that they act as smoked glasses for the weak vision that would else turn away from thought, or, regarding her, would be dazzled to death by her aspect. We desire to give Mr. Holland's admirers and apologists the benefit of this doubt.

* "Plain Talks on Familiar Subjects. A Series of Popular Lectures. By J. G. Holland." New York: Charles Scribner & Co. 1866.

THE IRISH PRISON SYSTEM.*

"OUR CONVICTS" is a remarkable book. As a literary work it is poor, but no reader of it will be tempted to dwell on its defects. Its chief excellence and peculiar importance to American readers consist in its presenting a detailed and accurate view of what is becoming famous the world over as the Irish system of prison discipline, a system which is destined to revolutionize the whole theory and practice in regard to the treatment of criminals. The principles at its foundation are simple and of universal application; the methods by which they are applied are as simple as the principles themselves.

An act of Parliament of 1853 founded both the English and Irish convict systems. Transportation was a failure, and though this alone would not, perhaps, have prevented its continuance, the colonies themselves did prevent it by refusing to receive any more criminals. Western Australia, however, from peculiar and temporary causes, was anxious to admit convicts, but in 1854 Governor Fitzgerald wrote to request that no more Irish convicts on tickets-of-leave should be sent out. The reason given was an idiosyncracy of the Irish prisoners, arising from a "singular inaptitude to comprehend the nature of moral agencies, or to be affected by them." They are represented to have been degraded and apparently incorrigible. Such was the situation of affairs when Captain Walter Crofton undertook the charge of the Irish prisons. Ten years later, from the prisons whose inmates had gone to Australia incapable of being affected by moral agencies, went men so reformed that employers received them with confident reliance on their future honesty; a system had been devised so perfect as to excite the admiration of all interested in the progress of social reform, so perfect that no improvement can be suggested, so zealously carried out that Howard alone is a name fit to be compared with Crofton.

To reform the prisoner, to fit him for admission to society, and at the same time to give society such satisfactory evidence of his reform as to induce trust in him, these were Sir Walter Crofton's objects. An appeal to his moral nature, and to hope rather than fear, was the means employed. Methods were employed so simple that the result seems obvious.

J. B., then, take Sir Walter's own illustration, has lived a life of antagonism to law and her ministers:

"He arrives at his prison chained and scowling at all who approach him—he is angry with himself for not having been able to elude detection, and for no other cause whatever. J. B. is stated to be twenty-eight years of age; his life of crime has given him the appearance of thirty-five. He is now convicted of burglary, and has four former convictions recorded against him.

* "Our Convicts. By Mary Carpenter." In two volumes 8vo. London: Longman, Green, Longman, Roberts & Green. 1864.

He has received what is termed a certain amount of penal infliction for his different crimes, and has been on the tread-wheel more than once; solitude and darkness also he has experienced from time to time. He has been violently insubordinate in prison and has been flogged. He is known to be one of a notorious gang of robbers infesting one of our populous cities. You scan his countenance and there is not one hopeful lineament apparent. You elicit from him that his parents died in a work-house, from which he absconded. He never had a home."

This is certainly an unfavorable specimen for an experiment in reform. If you punish him, he has been punished before and hardened by it. If you try to amend his character, how will you do it when he is in a state of tacit antagonism to you at every point? He must before discharge regain freedom in some sort, or the public will not be satisfied that he is reformed; yet how can this be done without removing the necessary physical restraint?

Irish prison discipline is divided into three stages. The first consists of cellular imprisonment for eight or nine months. But whether eight or nine months, depends exclusively upon the convict's conduct; this stage is very penal, the object being to induce reflection and, if possible, contrition. During the first half of this period a very low diet is used, and for the first three months no interesting employment is permitted. Meanwhile there is a great deal of time for secular and religious instruction, the plan of the Irish system is carefully taught, and the convict learns that for the future all depends on himself. At the end of the first period the prisoner reaches another stage, of which the peculiarity is that his progress is recorded by marks; the principle upon which these marks are given he has already learned, and he now finds that the more laborious his attention, the greater his good-will and industry, the sooner can he reach the much desired third or intermediate stage, so called because occupying a position between absolute freedom and penal servitude, not wholly yielding the one or strictly enforcing the other. This stage gives character to the system, and it is through such "intermediate" establishments alone that a satisfactory and well-tested change can be effected in the character of criminals. Here there are no marks; here is to be proved the sincerity of amendment. Here the individual is to be looked at, and for this purpose the smaller the number to be "individualized" the better. One hundred is stated to be the outside limit; but no doubt the limit of an average family would be best, were it but possible. Small gangs, the smaller the better, are formed, and the person in charge of each, while he is to teach the members of it a trade, is responsible for their characters. He is to talk with them, make himself familiar with everything concerning each one of them—in a word, to treat them as men. Again, they are trusted to go out alone from the prison; to carry messages from one prison to another, and to spend part of the small sums they are allowed to earn by industry and good behavior. Natural means are used as far as practicable. "No more restraint is used than would be necessary in any well-regulated establishment." (And this tests at once the efficacy of the methods in the previous stages.) The officers work with the convicts, are unarmed, and in small force. Physical restraint, or even its possibility, is excluded, and, indeed, the use or possibility of force would be "inconsistent with the principles" which the intermediate establishments "were instituted to enunciate." The object is to prove to the convict that he is really to be credited with the improvement he has shown in obtaining marks. Again, as before said, it must be proved to the public that full credit for reform may safely be given him when liberated. He is now co-operating in his own advance.

"He cannot ignore the conviction, sooner or later, that the system, however penal in its development, is intended for his benefit; and that, moreover, it has by its stringent regulations and arrangements after the liberation of the convict, and this is most important to note, made the vocation of crime very unprofitable and hazardous to follow. He hears lectures of an interesting and profitable description, which not only point out the wickedness and the danger of criminal pursuits, but show him the course which he should take in order to amend his life where his labor is required and his antecedents not likely to entwine him to his ruin. The mind of the convict is in alliance with the minds of those placed over him, and what at first sight might have appeared to be impracticable, has become, for many years, a recorded and gratifying fact."

And now having by the sweat of his brow earned his liberty, having by his good behavior and industry shortened his time by some months, the prisoner is to return to the society which had expelled him. But his original term of sentence has not expired, and society demands a further guaranty that in case of a return to his former life there shall be a return to his former punishment. To effect this, the much-abused ticket-of-leave is given him. He has, it should be said, been already photographed and his offense has been entered on a criminal register. "But what is a ticket-of-leave?" asks some one who has seen the play of "The Ticket-of-Leave Man," and conceived, perhaps, the idea that its operation is to blast the prospects of even the repentant sinner. The license is merely a certificate of freedom under certain conditions, the gist of which is that misconduct on the part of the license-holder will produce a forfeiture of the license, and that misconduct means association with notoriously bad characters, an idle and dissolute life, or the absence of visible means of obtaining an honest livelihood. In England this was all, and no means were taken to enforce the law, while the police were ordered not to exercise any supervision over the discharged prisoners, for fear that the appearance of such surveillance would prevent them from obtaining employment. Besides this, the license soon became a matter of course, and was granted to all, whether well-behaved or not, at the end of the usual time; the consequence was that, carefully let alone by the police and not being by any means reformed, the ticket-of-leave was a license to practice crime, and the word became a national reproach. In Ireland, on the other hand, three conditions annexed to the English certificate, and a rigorous enforcement of them, gave as a blessing to Ireland what to England had been a curse: 1. The convict was to report himself to the police of his district on his discharge, and subsequently on the first of each month till the period of his original sentence had expired. 2. A change of residence must be notified to the constabulary, in order that the registration may be changed. 3. An infringement of these rules entails a revocation of the license. Says Miss Carpenter (Vol. II., p. 95):

"The system of photography, and the careful registration of every offence, make it almost impossible for any convict at large to commit an offence without his being at once detected as an old offender, and receiving a sentence proportionably longer. Since the absolute certainty of detection and punishment is the most reliable deterrent, the knowledge that crime is thus made a hazardous calling proves a very strong stimulus to the convicts to abandon it and to lead a very different life. . . . Such is the working of the Irish convict system. If its results are asked for, reference need only be made to the grand fact that in Ireland there is such general belief in the reformation of convicts that they are received back into society, and able to gain an honest livelihood; that employers are not afraid to give them work and even place them, after suitable probation, in situations of trust. Tangible proofs of its success can also be given in the very remarkable reduction of crime in the island and the very small proportion of relapses."

In proof of this statement we find on p. 116 of Vol. II. a table which shows that in 1854 the number of criminals in custody in Government prisons was about 4,000. In 1862 the number was 1,314, a striking decrease of such crime as is punished by penal servitude. In 1862 there was a remarkable increase in the number of convictions, but we must remember that it is the number of re-convictions alone which can prove the success of the system. As to these the percentage of relapses was only 9·9 during the six years previous to 1862. That year was very exceptional on account of prevalent distress. Nevertheless, from 1856 to 1862 inclusive the total number discharged was 4,960. Of these 510 were re-sentenced, 107 licenses were revoked, and therefore 617 were returned to prison; the percentage being 12·44. To perceive what a very small proportion this is, it is only necessary to consider that out of every hundred eighty-eight are reformed men—eighty-eight thieves, burglars, murderers, garroters, turned into honest, respectable citizens. Into this system, so admirable in itself, life was breathed by such men as Crofton and Organ.

The latter was the prison instructor; but to him education meant a life-long care of every convict committed to his charge. He spent years in laboring to secure the reception by society of a class only known to it as the most criminal in the world. Without men like these systems are lifeless. But such men are always to be found.

Here in America we feel well satisfied with our prisons. There is no reason for such satisfaction, for our prisons do not attain their object. A prison is, properly, a reformatory, a moral hospital. Ours are schools of crime. Says a committee of the Prison Association of New York:

"If an institution should be established in every county of the State with the inscription over the door, 'Vice and crime taught here,' and the processes within corresponded to the announcement without, this committee is impressed with the conviction that the work of manufacturing criminals could scarcely be more effectually done than it is by our jail system, as at present organized and managed."

This is strong language, but it is not lightly used. There is, we think, no proposition more true than that "our present jail system is deeply depraving to the prisoner and a positive evil to the community." Says another committee:

"Insecurity, scant room, crowded corridors, bad ventilation, vicious air, horrible odors, abundance of vermin, want of personal cleanliness in the prisoners, too ample facilities for outside communication, defective separation of the sexes, compulsory idleness, the absence of all means of intellectual culture, very inadequate agencies for religious instruction and moral reform, and, above all, the promiscuous association of prisoners of all classes and all ages—forming, as they do, a fœtid, seething mass of mutual contamination and pollution—are, if not universal, at least far too common points in the picture presented by our common jails."

The penitentiaries are better; it is to their improvement, indeed, that the chief attempts at reform have been directed, the jails remaining the same schools of vice as before. Almost every man or woman who issues from the former has been at various times an inmate of the latter, and the folly of endeavors to stop crime by reforming the criminal in his last stage, when he is encouraged in it during all the first stages, is evident. Until our jails are radically changed, we cannot hope for any great diminution of the "dangerous classes;" until the promiscuous association of young and old, good and bad, criminals and witnesses against criminals, is abolished, we must expect a "fœtid, seething mass of mutual contamination and pollution;" until short sentences are abolished, we must expect repeated sentences; until we admit that a register for crime is at least as essential as one for mortgages, no one need despair of being tolerably successful in the profession of crime; until we make a distinction between children and hardened offenders, we must expect hardened offenders. Too much cannot be said as to the necessity of a change in these respects. The effect of short sentences, without registration, is, that with proper precautions men commit crime after crime and run through prison after prison before being arrested for any length of time; that when they at length receive a long sentence, so matured in wickedness are they that reformation is almost impossible. But what is to be said of our treatment of children? A boy of twelve is committed to prison with the burglar of years' practice. We had better have two hundred and twenty felonies on our statute-book again, and hang a boy of twelve for the theft of a shilling, than do this. We educate the rich, the virtuous, the prosperous, in knowledge and goodness; our poor, our ignorant, our vicious, our starving we educate in crime, in vice, in lust. We succeed admirably with both classes. Schools finish one; jails the other. This crying evil must be remedied. The sweetness of the charity of Elizabeth Fry and Howard must replace the stern ignorance of our present attempts at the repression of crime.

The Legislature of New York have at length adopted the principle of "commutation;" the convict is to earn the remission of his sentence, as in Ireland. Whether it is to be successful depends upon the strictness with which the provisions of the law are carried out, and upon police supervision after liberation. Such measures are excellent, but of imperfect usefulness until the value of the "intermediate system" is appreciated. By that alone can the prisoner be fully prepared for freedom; by that alone can society feel secure as to his reformation.

There is, however, a stumbling-block in the way of all improvement. The prison management of New York changes with every change of politics. Nothing can be worse. Nothing can more effectually prevent order, care, and ability. Nothing can so effectually secure a worthless class of prison officers. Prisons do not belong to the spoils, yet it is a well-known fact that the lower class of politicians have the prisons given over to them because they are thought fit to receive nothing better. Nothing better? Have we sunk into a sluggishness from which nothing will rouse us? Is it not enough that 60,000 men, women, and children pass through the prisons of one State every year to show us how much is to be done?

HISTORY BY THE YARD.*

Civilization has its inconveniences not less than its manifold comforts and advantages. Steam is as good an illustration as any. It has blessed us with cheap and expeditious transportation by land, and cursed our civil society with unscrupulous, almost omnipotent, corporations. It has enlarged commerce by shortening the passage of the sea; and, by competition with the Arabian caravan, has sped for us the return of the cholera, henceforth the terror, not of a term of years, but even of every year. It has diminished incalculably the labor and the cost of printing, and made the press the invincible ally of progress; but it has done so at the expense of conscientious mechanical workmanship, and with no small detriment to language and literature. Our newspapers have begotten a style and vocabulary of their own. Care has given way to haste, and accuracy to slipshod negligence. The writing which used to be the burden of a man's life is now achieved according to the requirements of every sort of periodical. Novels have long since adapted themselves to the serial form, and, in France at least, to the width of printers' columns. We have had history in monthly instalments; M. de Lamartine now gives it to us daily in the Constitutionnel. Finally, we have works of the gravest character contracted for within impossible limits—impossible, did we not see them actually executed by the author, produced by the publisher, and sold by the ten or hundred thousand through the active canvassing of the latter's agents.

It is of the last-mentioned evil that we are moved particularly to speak. Its effect upon the entire book-trade concerns the publishers rather, or certainly sooner, than the general public, who have only a secondary interest in rival modes of literary enterprise. Its effect upon the popular taste and culture and acquirement, and the performances of scholars and thinkers, may not be left to the attention and possible correction of any class of men, but deserves to be seriously pondered by the community. It is high time that the emission of any new book should be preceded by scruples analogous to those out of which convictions are born, and attended by an apology either expressed in set terms or contained irresistibly in the substance of the composition. Every writer, before publishing, should challenge the aim of his undertaking, its need, and his qualifications for it; should criticize his work when criticism will be most opportune and valuable—at its very conception. Between this spirit and that in which men now sit down and deliberately reckon the number of pages they have to fill, calculate with time-piece and calendar the division of intellectual labor, and, having agreed upon their downright and contingent remuneration, begin to ply their pens with all their might—between these two methods it is not only proper but necessary to choose, and quickly, before the false supplants the true. In these times and in this country the rebellion exhibited no mortal wound when its history began to be written. The body of the late President had not reached its final resting-place ere half-a-dozen biographers were engaged to write his life. In any just sense neither task was practicable for the present generation, even as a mere chronicle of facts. We do not, and shall not for long years, know all the facts. We cannot yet distinguish the pretended from the real.

Among the contractors for this kind of shoddy it is not surprising to find Mr. John S. C. Abbott busy and prominent. We observe, in a Western paper, a card from that gentleman, in which he denies the truth of a current statement that, having been secured by the Messrs. Harper, of this city, to write a history of the late civil war, he had been guilty of such gross inaccuracies as to lead them to cancel their agreement with him. We have no disposition to doubt Mr. Abbott's word in this matter, though we cannot help regretting that he is to go on with his job. He affords, perhaps, the very best instance of misemployed incapacity that could be desired for our purpose; and if we cursorily review his now somewhat stale productions, it is only that we may exhibit the viciousness of that disposition which tosses off a book as lightly as a child a soap-bubble, with equal amusement to itself and equal indifference to the consequences.

Mr. Abbott's "History of Napoleon Bonaparte" appeared, in two volumes, in 1855, and its general character is too well known to require much comment here. The attempt of the author at an impartial judgment of the great Corsican was not more ludicrous than his estimate of his own success "A fair representation," says he, "of the endeavors of Napoleon . . . would shake the Government of England to its foundation. The view of his character presented in these pages, if placed before the public of Great Britain, would be regarded by the Government as a calamity." Ten years have elapsed since these ominous words were written in the midst of the most perverse, unblushing eulogy of the First Emperor. Will Mr. Abbott have us look for England's calamity in her entente cordiale with "the nephew of his uncle?" But, in sorry earnest, our author's impartiality consisted in resolving at the outset that his subject was immaculate, and it then became necessary merely to shift the blame upon others, or to gloze over unmanageable facts. Thus, to maintain Napoleon's merciful regard for human life, and aversion to bloodshed, he remarks that "bombshells cannot be thrown affectionately," attributes the usual and even extraordinary horrors (like the massacre of the garrison at Jaffa) to "the stern necessities of war," and for ever charges the English with being the assailants, and hence responsible for all that grew out of the ensuing strife. In asserting Napoleon's "high sense of honor," and his noble advocacy of "the equality of privileges and the universal brotherhood of man," he remembers to forget his effort to re-enslave St. Domingo, and his treatment of his black rival, Toussaint. And generally it may be remarked that Bonaparte's own defence of his motives and deeds is allowed to outweigh the gravest accusations that have been brought against him.

The rhetoric of this veracious history is not to be passed over. That it is florid and high-flown must be pardoned to the enthusiasm of the writer. Towards its repetitiousness we are less inclined to be lenient. This fault might naturally be explained by the circumstance that the "History" first appeared in parts in "Harper's Magazine;" but this would not excuse its recurrence in the completed volume, and we have sufficient evidence that

* "History of Napoleon Bonaparte. By John S. C. Abbott." Two vols. Harper & Bros., New York. 1864 (1855).
"Napoleon at St. Helena." Ib. 1855.
"The French Revolution of 1789." Ib. 1859.
"The Empire of Austria." Ib. Mason Bros., New York. 1859.
"The Empire of Russia." Ib. 1860.
"Italy." Ib. 186–.

the fault is inherent in Mr. Abbott's style. A single quotation from a single page will answer for the work we are considering (I., 127):

"The roar of the battle, the shout of onset, and the shriek of the dying, mingled, in midnight gloom, with the appalling rush and wail of the tempest."

"Through the long hours the groans of the wounded, scattered over many miles swept by the battle, blended in mournful unison with the wailings of the tempest."

It would be tedious to follow the historian in all his misstatements and confusion, and convict him of ignorance or carelessness, or a probable combination of both. Again a few examples must stand for many. He speaks of the Bastile as just demolished in 1790; says that a new constitution was established in the midst of the Reign of Terror; that Napoleon was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general when invested with the command of the artillery train at Toulon, instead of after the capture of the town, as he correctly states a few pages further on; that "more than seventy thousand loyalists, men, women, and children of the highest rank," were there beleaguered; that "a few months," instead of four years, passed away before Napoleon overthrew the constitution which he had established by that successful siege; that Josephine, born on the island of "Martinico," was twenty-eight years of age in 1796, instead of thirty-three; that the people of Lodi saw the sun "sinking behind the Tyrolean hills," or, in other words, setting in the north-east; that Murat became King of Sicily, instead of Naples, etc., etc. All these from the first one hundred and fifty pages of the first volume, with which, and with the work itself, let us conclude with the following versions of a part of the testament at St. Helena, contained in one chapter:

"I arrested the Duke d'Enghien because that measure was necessary to the security, the interest, and the honor of the French people, when the Count d'Artois maintained, on his admission, sixty assassins. In similar circumstances I would do the same." (I., 431.)

"I ordered the Duke d'Enghien to be arrested and executed, because it was necessary for the safety, the welfare, and the honor of the French nation. Under the same circumstances I should act in the same way." (I., 435.)

Though the "History" contained considerably over a hundred pages on "Napoleon at St. Helena," the year 1855 witnessed also the publication of a book with the same title, of no less than six hundred and sixty-six long pages! But it shall not delay us now, for it has all the extravagance and defects of the larger work. Four years later we were favored with "The French Revolution of 1789," from a republican point of view. Being anxious, however, to try Mr. Abbott away from French territory if possible, we pass on to "The Empire of Austria—its Rise and Present Power," which, also appearing in 1859, is proof of the wonderful elasticity of our author's intellect, just released from the overwhelming theme of the French Revolution. Happily for him, he had a guide in Coxe's "House of Austria," which he ingeniously converts into a history of the Empire by ignoring the earlier history of the country and stopping with Leopold II. With judicious discrimination, also, he connects the career of Charles XII. (in Denmark, Russia, and Poland) with the life of Austria, though he never fought a skirmish in her borders, and overlooks Frederick the Great, whose wars were all waged against her.

True to his title, Mr. Abbott leaps from the "rise" without difficulty to the "present power" of Austria, though that involves perfect silence concerning the revolution of 1848. The territorial extent of the empire, as he reckons it, is a mysterious piece of calculation, by which he derives 256,399 square miles (near enough to the truth) from items which together make 318,373.

The purpose of this work having been stated in the preface to be to deal rather with romance than with history—after the manner of his masterpiece, it would appear—we must make some allowance for its rhetoric. Yet it is really too bad to see Ottocar of Bohemia urge his troops "through the defiles of the Bohemian mountains" (p. 26), himself "threading the defiles of the Bohemian mountains" (p. 28), and also two "united armies threading the defiles of the Bohemian mountains" (p. 47); to find the "domains of the Count of Hapsburg . . . spreading through the defiles of Alsace and Suabia" (p. 25), the possessions of Austria "spreading through the defiles of the Alps" (p. 46); to behold the Turks "rush through the defiles of the Illyrian mountains" (p. 75), and Duke Ludovico "thread the defiles of the Tyrolese mountains" (p. 90); and to learn that there were "passes . . . which it would be necessary for the French to thread" (p. 440). He must have a clear head who is not lost in this labyrinth.

For a chapter of brilliant anachronisms commend us to that describing the northern exploits of the Turks. We are told that in November, 1437, Sigismond died, and was succeeded, as emperor as well as king of Hungary and Bohemia, by Albert; next that the Turks were at this time becoming the terror of Christendom; then that, with a powerful armament, Sigismond in person commenced his march to Constantinople, which the Turks were besieging; and that, the Christian troops being utterly routed and nearly all put to the sword, the emperor with difficulty escaped. These events, of which neither the time nor place is specified, occurred near Nicopolis in Bulgaria, in 1396, more than forty years before Sigismond died, and fourteen before he became emperor. The narrative concludes: "Bajazet, the sultan, returned exultant from this great victory, and resumed the siege of Constantinople, which ere long [say fifty-seven years later] fell into the hands of the Turks;" and "Amurath, who was sultan at the time of the death of Sigismond [but died before the fall of Constantinople], thought the moment propitious for extending his conquest," etc. (Pp. 62–4).

Mr. Abbott's "Empire of Russia," which our readers will excuse us for only glancing at, has the advantage—for Frenchmen—of being written after French authorities, quoted in the preface, in consequence of which the names of Russian princes, princesses, and towns are given in excellent French, par exemple: André, Monomaque, Michel, Hélène, Youri, Souzdal, Péréyeslavetz, etc. In the same way the barbarous Petcheneges are called "Petchénègues," and the Eastern town of Samarcand, "Samarcande."

We would fain have a look at our author's "Italy" also, but are informed that it is out of print, thanks, possibly, to an at last discerning public. Had it met with the favor of the "History of Napoleon," which bears on its latest edition the imprint 1864, the whole of Europe would probably have succumbed to the indomitable pen of Mr. Abbott. Possibly Spain, Portugal, and the rest, owe their deliverance to the breaking out of the rebellion, which naturally inspired the historian of the greatest epoch of modern times in the Old World to essay the greatest of all time in the New. And as we have observed in the former instance

> "How dreffle slick he reeled it off (like Blitz at our lyceum
> A-haulin' ribbins from his chops so quick you skeercely see 'em),' so we may expect American history, under his dexterous manipulation, to be drawn out by the yard, ell, furlong, mile, it may be, at the good pleasure of his employers and the endurance of his countrymen.

"Mr. Ambrose's Letters on the Rebellion." By Hon. John P. Kennedy. (Hurd & Houghton, New York.)—We do not know of any other 246 pages, of small size, in which so much wisdom and historical fact and substance have been compressed as in this unpretending book. We have here pages which show the statesman and the jurist. Mr. Kennedy's long experience as a member of Congress and of the Cabinet, and his intimate connection with Southerners, being himself a Baltimorean, have enabled him to produce a treatise on secession which we could wish to see in the hands of every reflecting Southerner and of very many Northerners. Let no one say it is too late to write or read on secession; and that the whole subject is settled. Neither slavery, nor negro-status, nor secession is absolutely settled. Conviction must go on spreading and deepening. It was but yesterday that Louisiana, or at least the Democrats in Louisiana, publicly re-asserted the revolting dogma that the United States Government and the different State governments in this country have been established for the whites alone. This assertion, absurd by whomsoever asserted, becomes doubly so in the mouth of a Louisianian or Floridian. Dr. Lieber has shown very conclusively, in his "Lectures on the Constitution of the United States," that the most refining doctrinarian cannot point out in the whole genesis and history of Louisiana or Florida one day, one hour, when she was sovereign; and in his speech on secession, delivered in South Carolina in 1851, he has shown how closely all the States have become intertwined (besides being subject to one national Government), so that a single State can no more secede without disarranging the whole than one of the composing stones of an arch can be removed without depriving the whole arch of its use and efficiency. The able letters we are publishing from the pen of "G. P. M." take the very tenable ground that not one of the thirteen colonies (let alone Louisiana and Florida) had ever the essential attributes of sovereignty. But Mr. Kennedy prefers to dwell upon the inconsistency of the latter State pretending to possess the right of secession, and he treats this point with great ability and directness. On page 31 he remarks:

"That territory was originally purchased by the United States at the cost of five millions of dollars. Some fifty, or perhaps a hundred, millions more were expended in its defence. It was purchased on considerations purely national, as essential to the commercial and military advantage of the country. It contains about thirty million acres of available land, which, by the purchase, became a public domain. Emigrants from other States went there, and were allowed to settle on this domain upon payment of a small amount per acre for the fee. In the year 1845 there had emigrated into this territory a population which, added to the settlers already there, amounted to something less than forty thousand white persons, who had become the owners of perhaps some two or three millions of acres. In this year, 1845, these persons very earnestly desired the privilege of being erected into a State, and to that end petitioned the Government of the United States to confer upon them this greatly desired boon. At that date the high tariff of 1842 was in full operation; the question of slavery was as rife, as active, and as virulent in its agitation of the country as it has ever been since; in short, every Southern grief, as interpreted in the inflamed politics of our day, was as poignant at that time as it was in 1860. Notwithstanding these motives 'to heap curses upon the Union,' which some of the most authoritative teachers of Southern rights were then urging upon their disciples, the people of Florida, with their eyes open to all the 'iniquities' they now impute to the national Government, prayed for admission, and they were kindly received and welcomed as a loyal addition to the fellowship of the States.

"After a brief existence of fifteen years, during which the Government was known to them only by the profusion of its bounties, upon some pretence of convenience—for they had none of oppression—they avail themselves of this right of secession to enable them to retire from the Union. By this act they not only claim to deprive the people of the United States of the whole benefit of the considerations which originally induced the purchase of this territory from Spain, as a national necessity—the great forts upon the coasts, the naval depots, the supply of ship-timber, the light-houses and guides to navigation, and the means of protecting the commerce of the country—but they also assume a right to the eminent domain of all the public lands, and to appropriate them according to their own pleasure. The white population of Florida to-day is about double what it was in 1845, something less than eighty thousand; and if we suppose the public lands they have seized and sequestered by this exercise of the lawful right of secession to be twenty millions of acres, they would be able to divide amongst the present white men, women, and children of Florida something more than two hundred and fifty acres of land a-piece, which would represent the legitimate profit of a right which, it is asserted, the founders of the Government of the United States, deliberately and in the full exercise of their wisdom, reserved to the people of the States."

Vagaries of Vandyke Browne. An Autobiography in Verse. By Wm. P. Brannan. (Cincinnati: R. W. Carroll & Co.)—We learn from this book that Mr. Brannan believes himself a poet, but we are not able to share his belief. He also teaches that in some incomprehensible way his genius has not met with proper encouragement and recognition, and he gives the impression that he is a sort of martyr to his own magnificence of intellect and purpose. Of course we doubt this, too; and it seems to us that the public generally will be scarcely persuaded of the justice of Mr. Brannan's conviction by the perusal of his verses. A man who cares to figure as a persecuted genius in these days when criticism is so eager and prompt to encourage the faintest promise, cherishes a difficult aim, and will meet with slight success. Certainly he must do something more than print a volume of stanzas in emulation of the poorest and dullest parts of "Don Juan," or the world will neither ill-use him nor acknowledge his genius.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

Plain Talks on Familiar Subjects. A Series of Popular Lectures. By J. G. Holland. Charles Scribner & Co., New York.

The Life of Abraham Lincoln. By. J. G. Holland. Gurdon Bill, Springfield, Mass.

Our Mutual Friend. By Charles Dickens. T. B. Peterson & Bros., Philadelphia.

Sherman and His Campaigns. By Col. S. M. Bowman and Lt.-Col. R. B. Irwin. Charles B. Richardson, New York.

A Treatise on some of the Insects Injurious to Vegetation. By Thaddeus William Harris, M.D. A New Edition. Edited by Charles L. Flint. Crosby & Ainsworth, Boston.

What Came Afterwards. By T. S. Arthur.—The Humbugs of the World. By P. T. Barnum. Carleton, New York.

History of the Rise and Influence of the Spirit of Rationalism in Europe. By W. E. H. Lecky, M.A. Two volumes. D. Appleton & Co., New York.

Journal of Eugenie de Guerin. Edited by G. S. Trebutien. Simpkin, Marshall & Co., London; Alexander Strahan & Co., New York.

Miscellanies from the Collected Writings of Edward Irving.—Meditations in Advent, on Creation and on Providence. By Henry Alford, D.D. Alexander Strahan, London and New York.

The Dutch Pilgrim Fathers, and Other Poems, Humorous and not Humorous. By Edward Hopper.—The Adventures of a Little French Boy. By Alfred de Bréhat. Hurd & Houghton, New York.

The Sunday Book of Poetry. Selected and Arranged by C. F. Alexander.—The Ballad Book. A Selection of the Choicest British Ballads. Edited by William Allingham. Sever & Francis, Cambridge.

Mr. Stewart's Intentions. By Frederick William Robinson. T. O. H. P. Burnham, Boston; O. S. Felt, New York.

Out-croppings. Being Selections of California Verse. A. Roman & Co., San Francisco; W. J. Widdleton, New York.

The Cradle of Rebellions. A History of the Secret Societies of France. By Lucien de la Hodde. John Bradburn, New York; J. B. Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia.

Fine Arts.

THE SIXTH ANNUAL EXHIBITION OF THE ARTISTS' FUND SOCIETY OF NEW YORK.

II.

Eastman Johnson is an honorable name in American art. No critical essay, however grave and carefully considered, but may worthily begin with the mention of it. If we assume, as we think it is safe to, that the meaning of a picture is of more importance than the language, however perfect, in which that meaning is expressed, we shall find no pictures exhibited in our galleries which are more valuable than Eastman Johnson's. There is true feeling in them, hearty sympathy for that which is worthy of sympathy, purpose, manly energy, and essential truthfulness. They are not spoiled by affectation, and that is great praise, although it is negative; if we should put it in other words, it would seem very positive praise to say that they are free from the worst fault of modern art.

It is indeed much to be regretted that the work of this true artist is not of greater technical merit. In comparison with most American painting, his work is technically excellent, but we do not feel that it is justice to our leading artists to compare their work with that of other Americans only. It is for their certain good as painters—as drawers of lines and layers of color—that the delicate and refined workmanship of the French painters is so often now-a-days hung beside their own comparatively archaic performances. For instance, the picture No. 98, "Improving the Eyelids," by C. Baugniet, is vastly inferior as a work of expression, means less and is worth less than Mr. Johnson's "Country Home," No. 128, in the same gallery. But compare the execution of the one with the execution of the other. Mr. Johnson's, indeed, is not bad work; it is not weak to puerility nor insufficient to falsehood; but it is weak and insufficient when compared to the works of the French highly-trained artizan. Look close and long into No. 98, and ponder it well. Notice the clear, sharp, skilful painting, the dexterous contrasting of surfaces and textures, the moderation and the quiet firmness which gets strength without exaggeration and brilliancy without (what cannot be had here) strong contrast. The important part of the picture is nearly all white, a lady in white peignoir, with a little pink about it, sitting at a toilet-table covered with white lace and muslin over pale blue silk. There is a white puff-ball on the table and a white china bowl for it. Now, see how well these whites are all managed, coming so close together, one upon another indeed, and with so little color to relieve them; see how downy, how hard and glossy, how crisp, how translucent, how flimsy and floating, they severally are, and how different each looks from all the others, while yet they remain pure white. Or take the brocading of the chair, if you choose, and the wall-paper with a scarcely visible pattern on it. We repeat, this is, compared with Mr. Johnson's, a valueless and ugly picture, being of an utterly unimportant subject and wholly ignoble in treatment, but it is wonderfully well painted. And, we repeat, Mr. Johnson's is not badly painted—there are forty pictures worse for one that is better in America—but his workmanship needs to be compared with the best, and, thus compared, it fares but badly.

How charming is "The Country Home," after all! A visitor to the gallery, presumably an acquaintance of the artist, called it, in our hearing, before he opened his catalogue, "The Maine Kitchen." That may well be its alias. There is a window through which you can see green fields, and by the window an old dame is at work. The window is right at the side of the kitchen chimney. There is no high mantel shelf, but the lintel over the fire-place advances from the wall above, and on it are a few shells, big "trumpet conchs," and others. The wall has been covered with a paper of rather good pattern, but over the chimney an injury is repaired with newspapers, or else the newspapers are wanted there for their own sake, for the wall is covered with them. On the floor is what seems to be a "store carpet," but it is almost hidden by home-made rugs, made of rags which have been dyed bright colors. The rug in front of the hearth is of excellent design, whoever wove it; whether she saw the design and had the taste to admire and copy it, or imagined the design and had the skill to embody it, she is an artist, and if it is original with her, she ought to be receiving a reasonable salary as designer in some large carpet manufactory.

"The Wood-Chopper," No. 146, we have not been able to examine carefully, but it seems to be of less interest, and is probably a study of a figure only. We mentioned in a former article the contribution picture, "Not Enough for Two," but a second notice is necessary that we may do justice to the beautiful baby, who thinks there would be enough for two if her selfish brother would divide.

In July we called Mr. Homer our first painter of the human figure in action, and the hasty sketch of "The Veteran in a New Field" is confirmation of that judgment. It is a very insufficient and headlong piece of work, slap-dash execution enough in corn-field and suggested trees; and we do not sympathize with such work when on public exhibition. Moreover, we are inclined to quarrel with the veteran for having forgotten, in his four years or less of campaigning, that it is with a cradle, and not with a scythe alone, that he should attack standing grain. And such grain! six feet high are its shortest stalks. But the spirit of the single figure takes the eye from the consideration of faults and foibles. The returned soldier's back is turned to the spectator, his right shoulder is dropped, and his right arm brought well around as the scythe has reached the end of its swing and hangs for one instant at rest. Among all the frantic struggles in the big Alhambra picture, noticed last week, there is not so much real human action as in this one man mowing.

In noticing Mr. Guy's contribution to the fund, we said he had sent a better picture to the exhibition. It is No. 105, "Making the Most of Circumstances." A little girl is seated on a common wooden chair, and has her feet on the rung of another; on the latter she has put a great, deep tin pan bottom up, and she is playing the piano with great vigor and abandon. It is the best picture by Mr. Guy that we remember to have seen.

Every half-year Mr. H. P. Gray, V.P.N.A., exhibits his two or three lifeless figure pictures. It is a severe infliction; for we have to study the work of one who stands so high by personal reputation among his brother artists, and yet we cannot find any merit in it. This year the great "Venus" picture, first exhibited in the spring of 1862, then called "The Apple of Discord," and now "The Judgment of Paris," is exhibited again. It is hard to say what is gained by the production or the exhibition of such pictures. They have none of them anything of importance to say, and their valueless messages are delivered in a stammering way at best, with no grace of language. No improvement from year to year makes itself manifest.

Per contra, Mr. Thomas Hicks has sent to the contribution collection a picture which has much astonished us. "The Vacant Chair," No. 40, is a work of real interest, the best Hicks the galleries have seen for many a day. There is careful, though not very skilful, painting everywhere in the interior. The picture should have been named after the four we set down as the best of the fund pictures.

The exhibition is creditable to Mr. Kensett, first, on account of the number of his works that are on exhibition. Besides five in the Suydam collection, and one sent as a contribution to the fund, there are eleven pictures and studies in the loan collection, of which nine are his own—studies not for sale. The catalogue sets forth that Mr. Kensett is president of the Artists' Fund Society. The association's highest officer is, then, not to be charged with indifference to its affairs, and so far as he is concerned we gladly recall our remarks of last week. And, secondly, some of these studies are very creditable to Mr. Kensett. He is not the only one of our artists whose studies from nature are better than their more pretentious pictures. And thus No. 112, "A Study" (rocks and trees and water), and still more forcibly No. 324, "A Study, Beverly, Mass." (rocks and many evergreen trees without the water), are the most interesting Kensetts we know. Of the painters who decline to finish minutely, or to go far into foreground detail, he seems to us to have the most success in giving the look of the things he paints. We are not surprised at the great popularity of Mr. Kensett as a painter, nor can he with justice be classed with the many who are "popular artists" merely. There is, however, no room for doubt that the draughtsman of the Beverly study, if he studied harder and more to the purpose, might be a far more powerful artist than he is; and people who know what landscape painting is cannot help regretting the opportunity lost.

Mr. J. R. Brevoort, who seems to have had an excellent opportunity last summer in Connecticut, has not lost it. His picture in the large gallery, No. 212, "Study from Nature on the Pequabic, Farmington, Conn.," is by far the best picture of his we have ever seen. The sky is bright (which is not true of its nearest neighbor, the grey and gloomy picture by Cole), and the trees are really green, though not quite the true green, and have growth in them. The picture is injured by the stiffness and formal look of the large leaves and water plants in the foreground, suggesting an insufficiency of previous work with the hard point in black and white.

How great is the change in American knowledge of art, from the time when Cole's landscapes were the unquestioned models of excellence to the time when so good a study as this Brevoort passes almost unnoticed among other studies of almost equal, of equal, or of superior merit! Such a picture as this, No. 210, "The Storm," would be fatal to any reputation, for it is not too much to say that the man who painted that could never paint a landscape worthy of a momentary glance of the eye—unless, indeed, he should do as some have done, and begin de novo. Of course all the well-known, publicly accessible works of Cole bear out the assumption that his landscape work is almost wholly valueless. It has done much mischief, and it is matter of sincere rejoicing that its influence has almost passed away.

Mr. Griswold's picture, No. 129, "A Study from Nature," representing green hills beyond a wide river, probably the Hudson, interesting as it is, is not a complete success. The great merit of his large pictures in the Academy exhibitions of this and last year has led us to expect to see, this fall, better summer work than this. We compare him not with others, but with himself. The green of the distant hills is, indeed, the best green we have ever seen on canvas of his, and the point of rock crowned by a dense bright-green arbor-vitæ is better foreground detail than he has generally, or perhaps ever, given. But the sky is flat and hard and untransparent; and the water, though it seems to have been carefully painted, is weak, expressionless; it looks conventional, though it was probably not painted in a conventional spirit. There are many possible causes for such fallings off as this, and people ought to expect none the less of Mr. Griswold next spring because of it.

There is a picture in the corridor which alone has raised its maker to the rank of artist. He has done good work before—which promised well, at least—and may have deserved the title of artist, but has never before seized and held it. We are speaking of Mr. Frank Anderson, and of his picture, No. 314, "The Hudson Highlands," evidently a study from nature. The subject is a fortunate one. The picture has composed itself into great harmony of form and color. It is wonderful to see how the road helps the whole character of the scene, by emphasizing the course of the river and leading the eye along the valley at the foot of the hills on the hither side. There is good rock drawing on the right hand, and good drawing of the anatomy of hills further away. The foreground rocks on the right hand are so good that we would not leave them without elaborate analysis if there were room for it. The cleavage is "the real thing," and the lichen clinging to the smooth faces of stone is very excellent in color and rendering.

The fault of too visible outlines and too sharp relief of form against form—as of trees against rocks, for instance—is in every part of the picture; but is a fault we are not entirely sorry to see. It is a much better fault than the opposite, and one which nearly every good workman falls into at one time or another. And so we congratulate Mr. Anderson on the hard and metallic look of his picture. But a fault which is not a doubtful evil is the common one of willingly stopping short of completeness. And this study, which at first seems very honestly finished, careful examination shows to be very faulty in this respect. Not to test the work by a very difficult part of it—the color of the water or the painting of the sky, for instance—let us consider the grass in the near foreground. Is it not too palpably a flat green tint with little dots and touches on it of other shades and colors? Take the road: a road is not a striped ribbon; a wheel-rut is not a stripe of color, but a ravine, with light, shadow, and shade in it, all three. Now, in a study from nature, as this very evidently is, there is no true studiousness in that impatience which skips the things it does not enjoy. The rocks, no doubt, were delightful; and the road at their foot was, of course, tame and uninteresting; but it is not a good spirit which can endure a badly painted road in contrast with thoroughly painted rocks. Those who remember Mr. Moore's picture in the spring exhibition of this year, "Study in the Catskill Valley," will remember also the road in that picture. That is the way to study from nature. To Mr. Anderson, who evidently means to study nature, we point out the example of Mr. Moore, who has studied nature, and with wonderful diligence. We have no wish that he should be another Moore, and we hope he will always be truly himself; but, after all, study from nature, if it is diligent, is very like other diligent study from nature, and has one quite essential element, the drawing of all things, small and great, with equal care. The rank of artist is not so relatively high as it once was, but is absolutely as high (that is, as difficult of attainment) as ever. One of its conditions is steady improvement, obtainable only by unceasing labor. For instance, if Mr. Anderson does not paint better than this next year, he will endanger whatever position he occupies now. The sky and water should be a great deal better next time, and the shadows on the rock should not stand alone as the only testimony to the fact of sunshine.

For Mr. Moore's mode of working we have, and have expressed, so profound a respect that we feel the beauty and real excellence of his picture this fall as an especial triumph. They were rather words of hope than of certainty that we could use in speaking of last spring's picture, except in regard to the drawing, bien entendu, which was good and almost faultless. But now No. 192, "Winter Study in the Catskills," is a very much better picture. It is smaller, a very little picture of a great deal of country; the snow-covered Catskill Mountains seen across ten miles of snow-covered country. The snow is deep. It has lain for awhile under the winter sun, for around each little tree it has melted away in a conical pit, the dark trunk having absorbed the heat, just as a black coal will sink into the snow three inches a day, while a white pebble will lie upon the surface. The shadows from a cluster of cedars fall right across the foreground upon the snow, almost pure blue. Away across the snowy fields are other cedars, in their reddish-brown winter dress, and bare, leafless maples, and fences and stone walls, and a few houses, all white with snow, and then come the mountains, their anatomy very visible now all the light and shadows are brought out in white and greyish blue. The sky is of almost inimitable purity, transparency, and beauty, and a few soft and fleecy white clouds float over the mountains.

Mr. Moore shows a power of steady growth and apparently illimitable aspiration. He now uses oil color with singular mastery. He draws trees better than any artist who exhibits in American galleries. He draws mountains and the general forms of nature better than any except one or two. His skies are unsurpassable, so far as we know, in contemporary landscape art. His color, though still too pale for the highest truth, and not allowing him to render the full force of effect that art can produce in rendering nature, is so entirely right in tendency and aim, and so steadily improves, that we may hope for all success in this in the future. The time will come when these little canvases will be of enormous pecuniary value, nor will the improvement we see beginning in American painters leave them behind for many a long year, if indeed future work of the painter's does not stand for ever as the work of an early master.

NOW READY.

GOLDEN-HAIRED GERTRUDE.

THEODORE TILTON'S STORY.

A NEW AND BEAUTIFUL MARRIAGE CERTIFICATE,

THE FINEST IN THE MARKET.

Price 20 Cents.

TIBBALS & WHITING,

37 Park Row, N. Y.

MEMOIRS

OF THE

LIFE OF WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE.

BY RICHARD GRANT WHITE.

WITH

AN ESSAY TOWARD THE EXPRESSION OF HIS GENIUS,

AND

An Account of the Rise and Progress of the English Drama.

Crown 8vo, $2 50.

SHAKESPEARE'S COMPLETE WORKS. The Plays, edited from the Authentic Folio, with various Readings from all the Editions and all the Commentaries, Notes, Introductory Remarks, an Historical Sketch of the Text, an Account of the Rise and Progress of the English Drama, a Memoir of the Poet, and an Essay upon his Genius. By RICHARD GRANT WHITE, author of "Shakespeare's Scholar." 12 vols. crown 8vo, cloth, $36. 12 vols. 16mo, cloth, $24.

This edition is universally admitted to excel all others in the correctness of its text, in the accuracy and fulness of its information about Shakespeare and his Works, and in the beauty of its appearance.

"We have subjected his volumes to a laborious examination, such as few books receive, ... and we repeat our honest persuasion, that Mr. White has thus far given us the best extant text, while the fulness of his notes gives his edition almost the value of a variorum."—James Russell Lowell.

"We have examined it with some care, and can speak with decision of its very great merits. It is characterized by taste, industry, and conscientiousness. We believe it to be, in all essential respects, the best—it is certainly the most beautiful—edition of Shakespeare."—Atlantic Monthly.

"The author has thoroughly studied his subject, has made himself acquainted with the labors of every original editor and annotator—with all important contributions to Shakespearian literature—with all that can serve to establish, to rectify, to elucidate the text—and has given us here the results of his research. . . . . No other edition known to us combines in so great a degree completeness, convenience, and beauty."—Christian Examiner.

LITTLE, BROWN & COMPANY,

110 Washington St., Boston.

THE WORLD'S PROGRESS:

A DICTIONARY OF DATES.

Being a chronological and alphabetical record of all leading events in the

HISTORY OF THE WORLD, from the Creation to the Inauguration of LINCOLN, embodying more than 1,000,000 Facts,

arranged for convenient reference, with a Map.

EDITED BY GEORGE P. PUTNAM, A.M.

Small 8vo, cloth, $3. A few copies on large paper, interleaved, bound in half morocco, $8.

NEARLY READY:

A NEW BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY:

CYCLOPÆDIA OF UNIVERSAL BIOGRAPHY.

BY PARKE GODWIN, ESQ., EDITOR OF THE EVENING POST.

With a supplement brought down to 1864. In one volume of nearly 1,000 pages.

 This is confidently offered as the best Biographical Dictionary in one volume in the English language.

G. P. PUTNAM: HURD & HOUGHTON,

401 BROADWAY.

PHRENOLOGY IN THE PULPIT—Discussions between two Clergymen; The Presbyterian Standard and The Western Presbyterian on Phrenology. Rich and racy in December PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL.

NEW JUVENILE BOOKS,

PUBLISHED THIS SEASON

BY

J. E. TILTON & COMPANY,

Boston.

[An Illustrated Catalogue of all our Books will be sent free on receipt of stamp to prepay return postage.]

THE CRUISE OF THE FROLIC. By WM. H. G. KINGSTON.....$1 50

GOLDEN HAIR. A Tale of the Pilgrim Fathers 1 50

ANTONY WAYMOUTH; The Gentlemen Adventurers. By the Author of "Dick Onslow among the Red-Skins"..... 1 50

POPULAR GERMAN STORIES. By HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN. With twelve illustrations. First series..... 1 25

POPULAR GERMAN STORIES. By HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN. With twelve illustrations. Second series..... 1 25

POPULAR GERMAN STORIES. By ANDERSEN and GRIMM. With twelve illustrations. Third series..... 1 25

POPULAR GERMAN STORIES. By ANDERSEN and GRIMM. With twelve illustrations. Fourth series..... 1 25

HANS ANDERSEN'S STORIES. 4 vols. 75 cts. each.

TINDER BOX, and other Stories 75
NAUGHTY BOY, and other Stories..... 75
GOLOSHES OF FORTUNE, and other Stories..... 75
WILD SWANS, and other Stories..... 75

These four are bound in muslin, extra, and put into a library box..... 3 00

FAIRY STORIES. By HANS ANDERSEN and GRIMM. 4 vols. 75 cts. each.

THE RED SHOES..... 75
THE DARNING NEEDLE..... 75
THE OLD HOUSE..... 75
THE UGLY DUCKLING..... 75

These four are bound in muslin, extra, and put into a library box..... 3 00

THE YOUNG RECRUIT; or, The Adventures of a Drummer-Boy. Illustrated... 1 00

JACK AND HIS PETS. By JOHN and MARY HOWITT.

LITTLE DICK AND THE ANGEL. By JOHN and MARY HOWITT.

☞ Any book published by us will be sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of advertised price.

NAPOLEON III.—His Portrait, Character, and Biography. Blind Tom, the Negro Pianist, Portrait and Character, in December PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL.

BAYARD TAYLOR.

G. P. PUTNAM: HURD & HOUGHTON,

401 BROADWAY,

HAVE NOW READY

NEW EDITIONS OF THE

POPULAR NOVELS OF BAYARD TAYLOR, viz.:

I. JOHN GODFREY'S FORTUNES. Post 8vo, $2 25.

II. HANNAH THURSTON. Post 8vo, $2.

 These stories of American life, having been through several large editions, are again reprinted to supply the constant demand, which seems to indicate that they will hold a permanent place in our literature.

A NEW NOVEL by BAYARD TAYLOR will be issued in the course of the season.

BAYARD TAYLOR'S TRAVELS. New editions now complete in 9 vols., viz.:
VIEWS A-FOOT (Europe), $2.
EL DORADO (California and Mexico), $2.
CENTRAL AFRICA (and the White Nile), $2.
LANDS OF THE SARACEN (Palestine, etc.), $2.
NORTHERN TRAVEL (Sweden, Denmark, etc.), $2.
GREECE AND RUSSIA, $2.
INDIA, CHINA, AND JAPAN, $2.
HOME AND ABROAD, $2.
HOME AND ABROAD, Second Series, $2.
BAYARD TAYLOR'S WRITINGS, 11 volumes, 12mo, $22.
The same, Caxton edition, fine paper, with engravings, 11 volumes post 8vo, $24 75 half calf, extra, $44.

HON. DANIEL S. DICKINSON—His Portrait, Character, and Biography—in December PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. 20 cts.

WASHINGTON IRVING.

G. P. PUTNAM: HURD & HOUGHTON,

HAVE JUST READY THE NEW VOLUMES OF THE

RIVERSIDE EDITION OF IRVING,

Completing the Series, viz.:

THE ALHAMBRA. 16mo, with engraving.
WOLFERT'S ROOST. 16mo, with engraving.

The volumes now ready are:

BRACEBRIDGE HALL,
CRAYON MISCELLANY,
OLIVER GOLDSMITH,
TALES OF A TRAVELLER,
SKETCH-BOOK,
KNICKERBOCKER,
} Elegantly printed, with a vignette on steel. 16mo, vellum cloth, $1 75 each.

This beautiful edition was intended to give all the miscellaneous works of Irving—that is, all except the historical works—in a form that should be most acceptable, as being at once portable, readable, and economical. The works are all newly stereotyped at Riverside Press, from new type, carefully chosen, and are printed on superfine paper and bound in vellum cloth.

The series (as above) complete in 8 volumes, in a box, price $14.

The set may be had also in gilt edges, or bound in half calf or half morocco.

ALSO, NOW READY:

A NEW IMPRESSION OF

IRVING'S WHOLE WORKS.

SUNNYSIDE EDITION, complete in 26 vols.
IRVING'S LIFE OF WASHINGTON, 5 vols.
LIFE AND LETTERS OF WASHINGTON IRVING. 4 vols,
} In various bindings.

G. P. PUTNAM: HURD & HOUGHTON,
401 BROADWAY.

LORD PALMERSTON—His Likeness, Description of Character, and Biography of this remarkable man, in December PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. $2 a year.

"THE FINEST AMERICAN BOOK."

A NEW ISSUE OF THAT MAGNIFICENT VOLUME,

THE ARTISTS' EDITION OF THE

SKETCH-BOOK,

BY WASHINGTON IRVING,

With more than 130 Original Drawings by Eminent Artists, including

HUNTINGTON, GRAY, LEUTZE, KENSETT,
BROWN, RICHARDS, BELLOWS, HOPPIN,
DARLEY, SHATTUCK, and HART.

Superbly printed in small folio, and bound as follows: Levant morocco, crushed, $20; morocco, $18; new crape cloth, bevelled, rich colors, gilt edges, $16.

Orders from the trade should be sent at once, to secure a supply, as only a small edition can be bound this season.

ALSO, IN FANCY BOARDS,

LEGEND OF SLEEPY HOLLOW,
Illustrated with ten fine engravings, $1 75.

RIP VAN WINKLE,
Illustrated with ten engravings, $1 50.

HUDSON LEGENDS,
With twenty engravings, cloth extra, $4 50; Turkey, $7.

G. P. PUTNAM: HURD & HOUGHTON, New York.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE TOUR OF DOCTOR SYNTAX
In Search of the Picturesque.

Illustrated with SEVENTY-FIVE Original Designs by ALFRED CROWQUILL.

This book, the Quixotic Tour of an eccentric Clergyman and Schoolmaster, enthusiastically in love with letters and the fine arts, which was once so universally popular, is but little known to modern readers.

This Edition is enriched by the illustrations of the ingenious and talented Alfred Crowquill, is full of wit and humor, and a first-rate antidote for the "blues."

One volume 18mo, cloth, price $1 25.

Sold by all booksellers, and mailed, post-paid, by the Publishers.

ROBERTS BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, BOSTON.

SCIENTIFIC BOOKS,

PUBLISHED BY

D. VAN NOSTRAND, 192 Broadway.

SPHERICAL ASTRONOMY. By F. BRUNNOW, Ph. Dr. Translated by the author from the second German edition. 1 vol. 8vo, cloth. $6 50.

SYSTEM OF ANALYTIC MECHANICS. By BENJAMIN PIERCE PERKINS, Professor of Astronomy and Mathematics in Harvard University. 1 vol. 4to, cloth. $10.

MINIFIE'S MECHANICAL DRAWING. A Text-Book of Geometrical Drawing for the use of Mechanics and Schools. 1 vol. 8vo, cloth. $4.

MINIFIE'S GEOMETRICAL DRAWING. Abridged from the above work for the use of schools. 12mo. $1 50.

LIMES, HYDRAULIC CEMENTS, AND MORTARS. By Q. A. GILLMORE, A.M. 1 vol. 8vo, cloth. $4.

RAILWAY PRACTICE IN THE ECONOMICAL GENERATION OF STEAM. By ALEXANDER L. HOLLEY, B.P., with 77 plates. 1 vol. folio, cloth. $12.

THE TELEGRAPH MANUAL: a Complete History and Description of the Semaphoric, Electric, and Magnetic Telegraphs of Europe, Asia, and America, with 625 illustrations. By TAL. P. SHAFFNER. 1 vol. 8vo, cloth. $6.

THE CONTRACTOR'S MANUAL AND BUILDER'S PRICE BOOK. By A. B. CLOUGH, Architect. 1 vol. 18mo, cloth. 50 cents.

PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE OF EMBANKING Lands from River Floods, as applied to the Levees of the Mississippi. By WILLIAM HENSON, Civil Engineer. 1 vol. 8vo, cloth. $2.

WOODBURY ON THE ARCH. Treatise on the various elements of stability in the well-proportioned arch; with numerous tables of the ultimate and actual thrust. By Captain D. P. WOODBURY, U. S. Corps of Engineers. 1 vol. 8vo, cloth.

Together with a large stock of Mining and Engineering Works.

☞ Any of the above sent free by mail on receipt of price.

"WORK FOR WOMEN"—What she can do—by Mrs. G. W. Wyllys—Anxiety—Thy Name—Poems—Spiders, variety, sizes, and how they live, in December No. PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. 20 cts.

THOMAS HOOD,
"THE PRINCE OF HUMORISTS."

G. P. PUTNAM: HURD & HOUGHTON,

HAVE NOW IN PRESS, AND WILL ISSUE SHORTLY,

TALES AND EXTRAVAGANZAS. By THOMAS HOOD. With numerous illustrations from the author's designs. Post 8vo, cloth, extra, $2 25.

NOW READY:

II.
HOOD'S UP THE RHINE. Illustrated from the author's designs. Post 8vo, $1 75.

III.
HOOD'S WHIMS AND ODDITIES. With the author's designs. Post 8vo, $1 75.

IV.
HOOD'S PROSE WORKS. With 300 illustrations. Complete in 3 vols. Post 8vo, cloth, extra, $7 50.

V.
HOOD'S POETICAL WORKS. Only complete edition. 3 vols. post 8vo, cloth, extra, $7 50.

VI.
HOOD'S PROSE AND POETICAL WORKS. Illustrated. Beautiful edition in vols. Post 8vo, cloth, extra, $13 50; half calf, extra, $24; half calf, ant., $24.

PURE MORALITY, RICH HUMOR, FOR THE FAMILY LIBRARY.

VALUABLE WORKS FOR SALE
BY WM. V. SPENCER,
134 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

THE POSITIVE PHILOSOPHY OF AUGUSTE COMTE. By John Stuart Mill. 1 vol. 12mo. Price..... $1 25

THE EXAMINATION OF THE PHILOSOPHY OF SIR WILLIAM HAMILTON. By John Stuart Mill. 2 vols. 12mo, Cloth, per vol..... 2 00

DISSERTATIONS AND DISCUSSIONS. By John Stuart Mill. 3 vols. 12mo. Cloth, per vol..... 2 25

OUR CONVICTS. By Miss Mary Carpenter. 2 vols. in one. pp. 293 and 380. Octavo..... 4 50

RELIGIOUS DUTY. By Frances Power Cobbe. 12mo. Cloth, bevelled edges, 1 75

A VIEW AT THE FOUNDATIONS; or, First Causes of Character. By Rev. W. M. Fernald. 16mo. Cloth..... 1 00

GOD IN HIS PROVIDENCE. By Rev. W. M. Fernald. 12mo. Cloth..... 1 50

☞ Copies of either of the above works sent by mail, free of postage, on receipt of the retail price. Address as above.

ANIMAL TYPES of HUMAN PHYSIOGNOMY—More about the NOSE. New Dictionary of Phrenology and Physiognomy, illustrated. No two faces alike—in December PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. $2 a year.

The Largest, the Cheapest, and the Best Children's Paper in America.

THE LITTLE CORPORAL.

A FIRST CLASS PAPER FOR BOYS AND GIRLS,

Published Monthly, in Chicago, Ill., 138 Lake Street,

By ALFRED L. SEWELL.

THE LITTLE CORPORAL contains sixteen pages of first class literary matter. It is intended that it shall contain better original Stories, Poems, and other reading for children, and more matter for the price, than any other children's paper on the continent. First No. published July, 1865.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE, ONE DOLLAR A YEAR, IN ADVANCE.

Though the paper itself is more than worth the price, yet for the sake of offering such an inducement as will ensure beyond all doubt a very large list of subscribers to start with, I have determined to give the following beautiful present to every subscriber for one year:

A Superb Quarto Steel Engraving,

THE CHILDREN'S PORTRAIT OF MR. LINCOLN,

Size, 9⅛ x 11¾ inches, engraved in the highest style of the art, expressly as a premium plate for this paper.

☞ SPECIMEN COPY OF THE PAPER SENT ON RECEIPT OF TEN CENTS.

Address ALFRED L. SEWELL,
Care of Dunlop, Sewell & Spalding,
CHICAGO, ILL.

PREMIUMS TO CLUBS.

Every person who shall send six subscribers, and six dollars, will receive as a premium one extra copy for one year, and also a copy of the above Engraving.

Other inducements advertised in the paper for larger clubs.

All pages are electrotyped, and back numbers can always be furnished.

READ WHAT THE PAPERS SAY:

The Pittsburg Christian Advocate says: "The best paper for children, published in this great country of ours, is The Little Corporal. It is a gem in the catalogue of monthlies."

Forney's Philadelphia Daily Press says of it: "Judging from the appearance of the two numbers before us, The Little Corporal is destined to become the great children's paper of America."

"A NEW CHILD'S PAPER.—We have received two copies of The Little Corporal. Judging from these specimens, it is the cleverest thing of its kind yet realized in America. Its whole appearance is in capital taste, and there is evidence in it that its editor has rare tact in catering for the wants of the little ones."—Roxbury [Mass.] Journal.

"Certainly, we have seen nothing in the shape of a child's paper which could compare with this, which comes to us from over the prairies."—Portland [Maine] Daily Press.

"We cannot say too much in favor of this beautiful paper."—Bryan [O.] Union Press.

"It already excels every children's paper we know of in this country."—Chicago Evening Journal.

"The children will be better and happier from reading it."—Henry [Ill.] Courier.

"Indeed, there is no paper of the kind published that approaches it as a juvenile journal."—Poughkeepsie Daily Press.

We might quote hundreds similar to the above, but these will suffice now.

TO CLERGYMEN THROUGHOUT THE UNITED STATES:

As editor of THE LITTLE CORPORAL, I hope to induce Ministers to favor the circulation of my paper among their children as a means of doing them good; and I ask each one to send me the name of some intelligent and respectable lady (for whose integrity he can vouch), who will be willing to energetically canvass her own neighborhood for subscribers to THE LITTLE CORPORAL.

Any Minister addressing me, as shown above, will receive by next mail Circulars, showing the opinions of the Press, and will also be informed in relation to the percentage allowed to canvassers; and may also obtain the paper for his own family at half price.

Address as above stated.

ASHMEAD & EVANS,

724 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA,

HAVE JUST PUBLISHED

SUNNY HOURS; or, Child Life of Tom and Mary. By NELLIE EYSTER. With four illustrations from designs by White. Price 90 cents.

"The spirit in which it is written will tend to greatly elevate and dignify the vein of thought and the intercourse of the young. It contains much valuable instruction in regard to education, personal habits, and moral duty, but introduced so skilfully that the reader scarcely discovers that it is serious instruction till he reflects, thus fulfilling the precept of Pope,

'Men must be taught as if you taught them not,
And things unknown proposed as things forgot.'

"It is a valuable contribution to juvenile literature, and no parent can err in putting it down at the head of the list of books for his children."—Samuel P. Bates, Dep. Supt. Com. Schools, Harrisburg, Pa.

BUSY HANDS AND PATIENT HEARTS; or, The Blind Boy of Dresden and his Friends. Translated from the German of Gustav Nieritz. Third edition now ready. Price 65 cents.

EDGEWORTH LIBRARY. Containing the most popular of Maria Edgeworth's writings for children, viz.: POPULAR TALES, MORAL TALES, and PARENTS' ASSISTANT. Bound uniformly in 3 vols. 16mo, English muslin, full gilt backs, in box, per set, price $4 50.

AUNT FANNY'S FAIRY STORIES. Translated from the German by CHARLES A. DANA, author of "Household Book of Poetry," etc., etc. Illustrated with fifty spirited engravings from original designs. Bound in fine English morocco muslin, gilt top. A companion volume to "Seaside and Fireside Fairies." Price $1 50.

SUMMER SONGS. A collection of poetry by H. H. M. Beautifully printed on heavy tinted paper. 18mo, extra cloth, gilt top, price $1 25.
Will be ready November 15.

THE WOOING OF MASTER FOX. By Sir EDWARD BULWER LYTTON, Bart. Illustrated in colors by White. The Wooing of Master Fox is handsomely illustrated with six designs in colors, and printed on heavy calendered paper. In beauty of style and execution this book will rival, if not surpass, anything of the kind yet published. Small quarto, in extra cloth, bevelled boards, gilt sides, price $1 50.

IN PRESS,

THE LIFE OF ROBERT OWEN. In one volume 12mo, cloth.

THE DOVE'S NEST, and Other Stories. By E. L. Llewellyn, author of "Agnes Lyle," "Piety and Pride," etc., with illustrations.

THE DESERTED MILL. By same author. 12mo, illustrated.

A NEW HISTORY OF CIVILIZATION—Destiny of America, Indians, American Geographical Society, Horace Mann, in December PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL.

DORAN'S ANNALS OF THE STAGE.

A NEW AND ELEGANT EDITION.

THE ANNALS OF THE ENGLISH STAGE, from Thomas Betterton to Edmund Kean—Actors, Authors, and Audiences. 2 vols. post 8vo. Elegantly printed, with rubricated title. Cloth, extra, $4 50; half calf or half Turkey, $8.

Also, now ready, a uniform edition of

Dr. DORAN'S WORKS, 9 Vols.

ANNALS OF THE ENGLISH STAGE. 2 vols.
THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND OF THE HOUSE OF HANOVER (the Wives of the Four Georges). 2 vols.
MONARCHS RETIRED FROM BUSINESS. 2 vols.
KNIGHTS AND THEIR DAYS. 1 vol.
TABLE TRAITS, with Something on Them. 1 vol.
HABITS AND MEN, with Remnants of Record touching the Makers of Both. 1 vol.

Sets, 9 vols., in box, cloth, extra.....$20 00
Half calf or half Turkey.....35 00
Cloth, vols., separately.....2 25

 Sent by mail on receipt of price.

WIDDLETON, PUBLISHER,
17 Mercer Street, New York.

A NEW NOVEL BY A NEW AUTHOR.

NOW READY,

MY OWN STORY;

A TALE OF AMERICAN LIFE.

By MARIAN LEIGH.

One Vol. 12mo.....$1 75.

HURD & HOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS,
401 Broadway.

WASHINGTON AND CÆSAR—The great Roman and the great American compared, with splendid engraved portraits, in December PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS OF PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL,

501 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

In addition to our main business of PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS, we are Headquarters for the following, viz.:

STEREOSCOPES AND STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS.

Of these we have an immense assortment, including War Scenes, American and Foreign Cities and Landscapes, Groups, Statuary, etc., etc.; also, Revolving Stereoscopes, for public or private exhibition. Our Catalogue will be sent to any address on receipt of

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS.

We were the first to introduce these into the United States, and we manufacture immense quantities in great variety, ranging in price from 50 cents to $50 each. Our ALBUMS have the reputation of being superior in beauty and durability to any others They will be sent by mail, FREE, on receipt of price.

☞ FINE ALBUMS MADE TO ORDER. ☜

CARD PHOTOGRAPHS.

Our Catalogue now embraces over FIVE THOUSAND different subjects, to which additions are continually being made of Portraits of Eminent Americans—viz., about

100 Major-Generals,	100 Lieut.-Colonels,	550 Statesmen
200 Brig.-Generals,	250 Other Officers,	130 Divines,
275 Colonels,	75 Navy Officers,	125 Authors,
40 Artists,	125 Stage,	50 Prominent Women.

3,000 Copies of Works of Art,

including reproductions of the most celebrated Engravings, Paintings, Statues, etc. Catalogues sent on receipt of stamp. An order for One Dozen PICTURES from our Catalogue will be filled on the receipt of $1 80, and sent by mail FREE.

Photographers and others ordering goods C. O. D., will please remit twenty-five per cent. of the amount with their orders.

☞ Soldiers' Pocket Albums for 18 pictures, 75 cents.

☞ The price and quality of our goods cannot fail to satisfy.

THE BEST TEXT-BOOK OF GEOLOGY.

Just Ready, a New Edition of

PROF. ST. JOHN'S

ELEMENTS OF GEOLOGY,

FOR COLLEGES AND SCHOOLS.

12mo, $1 50.

 This valuable work is used at Harvard College, in several of the leading Schools and Colleges of the United States.

G. P. PUTNAM: HURD & HOUGHTON,
401 Broadway.

BEAUTY, VIGOR, and DEVELOPMENT—Complexion, Plumpness, Rules of Health, Exercise, with illustrations and practical instruction, Gymnastics, for Men, Women, and Children, in December PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL.

The Artist Edition of TENNYSON'S POEMS.

ILLUSTRATED BY HAMMATT BILLINGS.

Will be ready SATURDAY, November 18. This Edition will be illustrated with

ORIGINAL DESIGNS,

WHICH WILL NOT BE USED IN ANY OTHER EDITION.

J. E. TILTON & CO.,
BOSTON, PUBLISHERS.

JUST PUBLISHED,

THE BEST NOVEL OF THE SEASON.

MR. STEWART'S INTENTIONS.

BY FREDERICK WILLIAM ROBINSON,

Author of "Grandmother's Money," "A Woman's Ransom," etc., etc. 8vo, paper. Price 75 cents.

T. O. H. P. BURNHAM, PUBLISHER,
143 Washington Street, Boston.

For sale by all Booksellers.

Sent by mail to any part of the United States, postage free, on receipt of 75 cents.

SYMMETRY OF CHARACTER—The American Baptist talks to illy-balanced Clergymen; The Christian and the Sinner. PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL.

STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS OF THE WAR,

obtained at great expense, and forming a

COMPLETE PHOTOGRAPHIC HISTORY

OF THE

GREAT UNION CONTEST.

Bull Run,	Dutch Gap,	Strawberry Plains,
Yorktown,	Pontoon Trains,	Deep Bottom,
Gettysburg,	Hanover Junction,	Belle Plain,
Fair Oaks,	Lookout Mountain,	Monitors,
Savage Station,	Chickahominy,	Chattanooga,
Fredericksburg,	City Point,	Fort Morgan,
Fairfax,	Nashville,	Atlanta,
Richmond,	Charleston,	Mobile,
Petersburg,	Etc., Etc.	Etc., Etc.

Everybody is interested in these memorable scenes.

Just published by

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
501 Broadway, New York.

☞ Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.

FINANCIAL.

FISK & HATCH,

BANKERS,

AND DEALERS IN

GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,

AND

AGENTS FOR THE SALE OF

THE 7.30 POPULAR LOAN,

5 NASSAU STREET,

(Continental Bank Building, near Wall Street).

DEPOSITS RECEIVED, COLLECTIONS MADE.

ALL KINDS OF UNITED STATES

AND OTHER POPULAR

FIRST CLASS SECURITIES

BOUGHT AND SOLD AT MARKET RATES.

COAL.

COAL DELIVERED AT COST.

GLOBE MUTUAL COAL COMPANY.

COAL AT ACTUAL COST TO SHAREHOLDERS.

Shares, $8. Par Value, $10.

Which entitles the party to ONE TON of Coal per year, at the actual cost, for every share subscribed.

On and after November 20, the price will be raised to TEN DOLLARS per share. See Prospectus of the Company.

OFFICES:

GLOBE BUILDINGS, 64 BROADWAY AND 19 NEW ST., NEAR WALL.

LET THE PEOPLE SAY WITH ONE VOICE, DOWN WITH THE PRICE OF COAL!

OFFICERS.

PRESIDENT.
THOMAS McELRATH, 8 West Washington Place.
VICE-PRESIDENT.
HIRAM HUSTON, Merchant, 114 Chambers Street.
TREASURER.
HENRY KING (of King, Sutton & Co., Bankers), 64 Broadway.
SECRETARY.
EDWARD B. SUTTON, 64 Broadway.
BANKERS TO THE COMPANY.
UNION TRUST COMPANY OF NEW YORK.
COUNSEL.
WM. H. ANTHON, 16 Exchange Place.
RICHARD B. KIMBALL, 49 Wall Street.
ADVISORY COMMITTEE.
J. H. PULESTON, of Butterfield's Overland Dispatch Co., 68 Broadway.
Hon. HORACE GREELEY, Editor N. Y. Tribune.
WM. PHELPS, of Phelps, Jewett & Co., 266 Canal Street.
JAY GOULD, President Troy and Rutland Railroad, Clarendon Hotel.
ALBERT H. NICOLAY, Auctioneer, 64 Broadway.
GEO. E. BELCHER, M.D., 50 East Twenty-first Street.
W. W. LELAND, of Leland Brothers.
A. D. JONES, late with Fisk & Hatch, Bankers.

BROWN, BROTHERS & CO.,

56 WALL STREET,

Issue, in New York, Circular Credits for Travellers, available in any part of the world.

LIFE INSURANCE.

Many are the praiseworthy and philanthropic institutions which dignify and adorn our age; none occupies a higher or more commanding position than LIFE INSURANCE, for it has saved from actual suffering and want many thousands who now bless the hand which, in anticipation of death, made the necessary preparation for their maintenance and support.

In every branch of business, whether manufacturing, commercial, or agricultural, success depends upon a variety of circumstances. A man may profit by his investment, or he may lose; the caprice of fortune rules with despotic sway over all branches of employment. This is even the case with many forms of insurance: in Fire and Marine the chances are supposed to be as a thousand to one that a building is not burned, or a vessel lost; a succession of good luck may enrich a company in a few years, while a calamitous fire might bankrupt nearly every company in the State. On the contrary, calculations for Life Insurance are based upon the laws of mortality, obtained from observations in various parts of the world for the last two hundred years. From these are deduced the probability of life, and tables are formed from which can be learned the average of expected life at any age.

We clip the following extract from the Insurance Monitor and Wall Street Review:

"The progress of the Union Mutual is shown in the subjoined statement of its affairs in the years 1864 and 1865:

Jan. 1 to Oct. 1, 1864.		Jan. 1 to Oct. 1, 1865.
No. of Policies, 1,475.		No. of Policies, 1,697.
$2,735,405 00	Amount Insured	$4,140,500 00
229,723 76	" Premium rec'd	423,463 63
288,676 25	Total receipts	476,314 09
145,334 74	" disbursements	195,108 24
143,341 51	Net receipts	281,205 85
55,492 00	Total losses	53,200 00

These figures show a remarkable state of prosperity."

UNION MUTUAL
LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

This is one of the oldest wholly Mutual Life Insurance Companies in the United States, and has been uniformly successful, having always made large returns in Cash dividends to all the Policy-holders.

NEW YORK OFFICE, 151 BROADWAY.
J. W. & H. JUDD, GENERAL AGENTS.

HOME
INSURANCE COMPANY
OF NEW YORK,
OFFICE, 135 BROADWAY.

Cash Capital, - - - - - - - $2,000,000 00
Assets, 1st Jan., 1865, - - - - - 3,765,503 42
Liabilities, - - - - - - - - 77,901 52

FIRE, MARINE, and INLAND
INSURANCE.

Agencies at all important points throughout the United States.

CHAS. J. MARTIN, PRESIDENT.
A. F. WILMARTH, VICE-PRESIDENT.
JOHN McGEE, Secretary.
J. H. WASHBURN, Assistant Secretary.
W. C. NICOLL, Superintendent Marine Department.

Insurance Scrip.
WILLIAM C. GILMAN,
46 PINE STREET, NEW YORK,
BUYS AND SELLS INSURANCE SCRIP.

PHENIX INSURANCE COMPANY,
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

OFFICES, 1 COURT STREET, BROOKLYN, N. Y.
" 139 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

CASH CAPITAL - - - - - - - - - - - $1,000,000 00
ASSETS - - - - - - - - - - - - 1,500,000 00

Insurance against Loss by Fire, Marine, Lake, Canal, and Inland Transportation.

STEPHEN CROWELL, President. EDGAR W. CROWELL, Vice-President.
PHILANDER SHAW, Secretary.

Marine and Fire Insurance.
METROPOLITAN INSURANCE COMPANY,
108 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Cash Capital, - - - - - - - - - - $1,000,000
Surplus, over - - - - - - - - - - - 400,000

This Company insures at customary rates of premium against ALL MARINE AND NLAND NAVIGATION RISKS on CARGO or FREIGHT; also, against LOSS or DAMAGE by FIRE.

IF PREMIUMS ARE PAID IN GOLD, LOSSES WILL BE PAID IN GOLD.

The Assured receive 75 per cent. of the net profits without incurring any liability, or in lieu thereof, at their option, a liberal discount upon the premium.

All losses equitably adjusted and promptly paid.

SCRIP DIVIDEND, declared Jan. 10, 1865, FIFTY per cent.

JAMES LORIMER GRAHAM, President.
ROBERT M. C. GRAHAM, Vice-President.
EDWARD A. STANSBURY, 2d Vice-President.
JOHN C. GOODRIDGE, Secretary.

HOFFMAN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.
Office, 161 Broadway, New York.

Cash Capital, - - - - - - - - - - $200,000

WILLIAM B. DIXON, President.
JOSEPH W. WILDEY, Secretary.

THE
MORRIS FIRE AND INLAND INSURANCE COMPANY,
COLUMBIAN BUILDING, 1 NASSAU STREET.
JUNE 1, 1865.

AUTHORIZED CAPITAL, $5,000,000.
CASH CAPITAL, PAID IN, AND SURPLUS, $885,040 57.

POLICIES OF INSURANCE AGAINST LOSS OR DAMAGE BY FIRE
Issued on the most Favorable Terms.

B. C. MORRIS, President.
WM. M. WHITNEY, Secretary.

The National Park Bank of New York.

CAPITAL - - - - $2,000,000. | SURPLUS - - - - $1,200,000.

This Bank will issue Certificates of Deposit, bearing interest, on favorable terms.

NEW YORK, Aug. 21, 1865. J. L. WORTH, Cashier.

E. W. CLARK & CO.,
BANKERS AND BROKERS,
35 SOUTH THIRD STREET, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS AND TREASURY NOTES, CERTIFICATES OF INDEBTEDNESS, QUARTERMASTERS' VOUCHERS, COMPOUND INTEREST NOTES.

STOCKS and BONDS of all kinds BOUGHT and SOLD on COMMISSION.

BAIRD & BRADLEY,
CHICAGO
LOAN AND COLLECTION AGENCY.

Investments for a term of years made for Eastern Capitalists. Corporations and Estates amply secured by First Mortgage on Real Estate in Chicago and vicinity, with semi-annual interest payable at any point East.

Real Estate purchased, managed, and sold for Eastern parties.

Notes collected and avails promptly remitted.

Where I Can Ensure,

WHAT I CAN ENSURE AGAINST,

AND

WHAT IT WILL COST ME.

I CAN ENSURE IN THE

NATIONAL LIFE AND TRAVELLERS' INSURANCE CO.,

243 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

OPPOSITE CITY HALL PARK,

Authorized Capital, - - - Half a Million,

AGAINST EVERY DESCRIPTION OF ACCIDENTS that can happen to me on Sea or Land.

I can ensure my life on the purely Mutual Plan, either by an Endowment, or a Life Policy, or a Ten-year Non-forfeiture Policy.

$25 secures a General Accident Policy for $5,000, with a Weekly Compensation of $25.

$10 secures a Marine Policy for $10,000 for a voyage to any European port, covering loss of life at sea from accident.

$167 35 per annum secures an Endowment Policy for $5,000, with profits payable at the age of 50, or at death to a person 25 years of age.

$96 90 per annum secures a Life Policy for $5,000, with profits, to a person 25 years of age. A Loan of one-third of the Premium, or Life, or Endowment Policy will be given, if required, without note.

POLICIES ISSUED AT ONCE.

NO MEDICAL EXAMINATION REQUIRED for General Accident Policies.

FIRST CLASS FIRE INSURANCE

ON THE PARTICIPATION PLAN.

MARKET FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY,

37 WALL STREET, CORNER OF JAUNCEY COURT.

CONDITION OF THE COMPANY.

ABSTRACT OF THE ANNUAL REPORT OF DEC. 31, 1864.

TOTAL ASSETS		$414,729 18
Viz.—Bonds and Mortgages	$134,672 00
Temporary Loans	92,630 00
Real Estate	10,000 00
100 Shares Mer. Ex. Bank	5,000 00
Government Sec., value	144,514 00
Cash on hand	18,042 34
Interest due	3,085 58
Premiums due	6,785 26
PRESENT LIABILITIES		$15,995 92
NET SURPLUS		198,733 26

This Company will continue, as heretofore, to insure respectable parties against DISASTER BY FIRE

At fair and remunerating rates; extending, according to the terms on its Policies, the advantage of the

PARTICIPATION PLAN OF THE COMPANY,

pursued by it for several years past, with such great success and popularity, and profit to its customers: whereby

(75) SEVENTY-FIVE PER CENT. (75)

of the Profits, instead of being withdrawn from the Company in Dividends to Stockholders, is invested as a "SCRIP FUND," and held for greater protection of its Policyholders; and Scrip, bearing interest, is issued to Customers therefor: thus, IN THIS COMPANY, those who furnish the business, AND PAY THE PREMIUMS, derive the largest share of advantages; and when the accumulations of the SCRIP FUND shall exceed

FIVE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS,

the excess will be applied to PAY OFF the Scrip IN CASH in the order of its issue.

☞ The liberal and prompt adjustment of Claims for Loss, WHEN FAIR AND SQUARE, is a specialty with this Company.

NOTE.—This Company does not insure on the hazards of RIVER, LAKE, or INLAND NAVIGATION; confining itself strictly to a legitimate FIRE INSURANCE BUSINESS.

ASHER TAYLOR, President.

H. P. FREEMAN, Secretary.

FOURTH NATIONAL BANK,

27 & 29 PINE ST., NEW YORK,

Has for sale U. S. 7 3-10 Notes, all sizes; also, One Year Certificates and all other Government Loans.

P. C. CALHOUN, President.

B. SEAMAN, Cashier.

ANTHONY LANE, Asst. Cashier.

NIAGARA FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY,

OFFICE, 12 WALL STREET.

CASH CAPITAL INCREASED TO	$1,000,000
SURPLUS, JAN. 1, 1865,	275,253

Losses equitably adjusted and promptly paid.

CHARTERED 1850.

Cash Dividends paid in fourteen years, 248 per cent.

P. NOTMAN, Secretary. JONATHAN D. STEELE, President.

The Nation:

A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

THIS journal will not be the organ of any party, sect, or body. It will, on the contrary, make an earnest effort to bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit, and to wage war upon the vices of violence, exaggeration, and misrepresentation by which so much of the political writing of the day is marred.

The criticism of books and works of art will form one of its most prominent features; and pains will be taken to have this task performed in every case by writers possessing special qualifications for it.

It embraces among its regular or occasional contributors the following names:

HENRY W. LONGFELLOW,
JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL,
JOHN G. WHITTIER,
SAMUEL ELIOT (Ex-President Trin. College, Hartford),
PROFESSOR TORREY (Harvard),
DR. FRANCIS LIEBER,
PROFESSOR GOLDWIN SMITH (Oxford),
PROFESSOR CHILD (Harvard),
HENRY JAMES,
CHARLES E. NORTON,
JUDGE BOND (Baltimore),
EDMUND QUINCY,
PROFESSOR W. D. WHITNEY (Yale),
PROFESSOR D. C. GILMAN (Yale),
JUDGE DALY,
PROFESSOR DWIGHT (Columbia College),
PROFESSOR TAYLER LEWIS (Schenectady),
N. TOURGUENEFF,
AUGUSTE LAUGEL,
JUDGE WAYLAND,
FREDERICK LAW OLMSTED,
REV. DR. MCCLINTOCK,
REV. DR. JOS. P. THOMPSON,
REV. PHILLIPS BROOKS,
REV. DR. BELLOWS,
C. J. STILLÉ,
HENRY T. TUCKERMAN,
BAYARD TAYLOR,
C. A. BRISTED,
C. L. BRACE,
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON,
SYDNEY GEORGE FISHER,
THEODORE TILTON,
JAMES PARTON,
GAIL HAMILTON.

TERMS:—Six Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Four Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, PUBLISHER,
130 Nassau street, N. Y.

MARVIN'S

PATENT FIRE AND BURGLAR SAFE.

Superior to any others in the following particulars

They are more fire-proof.

They are more burglar-proof.

They are perfectly dry.

They do not lose their fire-proof qualities by age.

Manufactured only by

MARVIN & CO., 265 Broadway.
721 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

Send for a descriptive Circular.

BOYNTON'S FURNACES.

Boynton's Brick and Portable Furnaces, Fire-place and Parlor Heaters, Kitcheners, Ranges, Parlor and Office Stoves, are warranted to give satisfaction. Send for circular.

RICHARDSON, BOYNTON & CO.,
334 Water Street, near Beekman, New York.

ONE PRICE ONLY.

Writing Paper cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.

Envelopes cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.

Blank Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.

Memorandum Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street

Pens and Pencils cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.

Pocket-Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.

Portfolios cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.

Cash Boxes cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.

Stationers' Tinware cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.

Account Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.

Black, Blue, and Red Ink cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau St.

Arnold & Boss's Fluid cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau St.

Scrap Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.

KEYS'

AMERICAN UNION WRITING FLUID, AND COPYING INKS.

THE CHEAPEST AND THE BEST.

Always clean, and flowing freely from the pen, these inks are rapidly taking the place of all others, and merit the special attention of the penman.

On trial they will be found superior in every respect to the imported inks now in use.

REEVES & CO.,

(Successors to J. G. Keys,)

MANUFACTURERS AND SOLE PROPRIETORS,
303 Washington Street (near Reade), N. Y.

Economical Housekeepers Use

PYLE'S SALERATUS. | PYLE'S O. K. SOAP.
PYLE'S CREAM TARTAR. | PYLE'S BLUEING POWDER.

Articles designed for all who want the best goods, full weight. Sold by best Grocers everywhere. Each package bears the name of JAMES PYLE, Manufacturer, New York.

WILLIAM KNABE & CO.'S

Celebrated Gold Medal

GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT

PIANOS.

These instruments have been for thirty years before the public, in competition with other instruments of first-class makers. They have, throughout that long period, maintained their reputation among the profession and the public as being unsurpassed in every quality found in a first-class Piano.

650 BROADWAY,

AND

CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE, CHICAGO, ILL.

J. BAUER & CO., Agents.

SPECIAL GOLD MEDAL.

(From Watson's Weekly Art Journal.)

AWARDS TO MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—A Gold Medal was awarded, at the late Fair of the American Institute, to CARHART, NEEDHAM & CO., for the best Reed Instrument on exhibition—a most just testimonial.

"They are an exceedingly good substitute for an Organ, and I can speak of them in the highest terms."
GEO. W. MORGAN.

"I have found them to be the finest Instruments of the class I ever saw."
GEO. F. BRISTOW.

"They are entitled to be ranked as the first and best among instruments of their class."
WM. A. KING.

"The tone is incomparable, and they are far in advance of any other instrument of a similar kind."
CHARLES FRADEL.

THE PARLOR ORGAN,

with the recent improvements of Mr. J. Carhart, is, without exception, far superior in QUALITY, POWER, SWEETNESS, VARIETY and EXPRESSION OF TONE, DURABILITY OF CONSTRUCTION, ELEGANCE OF CASE—POSSESSING IMPROVEMENTS APPLIED BY US ONLY.

A Descriptive Catalogue and Price List sent by mail.

CARHART, NEEDHAM & CO.,
97 East Twenty-third St., New York.

PIANOS.

RAVEN & BACON'S PIANO-FORTES.

(ESTABLISHED 1829.)

A full assortment of these Instruments, which have been well known in the New York market for more than thirty years, constantly on hand. We are continually adding improvements to our Pianos, and our facilities enable us to furnish them at terms and prices satisfactory to purchasers. Pictorial circulars sent by mail.

Wareroom, 135 Grand St., near Broadway, New York.

The Horace Waters

Grand, Square, and Upright PIANOS, MELODEONS, HARMONIUMS, and CABINET ORGANS. Wholesale and retail, at reduced prices. To let, and rent allowed if purchased. Monthly payments received for the same. Second-hand Pianos at bargains, prices $60, $75, $100, $125, $150, $175, $200, and $225. Factory and Warerooms, 481 Broadway. Cash paid for second-hand Pianos.

GROVER & BAKER'S

SEWING MACHINES

WERE AWARDED THE HIGHEST PREMIUMS
At the State Fairs of

New York,	Illinois,	Virginia,
New Jersey,	Michigan,	N. Carolina,
Vermont,	Wisconsin,	Tennessee,
Pennsylvania,	Iowa,	Alabama,
Ohio,	Kentucky,	Oregon,
Indiana,	Missouri,	California,

And at numerous Institute and County Fairs, including all the Fairs at which they were exhibited the past three years.

The GROVER & BAKER ELASTIC-STITCH SEWING MACHINE is superior to all others, for the following reasons:

1. The seam is stronger and more elastic than any other.
2. It is more easily managed, and is capable of doing a greater variety and range of work than any other.
3. It is capable of doing all the varieties of sewing done by other machines, and, in addition, executes beautiful embroidery and ornamental work.

GROVER & BAKER S. M. CO.,
495 Broadway, New York.

ESTABLISHED IN 1823.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT PIANOS.

At the Great Mechanics' Fair, held in Boston in October, 1865, Messrs. CHICKERING & SONS were awarded

THE FIRST GOLD MEDAL

For the BEST GRAND PIANOS.

The FIRST SILVER MEDAL
For the BEST SQUARE PIANOS.

The FIRST SILVER MEDAL
For the BEST UPRIGHT PIANOS.

This Fair called forth an UNUSUAL COMPETITION—35 Pianos being represented. The report of the judges is very thorough and very decided on the merits of the CHICKERING PIANO.

THE MICHIGAN STATE FAIR, of 1865, awards Chickering & Sons THREE FIRST PRIZES.

THE INDIANA STATE FAIR, of 1865, awards Chickering & Sons THREE FIRST PRIZES.

THE IOWA STATE FAIR, of 1865, awards Chickering & Sons TWO FIRST PRIZES.

THE WISCONSIN STATE FAIR, of 1865, awards Chickering & Sons TWO FIRST PRIZES.

FOURTEEN FIRST-CLASS GOLD AND SILVER MEDALS IN THE MONTHS OF SEPTEMBER AND OCTOBER, 1865.

Making a total of FIFTY-FIVE PRIZE MEDALS awarded to CHICKERING & SONS, as

FIRST PREMIUMS OVER ALL COMPETITION for the SUPERIORITY OF THEIR PIANOS.

OPINIONS OF EMINENT ARTISTS.

THALBERG.

"I consider Chickering & Sons' Pianos, beyond comparison, the best I have ever seen in America."

GOTTSCHALK.

"I consider Chickering & Sons' Pianos superior to any in the world."

WEHLI.

"I believe that, in every particular, your Pianos are superior to any I have ever seen in this country or in Europe."

SATTER.

"For volume and fine quality of tone, with nicety of articulation, the Chickering Pianos are unequalled."

BASSINI.

"I always use and always recommend your Pianos to my pupils and friends."

MUZIO.

"I consider your Pianos the finest I have ever played upon."

Watson's Art Journal, of November 11, in its criticism of Mme. Abel's concert, says: "Madame Abel performed on the new Chickering Grand, which took the Gold Medal at the Fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanics' Association, held at Boston last month.

"IT IS THE NOBLEST INSTRUMENT WE EVER HEARD IN A CONCERT-ROOM.

"Grand in power, without noise; capable of sustaining any amount of forcing, without losing the rich purity of its tones; clear, bright, and beautiful throughout the entire range, every tone is a pearl of sound, sympathetic and vocal as the finest human voice cultivated to the highest point of perfection."

AGRAFFE BRIDGE.

Pianos with or without the Agraffe Bridge, which we have constantly used for the past twelve years.

WAREROOMS.

652 BROADWAY, N. Y.
246 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.
914 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

Clothing for Fall and Winter.

OVERCOATS
OF
MOSCOW, CHINCHILLE, ESKIMO, and CASTOR BEAVERS.

BUSINESS AND WALKING SUITS FOR MEN.

DRESS AND SCHOOL SUITS FOR BOYS,
VERY SUPERIOR IN EVERY RESPECT,
and
LOW IN PRICE.

DEVLIN & CO.,

BROADWAY, COR. GRAND STREET,
BROADWAY, COR. WARREN STREET, N. Y.

THE BEST SEWING-MACHINES IN THE WORLD.

THE WEED MACHINES,

With all their valuable improvements, entirely overcome all imperfections. They are superior to all others for family and manufacturing purposes, simple in construction, durable in all their parts, and readily understood. They have certainty of stitch on all kinds of fabrics, and are adapted to a wide range of work without change or adjustment, using all kinds of thread. Will hem, fell, bind, gather, braid, tuck, quilt, cord, and, in fact, do all kinds of work required by families or manufacturers. We invite all persons in search of an instrument to execute any kind of sewing now done by machinery to inspect them, and recommend all parties engaging in the sale of sewing-machines to make sure they secure the best by examining the WEED before purchasing. They make the shuttle-stitch, which cannot be excelled for firmness, elasticity, durability, and elegance of finish. They have received the highest premiums in every instance where they have been exhibited in competition with other standard machines. The company being duly licensed, the machines are protected against infringements or litigation.

Reliable agents wanted, to whom we offer great inducements. Every explanation will be cheerfully given to all, whether they wish to purchase or not. Descriptive circulars, together with specimens of their work, will be furnished to all who desire them by mail or otherwise.

WEED SEWING-MACHINE CO.,
STORE, 506 BROADWAY, N. Y.

FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE CO.,

505 BROADWAY, N. Y.

THE BEST FAMILY MACHINE IN THE WORLD.

Wonderful REVERSIBLE FEED MOTION. SELF-ADJUSTING Tension. No Snarling and Breaking Threads. FOUR distinct Stitches.

WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES,

625 BROADWAY, N. Y.,

MAKE THE

LOCK-STITCH,

and rank highest on account of the elasticity, permanence, beauty, and general desirableness of the stitching, when done, and the wide range of its application.—Report of American Institute.

FINKLE & LYON'S

IMPROVED

LOCK-STITCH SEWING-MACHINE.

N. B.—Money refunded if the Machine is not preferred to any in market for family use.

AGENTS WANTED. 538 Broadway, N. Y.

Lock-Stitch Sewing Machines

FOR FAMILIES AND MANUFACTURERS.

THE HOWE MACHINE COMPANY,

ELIAS HOWE, Jr., Pres.,

629 BROADWAY.

Agents wanted.

SCHOOL FURNITURE!

Lecture-Room and Sabbath-School Settees

IN EVERY STYLE,

MANUFACTURED BY

ROBERT PATON,

24 GROVE STREET, NEW YORK.

DEMULCENT SOAP,

FOR CHAPPED AND TENDER HANDS,

FOR TOILET AND BATH USE.

MANUFACTURED ONLY BY

J. C. HULL'S SON,

32 PARK ROW, N. Y.

Upwards of 100 styles of Toilet and Staple Soaps. For sale by all Dealers.

DECORATED DINNER SETS.

A large variety now opening at

OVINGTON BROTHERS',
Fulton St., near Clark St., Brooklyn.

JOHN V. FARWELL & CO.,

WHOLESALE

DRY GOODS AND NOTIONS,

42, 44 & 46 WABASH AVENUE,
CHICAGO,

AND NO. 5 COLLEGE PLACE, NEW YORK.

MAKE YOUR OWN SOAP WITH

B. T. BABBITT'S

Pure Concentrated Potash,

OR READY SOAP-MAKER.

Warranted double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other saponifier or lye in the market. Put up in cans of one pound, two pounds, three pounds, six pounds, and twelve pounds, with full directions in English and German for making Hard and Soft Soap. One pound will make fifteen gallons of Soft Soap. No lime is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest Potash in market.

B. T. BABBITT,
64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington st., N. Y.

PHELPS, DODGE & CO.

Importers and Dealers in

TIN-PLATE, SHEET-IRON, COPPER, BLOCK-TIN, WIRE, AND METALS GENERALLY;

Manufacturers of

COPPER, BRASS, and WIRE,

19 and 21 Cliff st., New York.

SILVER PLATED

TEA SETS, URNS, TABLE CASTERS, WINE CASTERS, etc., etc., of our own make.

OVINGTON BROTHERS,
Fulton St., near Clark St., Brooklyn.

Improvements in Piano-fortes.

One of the simplest and most truly valuable improvements yet made in the Piano-forte is that invented and patented by Mr. David Decker, of the firm of

DECKER BROTHERS, 91 BLEECKER STREET,

in this city. By correcting the only imperfections arising from the use of the full iron-plate, and that, too, by not detracting in the slightest degree from its many positive advantages, the Messrs. DECKER have developed in their instruments a tone at once admirable for its purity, fulness, prolongation, and sweetness, and the high estimation in which their improvement is held is well shown in the rapidly increasing business of their firm.—Tribune.

OAKLEY & MASON,

PUBLISHERS, BOOKSELLERS, STATIONERS,

AND BLANK BOOK MANUFACTURERS,

21 MURRAY STREET,

OLD STAND OF PRATT, OAKLEY & CO.,

Between Broadway and Church Street, New York.

SPLENDID PREMIUMS!

PIANOS, MELODEONS, SEWING MACHINES, LIBRARIES, etc., GIVEN to parties getting up Clubs for THE ILLUSTRATED PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL for 1866. See December No., 20 cents, or send stamp for particulars, to FOWLER & WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

VANDERLIP & TAYLOR,

LATE

A. RANKIN & CO.,

96 Bowery,

165 Fifth Av.,

and 939 Broadway,

cor. Twenty-second St.

A GREAT ASSORTMENT OF SILKS,

MERINO AND WOOLEN

UNDER-GARMENTS,

FOR FALL AND WINTER.

Gloves of all kinds,

Ties,

Scarfs,

Cardigan Jackets, etc.

DRESS SHIRTS MADE TO ORDER.

ESTABLISHED 1823.

MANTEL ORNAMENTS.

CHINA VASES, UNIQUE STYLES and VERY RICH. BISQUE and PARIAN STATUETTES and GROUPS. FINE BRONZE, etc., etc.

OVINGTON BROTHERS,
Fulton St., near Clark St., Brooklyn.

FRANCIS & LOUTREL,

45 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK,

STATIONERS, STEAM PRINTERS,

AND

BLANK-BOOK MANUFACTURERS,

Supply everything in their line at lowest prices. Every kind of Writing Paper, Account Books, Fancy and Staple Stationery, Diaries for 1866, Expense Books, etc. Orders solicited.

WILLIAM SELLERS & CO.,

1,600 HAMILTON STREET, PHILADELPHIA,

MACHINISTS', FOUNDERS', SMITHS' and BOILER-MAKERS' TOOLS.

SHAFTING, with Ball and Socket Bearings and Double Cone Vice-Couplings, admitting of the easiest possible adjustment.

A complete assortment of PULLEY and WHEEL PATTERNS, from which Castings or finished work will be furnished.

RAILWAY EQUIPMENTS, TURNING and TRANSFE TABLES, and PIVOT BRIDGES.

Sole Manufacturers and Licensees of
GIFFARD'S INJECTOR,
For Feeding Boilers.

WILLIAM SELLERS. JOHN SELLERS, JR.

AMERICAN WATCHES.

J. H. JOHNSTON & CO., 150 BOWERY, N. Y., sell at lowest rates

American Gold and Silver Watches,
English Lever Watches,
Fine Swiss Watches.

The handsomest Detached Lever Watch in the market for $25.

PURE GOLD WEDDING RINGS.

Fine Jewelry, diamonds, silver ware, and best quality silver-plated ware of our own manufacture.

Articles sent free of expense to all parts of the country and satisfaction guaranteed.

FRENCH CLOCKS.

A splendid assortment in MARBLE and BRONZE. BRONZE STATUETTES, etc., etc.

OVINGTON BROTHERS,
Fulton St., near Clark St., Brooklyn.

COOKING AND HEATING BY GAS.

EAGLE GAS COOKING STOVES AND RANGES,

GUARANTEED TO BAKE PERFECTLY.

HEATING STOVES, GUARANTEED TO HEAT ROOMS PERFECTLY.

Also,

KEROSENE OIL COOKING STOVES,

The best in market, have regular SIDE OVENS, and guaranteed to BAKE PERFECTLY, and not to Smoke or Smell.

EAGLE GAS STOVE MFG. CO.,
474 Broadway, N. Y.

☞ Illustrated Catalogues sent free.

DECKER & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS OF PIANO-FORTES,

419 BROOME STREET,

One Block East of Broadway, N. Y.

These Pianos stand unrivalled in regard to their singing quality; volume and purity of tone; sympathetic, elastic, and even touch; and durability of construction, which enables them to remain in tune much longer than ordinary Pianos.

JESSUP & MOORE,

27 NORTH SIXTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
128 WILLIAM STREET, NEW YORK,

PAPER MANUFACTURERS,

Have on hand, or make to order at short notice, all qualities of Book and News Printing Papers at current market prices.

UNITED STATES STEEL PEN WORKS,

FACTORY, CAMDEN, N. J.

R. ESTERBROOK & CO.,

STEEL PEN MANUFACTURERS,

WAREHOUSES, { 403 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia. / 42 JOHN STREET, New York.

Samples and prices on application. Lots made to order of any pattern or stamp required.

CAUTION.

These Pens are of genuine American manufacture, and equal in finish, elasticity, and fineness of point to the best imported. They are, therefore, sure to gain the confidence of the American public. The fac-simile of our signature is sufficient security against foreign imitation.

R. ESTERBROOK & CO.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

OF THE OLD STANDARD QUALITY.

TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Warranted.

or Descriptive Name, and Designating Number.
New Series, Good and Cheap, from No. 700 to No. 761.

TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Birmingham. With Designating Numbers.

For sale by

JOSEPH GILLOTT & SONS,
91 John Street, New York.
HENRY OWEN, Sole Agent.

THE BEST PIANO-FORTE.

ONE THAT WILL LAST A LIFETIME.

Seven First Premiums in four weeks; two Gold and one Silver Medals; six State Fairs and the American Institute have decided that WM. B. BRADBURY'S New Scale Piano-Fortes are "THE BEST." They "Excel all others in the Essentials of a Perfect Piano-Forte," viz., in Touch, Tone, Power, and thorough Workmanship.

"They are the best square piano-fortes I have ever played upon."—HARRY SANDERSON.

"They are very superior instruments."—GOTTSCHALK.

"Their superior excellence fully proven."—W. BERGE.

"I admire them in the highest degree."—G. W. MORGAN.

Call or send for a Circular, with Illustrations and Testimonials of the most eminent artists and amateurs.

WM. B. BRADBURY,
425 AND 427 BROOME STREET, NEW YORK.

The Nation.

VOL. I.—NO. 22. THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1865. { SIX DOLLARS PER ANNUM / SINGLE COPIES, 15 CENTS

CONTENTS.

THE WEEK..... 673
MINOR TOPICS..... 677
The Solution of the Mexican Problem 678
The Insurrection in Jamaica..... 678
CORRESPONDENCE:
The Rhyme of the Master's Mate.... 679
Winter Davis on Reconstruction.... 680
The South as It Is..... 682
England.—The Dangers of the New Cabinet..... 683
"Receptions"..... 685
A Pilgrimage to Petrarch's House at Arquà..... 685
LITERATURE:
Literary Notes..... 688
Pruning Forest Trees..... 690
The Roman Catholic Church in America..... 691
FINE ARTS:
The Sixth Annual Exhibition of the Artists' Fund Society of New York..... 692
Music.—The Opera..... 693
FINANCIAL REVIEW..... 699

Six Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Four Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, PUBLISHER, 130 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

The Week.

GENERAL GRANT was entertained last week at the Fifth Avenue Hotel by an enormous crowd, and the newspapers are loud in their complaints of the disorder which prevailed inside the building. But in this they are unreasonable. When there is in any given space as many people as it can possibly contain, order, in the strict sense of the word, can only be maintained by everybody standing quite still. All movement produces confusion. But when people collect for the express purpose of seeing General Grant, and he can only be seen at one point, of course everybody wants to reach it, and the universal struggling produces universal discomfort, and a prevailing impression that somebody is to blame. Whether it would not promote the general convenience on occasions of this sort, which are now becoming so common, to give up the time-honored practice of hand-shaking, we have discussed in another column.

THE Shenandoah has surrendered herself in the Mersey to H.B.M.S. Donegal, and the captain and crew have been allowed to go scot free. In spite of all the nonsense talked by the English Tory press as to the non-liability of the captain for the depredations committed after he had received notice of the downfall of the Confederacy, the only good reason that can be assigned for not holding him for trial is the absence of evidence. This our Government ought to provide, and, when ready, ought to ask that he be tried in England or surrendered for trial here. There is strong reason for believing that, under the extradition treaty, his surrender, even as a pirate, might be fairly demanded on the ground that the offence, though committed on the high seas, was committed on American vessels, or, in other words, on American soil.

THE official returns of the Ohio election, including the home and soldiers' vote, show an aggregate of 417,720, and a majority for Cox over Morgan of 29,936. The Union majority in Pennsylvania, also from official returns, amounts to 22,600.

WE print elsewhere a long letter from Henry Winter Davis, presenting in a forcible shape nearly all that can be said in favor of negro suffrage at the South. To the temper of portions of the letter we might offer several objections, though none of them would affect the weight of his argument. But when he calls for negro suffrage, and in the same breath finds fault with the President for not withdrawing the troops from the South, we feel bound to say that his zeal outruns his discretion. The bestowal of the franchise after the close of the war, without military protection, would, in our opinion, have been of about as much use to the negroes as rations of pâté de foie gras.

MR. COLFAX has announced as the subject of a forthcoming lecture "Across the Continent, and the Duties of the next Congress." We are sure the lecture will be a good one, but let us suggest that it be followed by another on some such topic as "Over the Hills and Far Away, and the State Rights."

THE Trenton Weekly Monitor is an excellent paper, but it sometimes gets into a fog, as when, last week, it accused the NATION of inconsistency in recommending Government regulation of railroad traffic, while objecting to Government interference with the hours of labor. It is hard to have to waste space in pointing out a distinction so obvious, but we are forced to mention, at the risk of boring intelligent men, that the regulation of railroads is simply the regulation of a monopoly granted by the Government, and to which the grantees have no right; the proposed regulation of the hours of labor is simply a restriction on the quantity of a man's own labor—the thing of all others over which his control ought to be most nearly absolute—which he shall bring into the market. Government interference is not per se mischievous; its quality depends on the nature of the object; otherwise the punishment of thieves might be improper. If capitalists could be made self-sacrificing by acts of the legislature, we should heartily support the eight-hour movement. As it is, we must respectfully ask its advocates to do a little more hard, honest thinking and a little less wild talking.

THERE have been some important debates in the South Carolina Legislature on the Negro Code. An amendment declaring marriages between white and colored persons void was carried by an overwhelming majority, the object being, of course, to prevent "amalgamation;" but the act ought really, to be effective, to have forbidden the birth of the children of white and colored parents. It is only by some such law as this that this crying evil can be reached. A motion, made by Mr. Mulvaney, striking out the clause requiring the masters or mistresses of colored apprentices to have them instructed in some useful trade or business, produced great excitement. The ablest argument in support of the motion was that of Mr. de Pass, of Kershaw, who eloquently asked gentlemen of the house "the plain, simple question, Were they willing their sons should sit on the work-bench alongside of a big buck nigger?" No direct answer was returned, however, to Mr. de Pass's momentous question, and we presume the members are still pondering over it. But the amendment was thrown out. We suggest, with great deference, as a means of avoiding the difficulty suggested by Mr. de Pass, that the South Carolina gentlemen who intend to make mechanics of their sons provide them with work-benches of their own. In this way contact with "big buck niggers," if disagreeable, will be avoided, and the comfort of the negro certainly be promoted. But we warn the white mechanics that they will never be able to maintain their superiority over the competitors of the "inferior race" except by producing better workmanship. If they make worse shoes or machinery, neither the "curse on Ham" nor the "facial angle" will keep the custom from being monopolized by the "degraded African."

EVERYBODY must have noticed the red caps about our streets wearing the badge of the City Messenger Corps, and prepared, for a moderate tariff, to carry letters and parcels and execute other commissions in all parts of the city. They are much more conspicuous than the corps which they imitate and compete with—the Invalid Soldiers' Messenger Corps—a happy device of the Sanitary Commission to afford an honorable livelihood to the disabled heroes of the late patriotic struggle. These men retain the blue under which they marched to suffering and glory, and certainly have claims upon the public patronage above those of the other purely speculative enterprise. In Boston they have been tendered by the Metropolitan Railroad Company the free use of their cars, which will not only relieve them from a vast amount of fatigue, but also by a saving in time permit their earnings to be very materially increased. The example is worthy to be followed by our own horse-railroad corporations.

"Evacuation Day" was celebrated here on Friday, and was the occasion of the usual military parade and review by the governor. It has long since ceased to have any historical value for the great body of the people, much like the holiday called "artillery election" in Boston. It would, indeed, be curious to enquire into the decay of these and similar holidays, and to point the evident moral that when a date outlived its usefulness, the observance of it had better be dropt by common consent. A London paper descants on the annual November nuisance of Guy Fawkes, which seems to have surpassed the worst development of the Fourth of July with us; yet we doubt if any legislator would be willing to advocate its burial. "Time-honored" covers a multitude of sins.

The good faith of the Florida Convention was shown most conspicuously by its incorporating in the reformed Constitution that protection for the negro which other State conventions have left to succeeding legislatures. The same amendment which ordains the prohibition of slavery ordains also that all the inhabitants "shall enjoy the rights of person and property without distinction of color." In all criminal proceedings which involve the rights of colored persons, "no person shall be incompetent to testify as a witness on account of color." In all other cases the colored witness is to be excluded unless admitted by subsequent legislation. It is added, somewhat superfluously, except that the idea seems never to have entered the heads of the opponents of negro testimony, that the jury shall judge of its credibility.

They are going through the forms, in Alabama, of another conflict between the civil and the military authorities. In this instance, however, the United States District Court is one of the parties. A Treasury cotton-agent is arrested at Mobile by order of Gen. Wood, commanding the department. A writ of habeas corpus is sued out before Judge Busteed, and served on the general and his provost-marshal. Of course it is not respected, nor is a subsequent order of the court for the discharge of the prisoner and the appearance of the general to show cause, etc. Finally the judge directs a writ of attachment to be served on the latter, returnable, owing to the absence of the United States Marshal, in two weeks from Monday last. By that time Congress may have an opportunity to settle the question of supremacy for the whole Southern territory.

The servant-girl question has not a more wide-spread interest than the question of rents and houses. In almost every considerable city the same complaint is raised which is so familiar here, and we are assured that the desired habitations will go up when the price of building materials comes down. Landlords at the South, even, strange as it may appear, where ready money is so scarce and so much in demand, exhibit the common reluctance to abate their rents. Their obstinacy is often due to a not concealed antipathy to Yankee tenants, yet in Raleigh we notice that citizens and natives are compelled to face such exactions as $1,900 in gold or $3,000 in currency for houses which rented before the war for $350, and during hostilities for $4,500 in Confederate money.

If the Albany Atlas and Argus represented the state of public feeling, we might be fairly charged with being sunk in barbarism. A recent number ascribes poor Preston King's death to "remorse for a cause deserted, companions betrayed, and principles sacrificed." If anybody wants to know the cause of that lurking contempt for the newspaper press from which even those who are most sensible of its power are not entirely free, he will find it in paragraphs like this of the Atlas and Argus.

The Boston Daily Advertiser has a correspondent travelling through the South whose letters may always be read with interest and instruction. In his last, from Albany, Georgia, he describes his encounter with a gang of ruffians who sought to kill him, and the narrative reads exactly like those which were so frequent before the war. The substance of it is, that the correspondent took advantage of a lull in a street fight between a negro and a man whom he supposed to be a Federal soldier, to counsel the former to withdraw and so put an end to what might have proved a contagious brawl. For this simple behavior as a good citizen he was insulted and menaced by an armed and drunken set, led on by a chivalric Confederate major, who, failing to browbeat the correspondent in open day, nursed their wrath while he was nursing his chills and fever in the afternoon, and at night beset the hotel with bloodthirsty intent. It became an act of prudence for himself and consideration for his host to retire secretly to other lodgings, and to anticipate the disappointed rage of his pursuers at the railway station next morning. The affair would be insignificant if it could be regarded as a purely local demonstration; but we have every reason to believe that, in the absence of the United States forces, the spirit of Albany would be that of the entire South, and that as the sanctity of slavery was once the pretext for every kind of violence and the suppression of free speech, so will be the irreversible superiority of the white man and inferiority of the "nigger."

Various causes have contributed to delude the freed people of the South concerning the division of their late masters' lands among them. The confiscation acts of Congress logically involved some such division, if they had been at all rigorously enforced. The colored troops, perhaps ignorantly, perhaps in some cases maliciously, helped to confirm the belief that these measures would be carried out. At all events, the present unsettled feeling of the blacks is not likely to pass away till after the new year comes in. Gov. Marvin, of Florida, has publicly recommended that they be allowed complete liberty during the Christmas vacation, and that if, after New Year's, they still persist in remaining idle, they be subjected to the law of vagrancy, which, according to our understanding, the recent convention made impartial in its operation. The course proposed seems to be both judicious and humane. But as apprehension often precipitates the evil which gives rise to it, we fear lest, outside of Florida at least, for want of a little forbearance and steadiness on the part of the whites, some very deplorable collisions may ensue next month.

Ex-Governor Magrath, of South Carolina, wants to know why he is kept locked up while all other rebel governors are at large. We think somebody ought to tell him. We would if we knew, but we do not. He has, however, been liberated, and will probably push the enquiry no further.

Governor Parson Brownlow writes to the Cincinnati Gazette that the country around Nashville and Middle Tennessee generally abounds with thieves and robbers and murderers; that the rebels are bent on breaking up the Union by means of the ballot-box; and that, in his opinion, they have not been "whipped enough." All this may be very true, but we, nevertheless, cannot help wishing that the parson, good patriot though he is, would treat us to a little silence. We don't like his rhetoric, now that he is in the governor's chair, half as well as we did when he was editing a Knoxville paper, though even then we were not fascinated by it.

The colored people of Missouri have issued an address "to the friends of equal rights" in that State. Of course they ask for equal rights, politically. Their appeal is made with a warmth which is wholly natural, but which is in marked contrast with the soberer language of the North Carolina freedmen. They court a test of intelligence for the exercise of the suffrage, believing "that it would promote a most healthy spirit of emulation, and prove the greatest educator of the masses." They intend to canvass the State thoroughly, holding mass meetings and distributing documents. For funds they depend upon the generous contributions of the friends whom they address.

FLORIDA has frankly complied with every requisition made on her by the Government preparatory to her re-admission to the Union. She has repudiated the rebel debt, abolished slavery, and admitted negroes to testify in the courts. It still remains for her, however, to comply with the supplemental condition imposed on South Carolina, and ratify the Constitutional Amendment. One curious illustration of the besotted condition of the Southern mind on the subject of slavery appears in the precaution taken to put it on record that the abolition of slavery was forced upon the State; it was not voluntarily resorted to. The impression prevalent amongst the members of most Southern conventions evidently agrees with that of one of the Alabama members, recently elected—that "the iron pen of history will record the emancipation proclamation was the most monstrous deed of cruelty that ever darkened the annals of any nation."

MR. SCHUYLER COLFAX made a speech at Washington, on Saturday, the 19th inst., in which he denounced the South for the manner in which it was carrying out the reconstruction policy, argued strongly against undue precipitation in re-admitting the revolted States, but at the same time bore emphatic testimony to Mr. Johnson's sincerity and goodness of purpose. What he thinks ought to be done does not clearly appear; but, as well as we can make out, he is in favor of keeping the revolted States out a little while longer on probation.

GOVERNOR PARSONS, of Alabama, has sent his message to the Legislature. He recommends the ratification of the Constitutional Amendment and the passage of a vagrant law applicable to both whites and blacks. This is a good suggestion, but there is very little value in the applicability of a law unless it is applied, and when we know for certain that a stringent vagrant law has in any State in the South been applied to anybody but blacks we shall confess that we have done Southern men great injustice.

A CHARLESTON paper thinks that the name and medicines of a certain patent doctor of this city "should be as household words in every home throughout the South." The reason assigned for so intimate an adoption is that he is a Southern man, and having unfortunately been found in bad company at the outbreak of the rebellion, was shut up with other suspicious characters, finally banished from Missouri, and his property confiscated to the State. It is not clear what all this has to do with the quality of his medicines, nor what obligation it imposes on every Southern family to contract the ailments which he professes to cure. Our notion of the purity of Southern society is none of the highest, but we should almost give it over as hopelessly corrupt if the pernicious drugs of this man's manufacture were as indispensable as the whiskey-bottle and the snuff-box.

THE rewards offered last spring for the capture of Tucker, Sanders, and Co. have been withdrawn. It is to be regretted that the grounds for suspecting them of complicity in the assassination were not more thoroughly sifted before a price was set on them. The total failure of the Government to connect either them or Davis with the crime suggests the conclusion that the proclamation was issued without due consideration.

THE Unionists have elected the governor and all other candidates in Colorado.

THE Canadian militia have passed the last fortnight in awful and portentous preparations for an attack by the Fenians of Western New York. The last order by the "administrator of the Government and commander-in-chief" is of a most inspiriting character, and is said to have filled the militia with martial ardor. But if anybody expects to see the Fenians and Canadians meet in battle array, he will be greatly disappointed. Both parties vastly prefer the smell of a good dinner to the smell of gunpowder, though we freely admit that, whenever they do meet, they will furnish materials for an epic. We bespeak the subject for Mr. Walt Whitman, who, of all the poets we know, is the only one competent to do justice to it.

Blackwood's Magazine tells a story of Lord Palmerston's having made up his mind to fight the United States after the Trent affair, and having been only restrained by Cornewall Lewis and Gladstone, and other more pacific members of the Cabinet. The story is probably true, and as he is dead we can afford to laugh over the dismal manner in which the Tory writer deplores the old aristocrat's failure to carry out his purpose.

THE Emperor of the French has written a long letter to Marshal MacMahon concerning his observations of the people and country of Algeria. His conclusion is that the three millions of natives are neither to be exterminated nor driven into the desert, but to be lived with, to be fashioned to French laws, and to be convinced of French superiority, not only in arms but in peaceful institutions. "In exercising," says the Emperor, "a prompt and equal justice with them, in augmenting their well-being, in developing education and those sentiments of morality which elevate human dignity, we shall show them that the French flag was not carried to Africa to subject them, but to bring them the benefits of civilization."

THE Paris journals boast that the number of strangers visiting their city has not been perceptibly diminished by the presence of the cholera. They attribute this fact to the known wholesomeness of the city, to which the pure air of its vast avenues and the excellence of its abundant water chiefly contribute.

THE editor of the Paris Figaro has lately met on the field of honor a Spanish gentleman, to whom the journalist's pleasantries about the Queen of Spain had proven offensive. This is a terrible state of things, when subjects have to take up their sovereign's newspaper quarrels, and the poor journalists have to give point to their jokes with the rapier.

IT is announced that the ribbon trade at Lyons has received the liveliest impulse from America since the close of the war. Many heavy orders have been lately received. The operatives again have plenty of work, and this at better wages than ever before, for the price of ribbons has risen almost one-third.

THE Parisian journals announce the departure of the Emperor for his model farm, Korner-Houet, in Brittany, which he has established in one of the vast heaths of the province, to prove to the people the land is not sterile, as they had supposed. This visit will be the first that a French sovereign has paid to Brittany since the time of Henry IV.

AT Bautzen, in Saxony, on the 28th of October, justice was obliged to descend to a hideous hand-to-hand combat with a criminal about to be guillotined. The papers recount that he mounted the scaffold very tranquilly, but then commenced a furious struggle with the executioners. Four men in vain attempted to subdue the efforts of the condemned, who was a person of slender frame and no great apparent strength. He bit and struck them, and repeatedly cried out, "Help! I am innocent! Save me! You are murderers! I want to speak to the director of the prison again!" At last one of the assistants caught the condemned by the hair, and, pulling his head violently back, rendered him helpless. He was bound to the plank, still protesting his innocence, and declaring that human justice was assassination. The fall of the knife put an end to the revolting scene, which could scarcely have impressed the spectators with the dignity and awfulness of justice.

IN one of the little German principalities a tailor named Conrad Hillemacher died recently at the age of a hundred and seven years. He took a walk every day up to the end of his hundred and seventh year, and read his Bible until his sight refused its office, when he bitterly reproached the opticians with the worthlessness of their spectacles. This patriarch was the father of forty-five sons and two daughters, and had three hundred and eighty-three grandchildren. If he had continued in the prime of life, he would have made his little prince the sovereign of a populous empire.

THE health of Madrid is reported to be improving from day to day, and the cholera is rapidly disappearing. The greatest care was taken by the Government to prevent its ravages. The Queen, hearing that certain penal establishments were too crowded, pardoned all the prisoners whose terms were near expiration. Her Majesty, however, absented herself from the capital during the worst days of the epidemic, in grace to the prayers of her ministers and people, who were unwilling that she should incur danger of the cholera while in the interesting situation which may be said to be almost habitual with Her Majesty.

CORRESPONDENCE of the Indépendance Belge says that the King and Queen of Portugal, who are now at Turin, will proceed on a visit to the Pope, and will then be the secret and semi-official mediators between His Holiness and Victor Emanuel.

ALL the elections in Hungary for the National Diet, to be assembled at Pesth, indicate the triumph of the moderate party, of which the Prince Deak is the head.

A ROMAN correspondent of the Débats denies that the ex-King of Naples has any present intention of leaving Rome, either for Locnoma or Würtemberg, which, socially speaking, would be about as bad. Meantime, he remains unhappy in the Farnese Palace, the prey of greedy and unprincipled adventurers, who affect devotion to an exiled prince that they may devour his substance. He has ceased to subsidize brigandage in Naples, which has therefore invaded the Papal territory, where it now flourishes.

How curiously the sentiment of the classic world is blent with that of ours in the item of Greek news, that some soldiers had recently attacked and brutally beaten his worship the Mayor of Marathon! Another piece of Greek gossip reads like a page from About's "King of the Mountains." The government had offered a reward for a brigand chief, which a certain priest resolved to earn. He sent word to the robber that at a given time he would be found at a place named with four rich and helpless merchants; and disguising four gendarmes as traders, he repaired to the rendezvous, having first placed a body of soldiers in ambush near by, to be summoned to the scene by the first sound of fire-arms. The brigands kept the appointment promptly, and the gendarmes duly fired their pistols; but before the soldiers could arrive, the robbers had cut the priest in pieces, and seized three of the luckless gendarmes, with whom they escaped to the mountains.

THE FREEDMEN.

IN the absence of any official information concerning the freedmen, we continue our extracts from the commercial correspondence from which we have already frequently copied. Under date of Oct. 8, at New Orleans, the writer remarks upon the great diversity of opinion in Louisiana as to the capacity of the freedmen for steady work. He finds, what might have been looked for à priori, that the Southerners who have fairly tried free labor have been surprised by the performance of the blacks, while Northerners, especially those whose plantations lay in the track of the army worm, have been disappointed. One of the former—a "persistent, bitter, and uncompromising secessionist," who made a good crop this year, is a convert to free negro labor, and only fears that not enough of it can be obtained—thus explains his method of dealing with the freedmen:

"Last season I worked my hands by means of an overseer, and all the trouble and tumult common among the other negroes and upon the other plantations ensued. I made up my mind that it was all the fault of the overseer, a good enough man in his way, better than the average—but, like the rest, he persisted in ignoring the change that had taken place in affairs, and worked on the old system. So this season I resolved to go into the field myself. I told my hands at the commencement of the season just what I would do for them, just what I expected them to do for me; they raised sweet potatoes, eggs, and chickens on their own account. I fed and clothed them, and paid them so much. I have not had the least trouble. They have uniformly treated me with respect as I have them with justice. They are all perfectly satisfied with their year's work, and I expect to pursue exactly the same course next season, and have no doubt I shall get along just as well. I should not go into the field with my negroes myself if necessity did not compel me to it; it has compelled me to it; and it will compel me to it for many years to come, I expect. I have about eighty head of negroes. Of these only some twenty odd work in the field; the rest are too old or too young, or house servants. At fifty cents a pound for cotton I can afford to support not only the negroes, but their families. If cotton falls, I shall explain to my hands, and they will comprehend me, that not receiving so much, I cannot afford to give them so much. I am willing always to make a fair divison with them."

In Texas, where a vast amount of cotton is going to waste through the absolute refusal of the planters to imitate the example just cited, our correspondent found one who had had the following experience with his laborers:

"He informs me that as slaves they were in the habit of picking from 200 to 400 pounds of seed cotton per diem, picking say 300 pounds upon an average, and picking it clean and nice. He first paid them by the month, and they averaged only 50 pounds per day. Then he paid them by the pound, and they rose in one day to the old amount, and only worked half as long as they used in the old time; but, instead of picking the plants clean, they hurried through the field, pulling out the largest bunches and scattering all the rest around, trampling down the plants, and losing from two-thirds to three-quarters in the field. This could all have been avoided, of course, if they had had a superintendent or overseer who had them under control; but the fact is, the freedmen have no idea of real, sensible freedom, and fancy the word means license, complete and unrestrained; hence they refuse to be controlled by any one."

It was unavoidable that the States most remote, in point of communication, from Washington, should be the last to receive the attention and acknowledge the control of the Freedmen's Bureau; and this must be remembered when the writer says:

"To prove how slow and inadequate are the operations of the Freedmen's Bureau, there was not an agent in the State, except on the island of Galveston, when I landed. The day before I left Austin, the capital, a lieutenant reported for the first time, but he informed me he had sent in his resignation, and it was plainly to be seen that the duty was distasteful to him. As Gen. Thomas well says, it will take heroes to do the work proposed. At present their work is about equal to Mrs. Partington and her mop versus the Atlantic Ocean. Gen. Gregory told me that it was almost impossible to find officers competent and willing to act as agents. Only two had been sent to him when I left Galveston. He is a host in himself, however, and has got Galveston at least under his control."

As has been often stated, the industrious and loyal Germans of Texas bring to market uniformly cleaner and better handled cotton than that produced by slave cultivation. Our correspondent writes from San Antonio de Bexar, October 26:

"My route from Austin to this city took me through the German settlement of New Braunfels. All the Germans intend to plant cotton next year, and I should not be surprised if the amount raised in this State by their labor alone should amount to one hundred thousand bales. At New Braunfels I found a cotton-mill in operation, started within three weeks, and running from early dawn till eleven o'clock at night. The machinery is stated to have come from England, but I discovered it was from New York, smuggled across the border, just before the close of the war, from Mexico. These Germans here maintain all their national characteristics, and as an evidence of their loyalty it is sufficient to state that, out of twenty-two hundred enlisted in the Confederate service at New Braunfels, seventeen hundred deserted as soon as they found themselves in the vicinity of our troops, and, re-enlisting under the old flag, fought straight through to the end. The first place in Texas where they hoisted the Stars and Stripes at the surrender was here at New Braunfels, two months before they saw a Federal soldier in their vicinity. In fact, their sincerity and loyalty are not to be questioned, and they will prove the redemption of the State in the end."

—Mr. Leigh, of the Freedmen's Association of this city, having reached Paris in his trans-Atlantic tour, introduced a novelty even to that city of novelties par excellence. It is thus announced by the Débats:

"We have had a 'meeting' in Paris. It is true that its object concerned America, the country of 'meetings,' which gave to an attempt of this sort with us a certain propriety. It is true, moreover, that it was an American who asked and obtained permission of the authorities, who were unwilling by a refusal to cause him to remark the differences that distinguish our institutions from those of his native land."

The Débats then tells how Mr. Leigh called upon the committee of French ladies, who have exerted themselves to enlist the sympathies of their countrymen in the condition of the American freedmen.

"'We have only received thus far,' they told him, 'about 45,000 francs.' 'Well,' said he, 'let us get up some meetings!' Men might perhaps have responded, with a toss of the head, 'We are not in America;' but women are more confident than men, and the Administration, which is sometimes gallant, permitted a 'meeting' to be held on Friday last (Nov. 3) at Herz Hall, 'under the responsibility of the committee,' doubtless thinking that the speakers would not compromise these ladies with the public authorities.

"The hall was quite full long before the hour for assembling; a thousand persons were prevented from obtaining admittance. Those who had the good sense to arrive seasonably were present at a genuine 'meeting,' that is to say, a gathering where almost all are agreed in advance upon the subject for discussion, and where each one comes to treat it in his own fashion and from his own point of view. The speakers succeeded each other a little at random: some spoke who had intended to keep silent; others, who were equally prepared to speak or to be silent, forbore to speak in order not to prolong the session."

M. Laboulaye presided, and made a somewhat elaborate address. Remarks were also made by M. Coquerel fils, M. Crémieux, Dr. Sunderland, and M. Fred. Monod.

"The 'meeting' passed no 'resolutions'—we are not far enough along for that—but a contribution which was taken up afforded it an opportunity of manifesting its feelings for the blacks by giving money—a mode of expression which is as good as any other, and is assuredly the most sincere of all."

Minor Topics.

One day last week six persons were arrested, in different parts of the city, for the offence of carrying concealed weapons, and were punished with the usual penalties by the magistrates before whom they were brought. Four of the offenders were drunk at the time of their arrest, and were endangering the lives of peaceable people by a furious and rather purposeless display of fire-arms. They were tipsy swashbucklers, it seems, and were far from making any concealment of their weapons, which was the offence punished in them; but accident or drunken whim might have made them homicides at any moment, and they were, therefore, more perilous to the public peace than if they had kept their revolvers hidden. The law against carrying concealed weapons is one of those sagacious enactments which every one is safe in breaking; and the fate of the swaggering heroes of the late arrest need not trouble honest people who keep their swords in their canes, their pistols in their pockets, and their Colt's up their coat-sleeves. Every one must settle for himself the question whether he will or will not carry weapons about his person, for it is quite certain that justice will know nothing of them till they are used, and will not blame their use if it is in the cause of individual safety and social order. If little Jones carries a revolver, it will probably make him very unhappy in his walks by night, peopling the obscurity everywhere with forms of violence and robbery; and it will be a constant anguish to Mrs. Jones, whose sole idea of revolvers is that they shoot their owners. But if it really happened that the houseless wanderer, who never knows what time it is after nightfall, goes about asking gentlemen the hour in lonely places, should attempt the watch or pocket-book of little Jones, and Jones should shoot him, the use of concealed weapons would have no unpleasant consequence, except to the houseless wanderer; unless, indeed (as is very probable), Jones is afterwards sorry he did not let him take the watch and be done with it.

The question of providing means of self-defence remains, as we said, for individual decision, but it is a pity that the authorities should suffer such a question to present itself to peaceable persons, and they must answer for the undoubted evils which ensue from the practice of carrying deadly weapons. Men assemble in society and frame laws for the better protection of their lives and property, but society is the worst of states where the laws are not enforced, and a sense of insecurity prevails. As in the spurious civilization of our Southern States before the war, the strong and the manly are the first to assert the right of self-defence, and the defencelessness of the orderly is redoubled. If Jones and Robinson feel unsafe in our streets, and this feeling extends throughout the community, Michael O'Fenian and other ornaments to politics and society will make haste to arm themselves against possible danger, and scarcely any choice but arming is left to those who would only too gladly leave their protection to the law.

At the present time, the alarming prevalence of violence in New York cannot be gainsaid. People are not only assailed and robbed in remote quarters of the city, but in the most public places. A man in broad daylight, while attempting to pocket change given him by the conductor of a horse-car, is set upon by ruffians, hustled from the platform, and plundered of his money. At night such cases are too common to be worth special mention; and we only speak of the robbery of a whole car full of passengers, a few nights since, because it was an exploit of peculiar picturesqueness and dramatic effect, conceived and executed with the boldest genius. A troop of five or six brigands, well-armed and daring, took possession of a car, and while one saw that the conductor gave no trouble and another stood guard over the driver, the rest robbed the passengers of their money, watches, and other valuables, without any of that indecent haste which too often attends similar operations.

In the meantime, the community, while openly doubtful of its safety, reposes a perfect confidence in the efficiency of the police. "However we may be misgoverned in other respects," says a community which is knocked upon the head and plundered of its watch whenever it ventures out after dark, "we are fortunate in having an efficient police force." It is natural that a community which sees no fault in the protection inadequate to security should imagine a defect in itself, and seek to repair it by means of concealed weapons. It is the misfortune of such a community if, finally, this means of safety breeds greater danger, but it is hardly to be blamed for that. Indeed, but for the confidence in the police which we feel in common with others, we should say that weak-handed authority was to blame for it, and we should be little comforted by the knowledge that we might wear a revolver if we liked.

It may be police-nature, which revolts from unpleasant localities; but did any one, obliged to pass by night through a suspicious or rascal quarter of the town, ever meet a policeman exactly at the moment the encounter would have been cheerfullest? or fail to meet numbers of policemen within the glimpse of the gay green lights of the attractive station-house? We read in the daily papers occasionally that a victim's outcries promptly summon the police, but this, though a species of satisfaction, is not altogether the sort of experience through which one would care to test the proximity of the police. It is undignified to cry out before you are assailed, and not always possible to do so afterwards. Still, after all, these are merely phenomenal aspects of the question, and we should be sorry to leave the subject without renewing the expression of our confidence in the police of a city which, while it rivals Naples in the filth of its streets, may well challenge the most favored regions of California to equal the daring and impunity of its brigands.

A correspondent sends us a most lamentable account of the morals and manners of B. T. Trevail, the author of the work on "Shooting and Fishing in the Rivers, Prairies, and Backwoods of America," which we noticed in our last number. He says he is "near-sighted," that "he never fired a gun in his life," that he knows nothing of America "except this city and the watering-places," and that in fact he has evolved all his sporting stories out of the "depths of his own moral consciousness." He adds that he (the correspondent) gave him "the beginning of a thrashing" in Paris some years ago for abusing Americans, but does not state what prevented the completion of the process, together with some other matter of a highly libellous character, such as that the said Trevail was once connected with the New York Herald, but which, for obvious reasons, we decline to publish. If all of it be true, we feel bound to withdraw our recommendation to American publishers to reproduce the book in this country. The manufacture of sporting stories can be, and is, we take it, carried on just as successfully here as abroad, and we should be sorry to see the efforts of a foreigner in this field encouraged at the expense of native artificers. "Fish stories," accounts of bear fights and of pigeon-shooting and deer-hunting, are produced in this city of as good workmanship, on as short notice, and at as low a rate, as in any other city in the world.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which vertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

THE SOLUTION OF THE MEXICAN PROBLEM.

GENERAL GRANT, during his recent visit to this city, as well as on all other occasions, has taken so little pains to conceal his sentiments on the Mexican question that we presume there are very few who are now ignorant that he is in favor of a tolerably quick and peremptory settlement of it. What lends all the greater gravity to what he says, either on this or any other question of public policy, is that he is not only a man of few words, but a man of singular discretion—perhaps the last man in the public service to embarrass the Government by even the appearance of tracing out any line of policy for which it was not already prepared. Providence, by mercifully denying him the gift of the gab, has saved him from the temptation by which so many of our generals, and statesmen, and diplomatists are so easily beset, and to which so many of them fall victims, of making a clean breast of it, and telling everything they know or think, and a good many things they neither think nor know, at whatever cost to the Government or injury to the public service, every time a brass band strikes up under their bedroom window, or a few admirers give them a supper. We may feel right well assured, therefore, that when he, the military adviser of the Government, and the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, says a certain course ought to be pursued towards a foreign power, the President and Cabinet have pretty nearly made up their minds to pursue it, whenever, in their opinion, the proper time comes.

There is now no indiscretion in saying that in General Grant's opinion Maximilian ought to be driven out of Mexico, and the population put in possession of the inalienable right of choosing how they will be governed. And the reasons which weigh most strongly with him in favor of this course are partly those by which the general public is influenced, and partly others to which it has given little or no thought. The consideration by which the public is perhaps most influenced in desiring the overthrow of the Mexican Empire is mainly a sentimental one, though not for this reason one whit the less respectable. Positive loss or damage from the French invasion of Mexico we can hardly be said to have suffered. The Monroe doctrine, it is true, has been set at naught by it, but the Monroe doctrine is, after all, only a doctrine, and as yet the consequences of its violation touch our dignity rather than our security or our pockets. The time chosen for the invasion, too, made it, perhaps, the most unmistakably unfriendly demonstration directed against us by a foreign power during the late war. The other sins of which we complain were either sins of omission, or offences against taste. This one was a direct and solemn official declaration of contempt for our feelings and opinions, and of confidence in our weakness and helplessness. The invasion, itself an insult, with the establishment by force of foreign arms on the ruins of a republic on our border, of a form of government so entirely opposed to the ideas and traditions of the New World, and so repugnant to the spirit of our own institutions, was a plain intimation that European powers considered it not improbable that they might, before very long, be called upon to settle our difficulties in a similar way.

We can hardly be said, however, to have been seriously injured by these demonstrations of hostility. Those may laugh who win, and so far as Louis Napoleon's Mexican expedition was an indication of his dislike of our policy or of a disposition to interfere with us when opportunity served, our success has been, perhaps, a sufficient punishment. But it was more than an indication of dislike and a threat of interference. It is a standing and continued act of aggression on republican institutions, and, as such, ought to be put an end to as soon as possible, and if for no other reason, out of regard for the peaceful diffusion and triumph of the ideas of which we have made ourselves, on this continent at least, the expounders and champions.

It is as to the mode of doing this that our Government finds it most difficult to decide. It would, of course, be easy to send an ultimatum to Louis Napoleon, calling on him to withdraw his troops, and, in case of refusal, to follow it up by war, and this course would probably find plenty of favor at the hands of stump-orators, and in the columns of sensational newspapers. But we have found out what it costs for even a strong nation to use all its strength, and have thus learned from our own experience the value of the maxim which makes war the last resort, and makes it incumbent on statesmen to seek nothing through it which there is a reasonable chance of getting in any other way. It is very certain that the French Emperor is now convinced of his mistake in going to Mexico at all, and it is probable that, being convinced of this, he will take an early opportunity of withdrawing quietly. If, however, any visible pressure is brought to bear on him, or he is visibly menaced, a common regard for the safety of his own dynasty might force him to resist. The French people would never forgive the withdrawal of French troops under a threat, and he might thus be plunged into a war which he is most anxious to avoid. So that the difficult and delicate question now remains to be decided, how long a time we ought to allow him for peaceable retreat, and what kind and amount of pressure may be safely used to hasten it.

It has to be considered, on the other hand—and on this point we believe General Grant's opinions are very decided—that waiting for him at all is a very expensive process; that the existence of the empire in Mexico forces us to keep up a large standing army, and to prevent that approximation to the status quo in all departments of the public service which the public credit, as well as public morals and prosperity, imperatively calls for. Moreover, the suspense created by the unsettled state of our relations with France is producing an almost paralyzing effect on our business; so much so that, in the opinion of a great many shrewd men, and we believe we may include General Grant in the number, the cost of waiting is, taking all things together, greater than the cost of going to war at once would be. Whether, if the French were gone, we ought to leave Maximilian alone, and entrust the destruction of his government, supposing it to be able to withstand the direct assaults of the Mexican liberals, which we do not believe, to the contagion of republican ideas propagated from our soil, and the gradual influx of American colonists into his territory—a process now sure to go on—is another question. Our own impression is, that the imperial government would not survive the withdrawal of the French troops; but if it did, it would only be by becoming a great military power, and in maintaining a large and highly disciplined army. Supposing this were possible, it would be a state of things menacing to our peace and security, and which this Government would not permit. The presence of a power of this kind on our border would force us to remain in a state of constant preparation for war, after the fashion of the European monarchies, and would end, by the indirect influence which this state of preparation would exercise on the public mind, and on the machinery of government, in endangering if not seriously curtailing our liberties. In short, there seems every reason to believe that soon after Congress meets we shall witness an attempt at a swift solution of the whole problem.

THE INSURRECTION IN JAMAICA.

From the London Spectator.

WE are still without precise intelligence from Jamaica, but enough is known of the condition of the island to justify us in a blank denial of the assertions that the negroes said to be in insurrection are influenced by Haytian agitators, and are themselves only too well off. They are badly off, so badly off that the island has for months been a perplexity to the Colonial Office, and that for seven weeks at least the Secretary of State has expected news of an attempted insurrection. Letters are even now in town from Jamaica in which the alarm of the local government and the strange movements among the squadron are noticed either with ridicule or apprehension, and the few persons still keenly interested in the colony are well aware of a discontent which a trifle may have sufficed to blow into a flame. This discontent has been growing for years, and finds its ultimate root in two causes, one of which is ineradicable, except perhaps by long-continued prosperity, while the other is within the reach of parliamentary action. The two are the increase of population and the character of the Legislative Assembly. The negroes, always prolific, as very poor races are everywhere apt to be, have since the emancipation multiplied with extraordinary rapidity. The climate suits them, the release from forced labor has increased the healthiness of the women, early marriage has been fostered as an antidote to the immorality customary in slave colonies, and though there is a terrible amount of licence remaining, it is not of a kind or degree to check greatly the increase of population. The pressure for subsistence becomes yearly greater, while the means of procuring it grow yearly less. Sugar, the grand staple of the export trade, cannot be cultivated to advantage without scientific appliances, that is, without capital, and capital has for years been leaving Jamaica, till only some 30,000 persons are now maintained by the ancient cultivation of the island. Other planting scarcely exists, and the negroes, therefore, are driven to hire little plots of ground, upon which they grow their food and some little tobacco, but scarcely anything else which can be converted into money. The island is therefore practically populated by cottiers, as poor as Irish cottiers, as dependent upon the harvest, and, if it be possible, still more unenlightened.

To this population, over-numerous, poverty-stricken, and ignorant, the Legislative Assembly adds a number of colored immigrants imported from India, and used up at a frightful pace, and refuses justice, education, and a sound system of conveyance. That Assembly is elected by less than 2,500 voters in a population of 441,000, and legislates exclusively in the interest of the planters. These latter are, as a body, inheritors of the slaveholding ideas, and sometimes of the slaveholding morality, and they have refused all measures in the interest of the blacks, wasted half a million sterling on coolies, who die like sheep, passed a whipping act which recalls the tone of the old Black Code, and imposed enormous duties on English imports, duties so heavy that, as was publicly stated in the Assembly, the negroes were falling back upon nakedness to avoid the cost of clothing as raised by the last tariff. They could pay in kind, but they cannot in cash, and they have no means of raising more. The planters will not buy of them, the dealers do not like the half-cleaned produce which is all they, as cottier cultivators, can offer, and in many cases the right of eviction is used as in Bengal, to compel the tenantry to cultivate particular articles and sell them to the owner at fixed prices. Of one such case we have the details, as of others which prove that the true substitute for slavery, fair wages for fair work, has not yet entered the island imagination. The greatest grievance of all, however, is the refusal of justice. Jamaica has been organized on the country gentleman system, the owners being the sole magistrates, and the owners are said to be unfair towards the colored population. It does not matter much in a political point of view whether this charge is true or not. Observers like Dr. Underhill, a cool, shrewd man, whose evidence is distrusted because he is secretary to the Baptist Mission, but who is a layman and not a negrophile, think it has a foundation, the planter even when upright being swayed by a feeling of race engrained into his very heart. Successive governors, too, have thought it, and have pleaded for stipendiary magistrates, but the Assembly is jealous of its electors' power, and absolutely refuses to change the system. Whether, however, the charge is true or false, it is believed to be true, and that belief is fatal to any confidence between governors and governed. The negro when injured will not apply to the magistrates, and when summoned accepts his sentence as a "white oppression," while all civil contracts fall hopelessly out of gear. Knowing that he has to deal with a poor employer, the negro refuses to make a binding contract, and when engaged by the day bolts, unless regularly paid. He cannot recover his wages by law, and therefore can and will give no credit, while the planter who wants him for only half the year is often unable to pay until the crop is in, that is, until the negro has abandoned his own crop for the uncertain chance of obtaining his employer's wages. There are no county courts available, and the negro finding no redress from the civil law, believing in none from the criminal law, ignorant by legislative defect, and self-indulgent from the absence of result to his self-restraint, falls back absolutely upon the little plot which is not his, to which he can get no lease, and which he is not permitted by the conveyancing system to buy. When that plot fails, the world falls from beneath his feet, and for the past two years it has failed from drought, failed till the people were in places actually without food—there is no poor law—till they, among the vainest of races, leave their children without clothing, till in places they deliberated whether they, like their fathers, had not better fly to the mountains. The accidental publication of a letter from Dr. Underhill to Mr. Cardwell, which had so impressed the Secretary that he forwarded it to Governor Eyre for a report, blew the discontent into a flame, and meetings of colored men were held, demanding higher wages, education, better representation, an end to immigration, and the exemption of raw materials from import duties. None of these demands were complied with; the Governor, though admitting the badness of the governing class, condemned the negroes, and an unlucky placard was published by authority, headed "The Queen's Advice," and containing in other words the answer which Pharaoh gave to the children of Israel, "Ye are idle, ye are idle." This increased the irritation to its height, and some accidental circumstance, most probably a movement among the West Indian Regiments, who are principally liberated Africans, has, we doubt not, caused the explosion which has led to the demand for troops. It cannot be a very formidable one, for the negroes have no arms, and unless the black soldiers have joined it, it is difficult to see why they alone were not strong enough to put it down.

The first duty of the Government, it is clear, is to put down the insurrection. Whatever the evils inherent in the present system, and they are many, the violent uprising of an ignorant population is not the remedy for them, and they must if needful be reduced to order by the strong arm. That done, however, it will become the duty of the Imperial Government to re-organize the island, if necessary by measures of revolutionary breadth. The old order of things has broken down. The Assembly, convened on a plan two hundred years old, is a nest of jobbers, and the planting class is, alike by hereditary feeling and by circumstances, disqualified for the possession of absolute power. If they were angels, they would be disqualified by the ineradicable distrust among those they govern begotten by two centuries of misrule, and being what they are, average Englishmen, with strong prejudices, declining capital, and the moral tone of a passed-away state of society, are entirely unable to attract the confidence of those beneath them. On the other hand, there is no class in the country to whom their power can be transferred. The mulattoes are not educated, and encourage race hatreds of their own, and the negroes must be educated before they can be trusted with the franchise. There is no iron necessity, as in the Southern States of America, for giving them power in order that they may not be trampled on, for an authority exists in the island competent to secure justice. The Queen's representative, and he alone in Jamaica, possesses at once the requisite knowledge, the needful confidence, and the indispensable freedom from class interests, and to him all power should, as in Ceylon, be temporarily confided. If Mr. Cardwell doubts as to the condition of the island, let him send out a royal commission of enquiry, or if, as is probable, he knows facts as strong as any commission could gather, let him at once propose to Parliament the conversion of Jamaica into a Queen's colony. Ceylon, with its hostile races and labor difficulties, prospers under that régime, and any governor who has served in the Mauritius, or Ceylon, or India, would be able to re-arrange society upon the double bases of peasant proprietorship and swift redress for civil or military injury. There is no danger to the planter in such a change, for the governor would be a white, and the stronger the laws against fraud, the greater the influence of capital and ownership. Transform most of the taxes from customs duties into the direct imposts, as Earl Grey recommended, and the negro must work to earn them, while a new tenure for the waste land, a system of compulsory education, and a little increase in the means of communicating between the interior and the sea, will speedily give him means of payment. The talk about negro indolence is pure rubbish. There is no settled race upon earth which is indolent, the Bengalee slaving nine hours a day, and the Neapolitan tilling his land with as much assiduity as a Dutchman, and the negro is only lazy because he never reaps the reward of labor. Ten years of strict, equal government, administered by a man who can press hard when needful on either race, and who will attend to physical improvement, will, we believe, make the island as prosperous as Ceylon, where, with no slavery and a native population which will not work for wages, the people import European goods to the extent of a pound a head per annum, and the Treasury is so overflowing that the Colonial Office has quarrelled with the planters by issuing an order that they shall pay for their own troops. Nothing short of a radical change like this can, we are convinced, save the island, which is full of natural resources, from sinking finally into the condition of a great tropical pauper warren, hopelessly insolvent, and requiring to be garrisoned with at least five thousand men. A possession of that kind is worse than useless, and it rests with Mr. Cardwell to avoid a calamity which may yet interfere with the prosperity budgets of many years. He has a great opportunity before him, and may yet prove to the public that he possesses the one quality opinion does not attribute to him—governing force.

Correspondence.

THE RHYME OF THE MASTER'S MATE.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Like King James's "whipping boy," I have just had a sound literary fustigation from yourself and others for something I never did, to wit, "The Rhyme of the Master's Mate." To be sure, I was a master's mate once (till promoted by a judicious department), and was always proud to hail from the "starboard steerage," which, indeed, I took for my nom de plume. Had it been the "forecastle" I should have been prouder still. But I did not write that piece, and will thank you to say so.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Henry Howard Brownell.

WINTER DAVIS ON RECONSTRUCTION.

To the Editor of The Nation:

My extreme reluctance to intrude on the public where I am not responsible for results, has hitherto withheld me from offering to you the following communication.

The Connecticut vote has solved my doubts and removed my hesitations. It reveals the fact that the great body of the Republicans are true to their principles, but that there is an unreliable minority in our ranks willing to unite with the enemies of the country to prevent us from consolidating our victory and securing its fruits. These two elements will, I fear, be found to divide our friends in Congress. Our great majority there can be broken only by a great desertion. A few we may expect to be disloyal. We may trust, however, that enough will not join those who have vilified us for four years to place them in control of the Houses. If they do, then Connecticut is the emblem of the fate of our cause, and the same coalition which perpetuated there the seeds of discord will prevent our rooting them out for ever from the nation.

In Connecticut no practical importance attaches to the negro vote, and old prejudice was free to assert its power. But in the Southern States lately in rebellion the negro population is a controlling power, if properly organized and endowed with arms and ballots. It is the only power on which the United States can rely there in the event of a renewed rebellion. It is the only body of people who can give the white minority of loyal men a voice in the nation, and prevent them from being overwhelmed and ostracized by the hostile majority. It is the only body of natural friends of the United States in all those States, for its freedom depends on the integrity of the Union. It is the only body from which a Republican vote can be expected in any of those States, for the mass of whites, loyal as well as disloyal, hate and vilify us, while the negroes know that their liberty is our gift, and that as surely as it would cease on disunion, so surely its safety and enjoyment would be jeoparded and impaired by the accession to power in the United States of the old coalition of their masters in possession of the Southern States, and the Democrats holding enough of the Northern States to elect a President or control either House of Congress.

The tone of the Southern press—now merely muttering between bayonets—is that of execration against the Republicans, while unanimous in supporting the President they elected; and to overlook this manifestation of Southern temper, in dealing with their restoration to political power, is to seal our own death-warrant, and secure the triumph of our opponents and of the enemies of the country for a generation. This grave question is to be settled within the next session of Congress, and probably in its earlier weeks. They who elected the President stood confounded and divided by the policy he has dictated to them for its solution. The North Carolina proclamation they tolerated as an experiment, till it has indurated into a policy executed in every State which rebelled, and supported by every Northern Democrat and every rebel pretending to loyalty. In words, the proclamations summon that "portion of the people who are loyal" to re-organize the State governments. But in reality they exclude the whole negro population, half the aggregate population, and nearly the whole of those who have always been loyal in those States. Under these proclamations, therefore, no republican form of government is possible.

The only alternatives are an oligarchy of loyal whites or an aristocracy of hostile whites. The one is loyal, but is not republican; the other is neither loyal nor republican. The former President Lincoln organized in Virginia and Louisiana; the President is organizing under his proclamations the latter. The legal effect of their recognition is to restore the State governments to those whom we have just expelled from them, to subject the emancipated negroes to the discriminating legislation of their masters, to continue their domination over the loyal minority, to guarantee to them the right to represent, now three-fifths, and at the next census the whole, of the disfranchised negroes; and to admit to Congress votes enough to compel equality, at the peril of anarchy, between loyalty and disloyalty. They were our armed enemies when Lee surrendered; they are now our disarmed enemies. They are now for independence and slavery, and against union and freedom; they acquiesce in both till time or disaster gives them opportunity to realize their hopes, and till then their interest and purpose are to obliterate every distinction between those who rebelled and those who put down the rebellion. In all the South the only mass of the population interested and able to foil these designs is the negroes whom the President has disfranchised.

Whatever his purpose may be, his policy is that of our enemies. His apologists say the President is in favor of negro suffrage, but that is small comfort if his proclamations exclude it. We remember his declaration that traitors should be punished, yet none are punished; that only loyal men should control the States, yet he has delivered them to the disloyal; that the aristocracy should be pulled down, yet he has put it in power again; that its possessions should be divided among Northern laborers of all colors, yet the negroes are still a landless, homeless class; that he was opposed to military commissions, yet they still defile the land, and others for higher victims are said to be in preparation! The President's words are, therefore, uncertain guides to his conduct. His apologists say, to the States alone belongs the question of suffrage, and the President left it to the people interested in it. But that is what the President did not do. The negroes of the States which rebelled form in some States a majority, in others a half, in all a vast, powerful, and loyal body of citizens, and to them he has not left it. On the contrary, he has left them to the will of their masters. It is true the President has no power to dictate who shall vote, but it is equally true that he has no power to dictate who shall not vote. He has as much power to admit as to exclude. His apologists assure us it was in obedience to the State constitutions, which survive the State governments. But the President's proclamations do not say so, and his conduct says to the contrary. He did not obey the Constitution in making the oath a qualification of suffrage, nor in authorizing the provisional governor to determine the loyalty of voters, nor in appointing him to make rules for convening the convention, nor in directing it to be convened at all, nor in requiring it to prohibit slavery; and it is nonsense to say if he was not bound on these points he was bound on negro suffrage. His whole conduct was an usurpation, but it was no more usurpation to direct his agents to receive than to refuse negro votes.

The suggestion that the constitutions survive the governments is at once absurd and dangerous. The governments ceased to exist because they disowned their subordination to the United States in point of law. Our arms expelled them as usurpations in point of fact. The constitutions were constitutions of those governments, and of nothing else. If they did not constitute those governments they constituted nothing. A constitution of nothing is nothing. A constitution which does not constitute, is a contradiction in terms. Such are the absurdities of this new form of Southern constitutional metaphysics!

Our ordinary language is elliptical. We speak of a constitution, but that means nothing till we add, of what. We mean a constitution of government; and the moment we say what we mean, the folly of a constitution surviving the government is apparent. When the rebellion usurped power in the States, the State governments ceased to exist; the constitutions became dead forms; the line of official transmission of powers was broken; there ceased to be any person designated to renew the functions of government, and they could never be renewed till the people constituted anew the governments, or Congress, in executing its guarantee, directed such governments to be constituted. For a government is certain men charged with certain powers. A constitution of government is the law creating the powers and designating the men to execute them; and without the men the government and the constitution are alike nonentities.

But the view is also dangerous. For if the constitutions continue in force, then the Representatives and Senators elected under them are entitled to appear in their seats, require their names to be called, and to vote on the simple production of their certificates. It is not necessary that Congress should recognize governments in those States; for the old governments which it has heretofore recognized continue, and to recognize others is to oust them by revolution. This has always been the view of the Democratic allies of the rebels; but it is now, for the first time, presented for the approval of the Republicans. The President had not thought of this view when he made the prohibition of slavery a condition of re-organization; and if he did not include negro suffrage in the conditions, it was not because he had not as much power but less inclination to do it. Nothing is more true than that the question of suffrage belongs to the States, but it is equally true that Congress is the exclusive judge of the compatibility of their solution of it with republican principles. The States have the right to prescribe who shall vote, but they have no right so to exercise it as to create an oligarchy or an aristocracy instead of a republican form of government; and it is the right and the duty of Congress to judge this question; and its judgment is final and conclusive on all departments of the government. If Congress thinks the State has constituted an oligarchy or an aristocracy by its law of suffrage, it is entitled and bound to refuse to recognize it, to annul the law, rescue the people from its power, and prescribe measures and conditions for the organization of a government, republican in form in its judgment, on American principles. This judgment it is the duty of the President to execute; over it he has no power. It is the duty of guaranteeing republican government in the States which gives Congress this high jurisdiction; and the right of determining who are the Representatives and Senators carries with it the exclusive right of determining which is the constitutional, that is, the republican government of a State, for otherwise it might find itself compelled to admit Representatives and Senators of States whose governments are not republican in form or substance in its opinion.

It is, therefore, clear that the President is wholly beyond the sphere of his power in every step in re-organizing State governments; for each step is either legal and binding on Congress, or illegal and a nullity; and as it can not bind Congress, it is a nullity and an illegality. It is, therefore, frivolous to say the President could do nothing but what he did. He could have done nothing. It was his duty to have done nothing. His intermeddling has gravely complicated the question of what is republican government with the claims of persons to seats and of parties to votes. But this does not vary the question, and it must be met as it is presented. Republican principles and national interests alike forbid the acceptance of the President's plan! That is the recognition by Congress of the principle that State governments which ostracize a majority, or a half, or a great mass of citizens, and subject them to the absolute government of others, is republican in form. That principle has never yet been acknowledged by any Congress. No State government has ever been recognized by Congress which ostracized the great mass of the people, white or black. It is not the exclusion from political power merely which is the test, but the exclusion of great masses of citizens.

A State may arbitrarily exclude from power one man, or a family, or a thousand families; or it may exclude from power a greater proportion of those who have renounced their allegiance and defied its laws, and yet not affect the republican character of the Government. But republican government in the American sense is the government by the mass of citizens through their representatives. Whenever, therefore, the mass of the citizens or any great proportion of them is excluded from political power, yet required to submit to its laws, the government ceases to be republican and Congress cannot recognize it as such. Here the question is not of the rights of man to a voice in the government, but of the meaning of republican government required to be guaranteed in the Constitution.

Connecticut has just refused to admit negroes to vote; but that does not touch the republicanism of her government; for the persons excluded form no material or appreciable portion of her citizens. But negro suffrage is one thing in Connecticut and another thing in South Carolina. In the latter State, the negro citizens form two-thirds of the whole body of citizens. To deny them a vote and subject them to the will of the one-third is absolutely in conflict with a republican form of government. It is not merely an aristocracy of race, it is an oligarchy. If the Constitution of the United States permits the ostracizing of two-thirds of the citizens and their subjection to one-third, the guarantee is one of mere form. A tenth may as well rule as a third, or one man as well as a tenth.

It is an accident that the line of disfranchisement and color are the same; it is not a question of race, but of republicanism. If two-thirds who are black may be excluded in South Carolina, two-thirds who are white may be excluded by the blacks in North Carolina; and one is just as republican as the other. The Constitution makes no distinction of color. Its only distinction is that between free and slave inhabitants. The slaves were always excluded irrespective of numbers, for they were not citizens. But free negroes were citizens of the United States. They were never declared by any State not to be citizens at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. They have never been declared not to be citizens by any department of the Government. The Dred Scott case has been ignorantly quoted to settle that point; but it decided not that a free negro could not be a citizen, but that a slave is not a citizen; and nobody ever supposed he could be. But free negroes are citizens of the United States by the unanimous judgment of all departments of the Government. That is now a settled point. And the Constitution draws no distinction between a black citizen and a white citizen. Congress has never acknowledged a State government to be republican which ostracized two-thirds or a half or one-third of its citizens. At the adoption of the Constitution the free negroes were in no State a tenth of the whole population. In Virginia they were one to thirty-six; in South Carolina one to seventy-seven; in Georgia one to one hundred and twenty-eight; and they voted in neither State, though in Virginia declared by law to be citizens. In Maryland they were one to twenty-five; in North Carolina one to sixty; and they voted in both. The largest proportion excluded at that time was in Delaware, where they were one to eleven. In Tennessee, the first State admitted, they were one to nine, and they voted. In Kentucky, the next State, they were excluded; but they were only one to five hundred and twenty-six. Even when Louisiana was admitted—the great prize of the ambitious slave-power—the ratio was only one to seven.

But now Congress is asked to guarantee as republican such despotisms as these: In North Carolina 631,000 citizens ostracize 331,000 citizens. In Virginia 719,000 citizens ostracize 533,000 citizens. In Alabama 596,000 citizens ostracize 437,000 citizens. In Georgia 591,000 citizens ostracize 465,000 citizens. In Louisiana 357,000 citizens ostracize 350,000 citizens. In Mississippi 353,000 citizens ostracize 436,000 citizens. In South Carolina 291,000 citizens ostracize 411,000 citizens.

It would be just as republican to reverse the numbers; and if we have no respect for republican principle, common sense would require that we, holding the Government, should vest our friends with the State governments and ostracize our opponents. The President asks us to ostracize our friends and place our enemies over their heads! Either course leaves republican government without any guarantee of its substance. It is vain to attempt to cover such iniquities as those by the example of the freehold or property qualifications formerly existing in some States. They might doubtless be pushed to the extent of impeaching the character of the Government; but hitherto they have never in the United States gone so far as to require the interposition of Congress. They never excluded any such masses of population as are ostracized by the President's plan, and they ostracized nobody. Every one could vote on getting the requisite property, and that was beyond nobody's reach. But the negro citizens are ostracized, they and their posterity for ever, even where two-thirds of the people. It is, therefore, impossible for republicans to recognize the President's governments. Nor ought they to feel the least hesitation in rejecting them; for the President's intermeddling is wholly illegal; it is an assumption to dictate to Congress respecting its members; and what has been done is a vain form, having no claim to legal authority till Congress by recognizing it gives it legal force. These mushroom governments play at governing the Southern States. It is plain the President treats them not as legal and authoritative governments, but as his puppets, whose acts he annuls when they do n't suit him. Congress, then, is free, and bound to treat them as mere nullities—to brush them away as so many cobwebs; and on the cleared field to mark out the foundations of republican principles on which the government should be erected. The objects to be kept in view are to break the force and unity of the rebel vote in Congress; to rescue the States from its domination; and to place in the hands of the colored population political power for their protection and our safety. Retaining the States under military power postpones the first danger, but it involves a greater. Such rule continued long over such vast populations must destroy every vestige of republican government. The military commissions which still defy the law, under the authority of the President, and, without the frivolous apology of actual hostilities, inflict punishments unknown to the law for acts displeasing to the President, are now fast unsettling the foundations of national freedom and personal security. If military government be continued in the rebel States, the idea of government by law will die out from the land, and the President's will be the only law. I prefer to risk the negroes under their masters and the country to the rebel vote in Congress, rather than subject loyal negroes and disloyal whites to the common despotism of military government, and expose the North to the dangers of tolerating and organizing such a despotism. Discarding, therefore, the horrible thought of military government as one the people ought not to tolerate, and will not tolerate, how can Congress paralyze the dangerous vote? It can amend the Constitution so as to apportion representation according to the persons who are allowed to vote. Mr. Sloan moved this last winter, but it never came to a vote. But that leaves the States in the hands of the disaffected. That could be avoided in the opinion of some by excluding disloyal men who have been engaged in the rebellion from power in the States. But the loyal white population are so mere a handful in the midst of the disaffected mass as to be wholly unable to administer the government and enforce submission to the laws; and the pressure of public opinion would compel them to open the door to the excluded mass. That attempt has so resulted in Virginia and Louisiana, where Gov. Peirpont and Gen. Banks pursued that policy. They merely created a temporary and powerless oligarchy. But it would fail in one other material object. The negro population would still be without a voice or a guarantee for any right. It is necessary, therefore, at once to satisfy republican principles, rescue the States from rebel domination, secure Congress against their undivided and hostile vote, protect the rights of the negro population, and create a body of friends for the United States, interested to fight for its supremacy, that Congress should require the States to be reorganized on the basis of universal suffrage; and that it should refuse to recognize any government which does not recognize that. It should then secure this permanent foundation of American republicanism against the mutations of political life and the local hostilities in the Southern States by proposing an amendment to the Constitution, consecrating it for ever as the criterion and condition of republican government in every State.

These measures are the necessary buttresses for the support of that prohibiting slavery. Without them it will totter and may fall, and certainly must fail to secure real liberty and equality before the law. Power alone is security, and with it comes respect and dignity and education. They who propose to postpone negro suffrage till the negro is educated, need political education more than the negro. I think our only safety is in confining our efforts to these measures. It is too late to break the power of the Southern aristocracy by depriving their leaders of citizenship. Confiscation was never possible unless by partition of the lands among the negroes, and that Congress feared to enact. To sell a continent is impossible without a continent of buyers; and the laws are and will remain in the President's hands mere political thumb-screws to extort votes more powerful than all his patronage. All that remains open is to balance the power of the disaffected aristocracy by the resident mass of loyal negroes armed with the ballot and bayonet.

It is quite certain the President does not mean to insist on this. If his proclamations were an experiment on the temper of the white population, he is satisfied with facts which dismay his friends. He is so impatient of contradiction that loyal warnings are become "pestilent and malignant utterances." He is experimenting now on nothing but the patience of the Republicans and the support of the Democrats. Of the latter he is receiving daily gratifying assurances. Of course, he is not thinking of joining the Democrats; for that would be going into a minority. But neither does he seem to be devoted to the Republicans. His policy is that of the Democrats, and his hope is to induce the Republicans to abandon their principles and unite with him in executing that of the Democrats. How many of the Republicans will unite with the Democrats to reinstate the representatives of the rebellion in power, in order that they may unite with the Democrats to expel us from power, remains to be seen. If enough to give the President a majority, a counter revolution is effected, which postpones the fruits of the war for a generation—it may be, then to be wrung from those in power by another civil war. It is possible the President may mean to disappoint the hopes of the Democrats; but it is not safe for Republicans to stake their cause on that doubtful and improbable chance. If he persevere, they must be ready to defy a most formidable coalition. For the Southern representatives, if admitted, will, in this Congress, meet many warm friends from the Northern States.

In the next Congress the coalition can hardly fail to be in a majority in the House, and to press so closely on our majority in the Senate that a few defections may destroy it. The loss of the next Presidency is the natural sequel of the triumph of the President's plan, and, if once lost, will any one name a day when there is a reasonable prospect of our regaining it? The best we can hope for, therefore, under the President's policy is, that the Southern representatives will subordinate their passions to securing their interests in the Union by the coalition as of old. It is not likely the Democrats will repel their advances.

It is possible that these people, so arrogant in rebellion, may be meek when in power over their enemies; that they will pay our debt, pension our soldiers, vote indemnity to loyal citizens; and vote against assuming their own debt, against pensioning their own wounded, against restoring their own officers to the army and navy, against compensation for their slaves, against annulling the confiscation acts or indemnity where the title cannot be revoked; and that the Democrats will aid them in passing their self-denying ordinances, but it seems to me not wise to assume it. It is safer to take their view of their interests as the measure of what they will attempt, and what they can do as the limit of what they will do.

I do not fear a new rebellion now, but I will not shut my eyes to what men who have no interests but what are opposed to those who triumphed may do in power. Fifty-seven representatives and twenty-two senators are more than enough to arrest legislation in either House by tactics well known and often applied, and not hitherto pushed to revolutionary extremes, because the constituencies had an interest in the Government the representatives did not venture to disregard. But here revolutionary constituencies stand behind representatives struggling for their interests against their conquerors. They will not restrain their representatives, and if they persist, will not Democrats hasten to rescue the Government by granting their demands? If they fail in this, the life of nations is too fruitful of changes to justify us in excluding from our calculations contingencies where foreign war or civil discord may place the nation at the mercy of a hostile minority; when a Buchanan may be President, and refuse to strike while they divide the nation without the fear of the sword; or when a loyal President may rashly expel them from Congress, break the power of law by violence, and plunge us into the anarchy of civil war without a government recognized by all which alone carried us safely through the rebellion. Against all these dangers, the refusal to recognize loyal oligarchies or disloyal aristocracies, and the recognition only of governments republican in form in the Southern States, are the sufficient and only guarantee. The mass of the loyal negro vote breaks the unity of the hostile vote in every State and will absolutely control it in many.

In 1776 God gave us wise men who secured every point of victory possible. In this time of trial God has given us, for our sins, rulers who are not so wise, and the people grope toward their salvation and teach their rulers to secure it. By his blessing we are entrusted with two-thirds of both Houses of Congress, and that is the absolute legislative power of the United States. What we think right, we can do. If the President deserts those who elected him for the votes and policy of their opponents, we must break the coalition at any cost. The President can have our support only by conforming his conduct to our principles. It is vain to argue, from the dangers of division, the necessity of submission to his will; that will itself, if unchanged, works the ruin more surely than any division. It is itself the division, unless we meanly sell a great cause for Presidential patronage.

But it is vain to deny that failure now is final for this generation, for the people who want negro suffrage are in the North, and they who are to decide it are in the South, representing and voting for the negroes in more than one-fourth of all the States, with a negative on any amendment of the Constitution, and absolute power in each State. It is insane to dream that the South will, of itself, ever give either suffrage or equality before the law, and now is our only time to compel it.

If men say, God works slowly, yet will not let a good cause fail, they had better enlighten their piety by a glance at his ways in history, and reflect that he visits wasted opportunities, not less than wickedness, with ruin. I trust we may not be monuments of that wrath.

Very sincerely, your obedient servant,
HENRY WINTER DAVIS.

BALTIMORE, October, 1865.

THE SOUTH AS IT IS.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

XIX.

PORT ROYAL ISLAND, S. C., Nov. 10, 1865.

INTENDING soon to revisit Charleston, I made no long stay in that city, but on the morning of yesterday sailed down the harbor past the famous islands and forts, and, keeping the low, wooded coast in sight during the whole day, in the evening reached Hilton Head. The neat, whitewashed town, built there in the sand by the quartermasters and sutlers during the last four years, with its hospitals, and storehouses, and machine-shops, and offices, has lost much of its old importance, and, instead of being the bustling part of the Department of the South, is sinking back into the quiet dulness of its natural condition as a part of the State of South Carolina. A stumbling walk in the dark up the long wooden pier, which extends far into the shallow water of the bay, brought me to the hotel, where I found the few guests gathered around a box-stove, for the night was windy and cold, and the walls of the house—a portable or sectional building—were thin. There were two or three Federal uniforms in the company, some men who seemed to be Northern traders, and a person who had the easily distinguishable appearance and manners of a South Carolinian. This gentleman, a person of some fifty odd years old, dressed tolerably well in a suit of grey clothes, with a large display of crumpled linen at the collar and cuffs of his coat, sat before the stove smoking, and talking very freely about his present poverty and his plans for the future.

He had left St. Helena, he said, when Dupont forced an entrance, and captured the Sea Islands, in 1861. He and his family ran, leaving plate and furniture behind them, and went up to Greenville, where he 'd since been living how he could. The Government took his cotton, and somebody, Government or niggers, got everything else that was left. Then, in the spring of 1863, they sold his plantation. Some Massachusetts man bought it, and he did n't know when he 'd get it back. Up in Greenville he soon spent all his money to support his family, but if he 'd had money he could n't have saved his property. How was he to come back inside the Yankee lines and pay the tax? The commissioners knew very well it could n't be done; the sale was a perfectly unfair thing. He did n't know whether the place would be restored to him or not, but at any rate he intended to leave Greenville, and move down to Beaufort. It was just as well to starve in Beaufort as in any strange place. He hoped to be able to pick up a little medical practice, but if his profession failed him, he supposed his son and himself could put up a cabin somewhere in the vicinity, and get fish and oysters enough to live on. He intended to go up to Greenville the next day, and bring his family down immediately. He had n't a dollar in money; had thought it would be a good plan to circulate a handbill among his acquaintances up there, asking them to aid him, but the trouble was, pretty much all of them were as poor as himself—better off so far as keeping their land went, but without ready money. Then he went on to relate, in a good-humored way, many amusing stories of Sherman's army, and the impudence of the bummers.

This gentleman, it is currently reported, has made several visits to the plantation which he formerly owned, and the negroes living there have collected for his use nearly a hundred dollars. In several instances similar contributions have not only been accepted but solicited. In July last, a gentleman who once owned a fine plantation, about ten miles distant from Beaufort, rode out to it in a carriage hired for him by a negro formerly his slave, and, having called together such of the people as would go to meet him and shaken hands with them all, he told them that he was now a poor man; that he had even been compelled to beg to support his family; that the very ear-rings from his wife's ears had been exchanged for food; that they all knew that their mistress knew nothing about any kind of work, and had never done any; and he concluded his address by a personal application to each one for whatever money he could spare. The response to this appeal was not a very liberal one, my informant said. Prince ga' 'm seventy-fi' cent, she believed, and several of the others gave him something; she herself would give nothing. "Den mawser git into de kerridge an' drive off," she added. "Him tell bro' Prince take good keer o' all tings. Him for come back soon, him say. But ef dem rebel come back, tell ye wha' no' our nigger gwine for stay on dis place, no' one nigger. Wid dem she-shesh! Chuh!"

On another plantation I learn that small gifts of money and poultry have been received from the people by their former master, who himself urged his claim upon their kindness, and who was found willing to accept half a dollar from an old, crippled negress who now for some years has drawn rations and been furnished with medicine and clothing at the expense of the Government.

Most of the negroes, I should say, are surprisingly free from a vulgar contempt for these men merely because of their sudden poverty and the shifts and straits to which they see them reduced, and some appear to feel a genuine commiseration for them in their distress. But their kindly feeling towards them extends no further than this, and it is, perhaps, remarkable that it should extend so far, for evidently they fear and dislike the slaveholders, both as a class and individually. The probable return of their former owners to the island, the possibility that they may some time be compelled to work for them and be governed by them, seem to excite the liveliest apprehensions and very strong expressions of hostility.

The swift steamer Rockland, plying between Savannah and Charleston by the inland route, took me in a little more than an hour up the river to Beaufort. The town stands on the river of the same name, one of the many streams or inlets which, with their net-work of endless ramifications and intersections, everywhere penetrate the south-eastern Carolina coast, and, dividing it into many parts, form the Sea Islands. Beaufort is a quiet town, with many handsome houses scattered here and there among the sandy streets, and with abundance of orange trees, and oleanders, and pomegranates; and on all hands the live oaks are to be seen with their grey drapery of hanging moss. The scene was a familiar one to me, and as there was no special reason for my remaining there, I rode out across the island in a north-westerly direction, over what had once been an excellent road, until four years of neglect had injured it, and finally the passage of Sherman, corduroying as he went, gave it the finishing blow and made it execrable. In the country through which it led me there was more woodland than clearing, and of the cleared land much more than half, fenceless, bushy, and unkempt, lay uncultivated. In this region of large plantations, however, it is customary for a planter to divide his lands, and to work each acre every alternate year, the one half being left fallow and used as a pasture while the other is planted. The cabins of the people seemed to be in tolerable preservation, and no better or worse than those commonly found in other sections of the State; but at several points on the roadside, at some distance from any negro quarters, I noticed small unsightly shanties, made of poles and rough clapboards, which appeared to be occupied by vagabonds or squatters—people who proposed staying but a short time in one place, and working for themselves only. Upon this road, more than in any other district of the South in which I have yet travelled, the negroes seem to form a part of the commercial world. I was constantly overtaking them or meeting them going into the town with produce to sell, or returning with their purchases, the load being sometimes made into a bundle or laid in a flat basket and carried mile after mile on the head, while the shoes very likely were carried in one hand and an umbrella or stick in the other, and sometimes it would be stowed away into the body of a little, creaky, shaky, home-made cart, with a wooden axle so chafed and worn that the wheels, wandering in a headstrong way hither and thither, each making a serpentine track, gave additional labor to some poor creature of a horse, who tugs at his collar of plaited corn-shucks, and seems hardly to have strength enough to break his patched and rotten harness. Many of these travellers are dressed quite well, and many are literally covered with rags.

A two hours' jolt over this road brought me to the plantation which I desired to visit, a pleasant tract of land, bounded on two sides by a blue river, and not far from Port Royal Ferry. The kindness of the gentleman who plants it, Mr. J. H., has enabled me to gain some exact information in regard to the general management and working of the place during the past year. I have selected this plantation as one that may be taken, all things considered, to furnish a fair sample of the present state of cotton culture in this part of the country, and of the present condition and disposition of the free laborers in the Sea Islands.

The plantation contains about three hundred acres of ordinarily good land, of which, perhaps, a hundred acres are well adapted to cotton, and a reasonable proportion of the remainder is capable of producing corn. There is also potato ground, and low, wet ground, on which rice can be raised. Flowing along one side of the plantation is a creek from which can be obtained salt mud and marsh grass for manure, and to supply the people with wood there is a large tract of pine barren. The cotton land is rather high, and the soil is light, so that a dry season affects the crops unfavorably.

The people who form the working force consist in part of negroes who were born and bred on the plantation, and in greater part of people who came from the mainland with Sherman's army, and were hired as laborers in February last. The whole number of laborers was fifty-six. Forty-five of these were persons who, in point of physical ability, ranked as full hands, two were ploughmen, and nine were people too old or too young to perform a good day's work. In round numbers, it may be said that the working force consisted of fifty full hands and two ploughmen. The season now ending is Mr. H.'s first year upon this plantation, and the fourth year of his experience as a cotton planter. When the time came for preparing the ground for planting he had upon the place only the people who had always lived there, and who for three years had been free laborers To them he proposed that they should work for him for wages in money; they proposed that he should give them half the crop as their wages, which he refused to do. An order had been issued from General Saxton's headquarters directing that whenever laborers worked a crop "on shares," their share should be one-half of all the cotton raised, and of all the breadstuffs, including corn, potatoes, rice, and peanuts. The people sent a deputation to the headquarters of the military governor and complained that Mr. H. was endeavoring to force them to make a contract, the terms of which were contrary to the instructions of the circular No. 8. Mr. H., therefore, received a letter calling his attention to the fact that any person violating these directions would be at once sent out of the department. He explained that false representations had been made, that he wished to hire his laborers for money, but they were disposed to insist that he should divide the crop with them. It was necessary that all contracts should be examined and approved at headquarters, and his proposals having been pronounced fair, he was permitted to proceed in his endeavors to hire the people. They, however, were still desirous of having their own plan carried into effect, and still refused to accede to his terms; he was even assailed by outcries of various kinds whenever he visited the negro quarters, and demands for "half the crop." Meantime the empty houses on the plantation he had been filling up with families of refugees, and the time for planting was very near at hand. The people still remained fixed in their determination, and at last it became necessary to send a guard to the place with orders to remove all persons there resident who would neither sign the contract as prepared by the lessee and approved at headquarters, nor make room for others who were willing to do so. The threat alone was sufficient, and the signatures of all the laborers were at once given. By the time this difficulty was removed, the season was somewhat advanced, and the crop was not planted till more than a fortnight after the proper time. It may be thought that an occurrence such as I have just related is of itself enough to remove this plantation into the list of exceptional cases. But misunderstandings similar to this in their causes and effects, if not precisely like it in their details, are a part of the experiences of a majority, or at least of very many, of the Northern planters in the Sea Islands.

Mr. H.'s fifty laborers, assisted by the two ploughmen, planted eighty-seven acres of cotton, or considerably less than two acres apiece. Up to the 1st of November, 6,716 lbs. of seed cotton had been picked, and it is not impossible that before the picking season closes the whole amount of seed cotton may be 8,000 lbs. The cost of the 6,716 lbs. already gathered has been $1,631 for wages paid the laborers, exclusive of the interest on capital invested in mules and farming implements, the expenses of ginning the cotton, and the value of the manure. The cotton which is to be looked to for the repayment of this $1,631, to say nothing of the other expenses of the crop and the plantation in general, will, when ginned, amount to something like 1,670 lbs. This very unsatisfactory result is partly due to these three causes: On account of the controversy already mentioned the crop was planted late; it suffered severely from a long drought in July and August; the caterpillar made its appearance in August for the third time in three successive years, and though its ravages were not so extensive as in the two preceding years, they were sufficient to seriously diminish the crop. But for these three things Mr. H.'s enterprise would, he thinks, have proved moderately remunerative, and he intends to plant in 1866. Anything like perfect success, however, he fears, is unattainable at present, and he is not yet quite prepared to say whether the fault is in the negroes, or in the system of labor and payment that has been adopted in this department. Although in these Sea Islands the negroes are now in the fourth year of their freedom, he is of opinion that they have never yet been fairly tried as free laborers. And now, he would say, to leave untouched the various questions that have agitated this department at one time and another—whether or not it is well to make the negroes all landholders by a division of land amongst them; whether or not it was a wise policy to allow negroes to pre-empt land; whether or not a negro in Port Royal should receive just the same, or more, or less wages than a stevedore in New York—setting all these questions aside, he believes that the system of wages for labor which has prevailed in this department is of itself an insuperable obstacle in the way of successful cultivation of cotton by free labor. That alone would account for the prevalent ill success. For example, a man comes to his place to work for him, and takes up, say, an acre of cotton. He moves into a house on the place, and in February goes out into the field and lays out his acre into the regular four tasks. He chops down the weeds with his hoe, lays them in the furrows between the old cotton beds, and pulls the earth of the old bed over the weeds. That's listing, and he gets so much a task for listing. Then he goes out again and pulls up the earth on the listing. That's banking, and he has so much a task for banking. Then comes planting, and so much a task for that, and so much a task for each hoeing and each hauling. For such and such an operation so many cents. By-and-bye picking comes, and there's so much a pound for all the cotton picked; everything as easy and regular as clock-work. But if he 's wanted to do a quarter of an hour's work at any time, he expects pay for that. If he goes to the house for an axe he 's to be paid extra for it. It 's well enough to pay a man for all he does, but who can carry on a farm in such a way as that? But suppose you want him very much for some piece of work that must be done. You cannot have him. He 's working an acre of cotton for you, but his corn, and his rice, and potatoes make a little farm that he 's working for himself, and he can't do job-work for you when he 's got his provisions to make; he needs to have control of his own time. He had hardly a single worker out of all his fifty-six who had n't more land under cultivation for himself than for his employer.

The whole affair down here looked rather discouraging, but at the same time he would not say, and no one ought to say, that the application of free negro labor to cotton raising was a failure, till he had seen the experiment tried more fairly than it had been in this department. If it were possible to make a change merely in the matter of supporting and paying the laborers, greatly improved results might be expected.

ENGLAND.—THE DANGERS OF THE NEW CABINET.

LONDON, November 10, 1865.

EARL RUSSELL is not likely to find his premiership a sinecure. To say nothing of the domestic difficulties which surround his attempt to form an administration, he is called upon on the very moment almost of assuming office to deal with questions which would perplex and embarrass a far more popular minister than he ever has been, or can hope to be. It is well known that a return to the office of prime minister has long been the cherished object of his ambition. Nobody who has once been first ever likes to become second; and Earl Russell, even if he was a far less self-sufficient man than he is, can hardly be expected to recognize how much of his former success was due to his position and connections, how little to his own personal merits. When Sidney Smith said that the then Lord John Russell would be equally ready to command the Channel fleet or perform an operation for the stone at a moment's notice, he intended to convey a sneer at the great Whig leader as well as to celebrate his intrepidity. Nobody ever doubted Earl Russell's readiness to undertake a difficult and dangerous duty; most people who have ever watched his career have learnt to distrust his courage when the moment of trial came. Yet with all his proverbial intrepidity the Premier can hardly feel confident of weathering the storms which are gathering round him on his return to power. First and foremost amongst these impending dangers I should count the awkward condition of our relations with America.

On the subject of our international relations I always feel considerable difficulty in writing. It would not be in human nature if an Englishman who, like myself, has been engaged for the last four years in pointing out the absurdity of English pro-Southern sympathies and the difficulties into which our one-sided neutrality was certain to lead us ultimately, did not feel some personal satisfaction at the fulfilment of his disregarded prophecies. Cassandra herself must have felt that the news of the misfortunes which befell the Trojans for not listening to her advice was not utterly without a corresponding gratification. On the other hand, I feel I should be acting dishonestly if I in any way represented this personal sentiment as being a common or influential one. The mere possibility of a war between our two countries is, in my opinion, so fearful a contingency that no honest man can be too careful to avoid saying or writing anything which may tend in any way to conduce to such a result. Now, I believe that nothing tended to bring on the Crimean war so much as a belief, on the part of the Russian Government, that there existed in England a party so strongly opposed to war that an appeal to arms would never be really resorted to. Just in the same way, to speak the plain and open truth, I believe your Government would be most grievously mistaken if they relied too much on the sympathies of a large class of Englishmen with the Northern cause. If once a demand is made which, rightly or wrongly, English public opinion deems unjust and exorbitant, you will find the nation, with scarcely an exception, will support the Government in resisting that demand at all risks and hazards. Only a few days ago I was talking to a member of Parliament whose name is well known to you as a thorough-going and enthusiastic partizan of the Northern cause from the earliest times of the war. As an explanation of the comparative silence on American topics which he has kept since the triumph of the North, he said: "I have avoided the discussion of the American question purposely of late because, if there should arise any chance of war between England and America, I, of course, must take the side of England." And this feeling I believe to be well-nigh universal. Of course, it is for you to decide whether any claims you have, or believe you have, against us ought to be upheld at the possible cost of war. That is a question on which I express no opinion; but I feel bound in fairness to say that, in such an event, it would be worse than foolish to reckon on any internal opposition to the action of the Government. You may, perhaps, think that I am fighting against a shadow in thus deprecating any ill-advised action. But I have seen once in my life already how easily England "drifts into war," and I have no wish to see the experiment repeated.

The immediate reason of my noting these events is the return of the Shenandoah to our waters, a circumstance which, it is apprehended in this country, may give rise to serious embarrassments between England and America. The general feeling of the public is one of extreme annoyance that this wretched vessel should have ever turned up again. If we had heard she had been sunk at sea, or captured by Federal cruisers, or had surrendered herself to any power in the world except ourselves, not one Englishman in ten thousand but would have experienced and expressed his satisfaction at the result. Whatever else may be our national resemblance to Cato, we most assuredly do not sympathize with him in his preference for the causa victa. But, by a sort of not unrighteous retribution, this last of the Anglo-Confederate cruisers has made her way safely to Liverpool and now lies at anchor in the Mersey. The Bottle Imp has been thrown back upon our hands just when we hoped we were quit of it for ever. However, here the Shenandoah is, and we must lie in our bed as we have made it.

But, at the same time, I hope the Shenandoah difficulty may possibly smooth the way for a settlement of the Alabama claims. The return of this piratical vessel to our waters, and the protection she has derived beneath our flag, have brought home to the minds of Englishmen some conviction as to the substantial character of your complaints against our so-called neutrality. In all the leading papers and in society I perceive an increased readiness to admit the possibility of referring the Alabama question to arbitration; and if your Government evinces the extraordinary good sense and good temper it has shown hitherto, the difficulty may be settled amicably. Such, at least, is the current opinion in political circles. In such a crisis it is felt to be a misfortune that Earl Russell should be at the head of affairs. In a frigid sort of way he has always sympathized with the Northern cause, or as much as it lay in the nature of the most aristocratic of Whigs to sympathize with any popular cause. But he utterly lacks the tact or temper to conduct difficult and delicate negotiations; while his passion for lecturing everybody on every possible occasion renders him singularly liable to give unnecessary offence. If this American difficulty should not pass over, it will probably give the death-blow to the Ministry. If Earl Russell should endanger peace by resistance to any claims brought forward by the Washington cabinet, he will certainly be turned out of office as not equal to the crisis; if, on the other hand, he averts the risk of war by any important concessions, he will still more certainly be sacrificed to the annoyance of the public at any outrage on their national susceptibilities.

Indeed, the Government seems to be falling to pieces almost before it is formed. The Times, whose insight into domestic questions is generally much acuter than its judgment as to foreign subjects, has lost no opportunity of predicting the collapse of the new administration. In truth, it has, as the French say, no reason for being. Alexander is dead, and Alexander's generals have no claim to inherit his succession. With the solitary exceptions of Earl Russell and Mr. Gladstone, every member of the late cabinet owed his position rather to the favor of the Premier than to any merits of his own. Lord Granville, Lord Stanley of Alderley, the Duke of Somerset, Earls de Grey and Ripon, Sir Charles Wood, Sir George Grey, and Mr. Milner Gibson have none of them any substantial position except what they derived from being members of the Palmerston Ministry. Now that they have lost their leader, they have no hold whatever upon the country. They add no strength to any administration they belong to, even if they take nothing from it. This fact constituted their chief merit in the eyes of their late chief. Lord Palmerston liked to reign alone; and it was only against his will that he tolerated the independent positions which birth and connection, in the one case, and talent and energy, in the other, conferred respectively upon the late Minister for Foreign Affairs and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Thus the reconstructed Ministry is very like an arch minus the keystone. Opinions may and ought to differ as to the absolute merits of Lord Palmerston as a statesman; but no candid observer can dispute his extraordinary ability as a parliamentary leader. With the same materials neither Earl Russell nor Mr. Gladstone can be expected to produce the same results as the late Premier; and yet this is the task they have undertaken to perform. As far as can be judged, the one aim of the new Prime Minister is to rally round him as many as possible of his late colleagues, and to pursue the same policy as his predecessor.

If the aspect of foreign affairs were far more pacific than it is in the Old World as well as the New, this policy would be surrounded with very serious difficulties. The question of reform, for instance, is one with which the new Ministry must deal at the very outset of its career. Both Earl Russell and Mr. Gladstone are pledged to the principle of an extension of the suffrage. Hitherto they have been able to plead the personal popularity of Lord Palmerston as an excuse for not redeeming their pledges. Through their organs in the press, if not by their own words, they stated the patent facts that the country was resolved to keep Lord Palmerston in power; that the Premier was hostile to every idea of immediate reform; and that, therefore, they were obliged to bow to circumstances, and postpone the realization of their desires to a more opportune season. With Lord Palmerston's death there is an end of any such apology. The Premier and the leader of the House of Commons have it now in their own power to introduce a reform bill; and they are, therefore, compelled to make election between an extension or a non-extension of the suffrage. In the former case, they lose the support of the Whigs, who at heart are in favor of keeping things as they are; in the latter, they alienate the advanced liberals, who are resolved upon extending the electoral franchise. In either case, they destroy their majority in the House of Commons and necessitate an appeal to the country. If they could tell with any certainty whether the country really desired a reform bill or not, they might shape their course accordingly. Unfortunately, no positive opinion can be gained as to whether there is any strong popular feeling at the moment in favor of an extension of the suffrage; and, therefore, they are utterly in the dark as to whether they should adopt reform as the ministerial programme. In this uncertainty both Earl Russell and Mr. Gladstone have exerted all their skill to avoid any direct expression of opinion. The Premier has resorted to his usual platitudes, the Chancellor has surpassed himself in rhetorical displays, and each of them has avoided any intelligible expression of opinion on the subject of reform. Now this sort of shilly-shallying was tolerated in the case of Lord Palmerston partly through his consummate adroitness, still more through his immense personal popularity. But it is not likely to be accepted at the hands of men wanting alike in his tact and his strange hold upon the public mind.

Mr. Gladstone has been making what in theatrical jargon is called "the provincial circuit." He has been starring it in all the great Scottish towns, and—to pursue the metaphor—has drawn enormous houses. North of the Tweed there is a love for fine phrases and metaphysical distinctions not shared in to any great extent by the English race; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer contrived to catch the taste of his Scotch audiences with extraordinary skill. But if you analyze what he said, I defy anybody to make out any distinct statement from the torrent of eloquent words with which he inundated his delighted hearers. His most successful attempt consisted in a thesis whose object was to support the orthodox view of religion. According to the system of theology of which Professor Maurice is the ablest exponent in this country, he proved to the satisfaction of his hearers that, in the order of Divine Providence, both the Greek worship of human nature and the Judaic monotheism were necessary to the development of the perfect creed of Christianity. He argued ingeniously enough; but hypercritical persons are always prone to question the cogency of ex post facto reasoning, and practical persons are inclined to doubt whether a Chancellor of the Exchequer has time to master the problems of theology.

Sanguine people imagined that Lord Russell would expound the programme of the new Ministry at the inaugural banquet of the new Lord Mayor, which took place yesterday. The expectation was not fulfilled; and the guests in the Egyptian hall, at the Mansion House, came away as wise as they went, as the Premier contented himself with uttering a series of vague generalities. The liberal papers, who hope against hope, profess to gather from the Delphic utterances of the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer an intention to carry out their reform pledges. But the common impression is, that the Ministry do not feel themselves strong enough to introduce a reform bill. Alderman Phillips, the present chief magistrate of the city, is a Jew, and is the gentleman whose election twenty years ago to the dignity of alderman was the first triumph of the cause of Jewish emancipation, of which, by the way, Mr. Gladstone was then a staunch opponent. Times change and men change with them. The saying is not new, but it is, I think, appropriate.

"RECEPTIONS."

THE dissatisfaction generally expressed with regard to the manner in which the great reception at the Fifth Avenue Hotel was managed, suggests the consideration whether it is not a great mistake to attempt to meet the popular demand for a "sight" of Grant, or any other man of similar standing, in this way. If you cram a building or a room as full of people as it can possibly hold, perfect "order" can only be preserved by everybody's staying quietly wherever he finds himself. All movement, or attempts at movement, produce confusion, and it is a kind of confusion not repressible by the police. The ordinary effect upon nervous men or women especially, and nearly everybody now-a-days is nervous, of finding himself tightly packed amongst his fellow-creatures, is to produce an irresistible desire to get out of the fix. It is, in fact, another form of the punishment common in the navy, of locking men up in a close-fitting closet, with a hole in the door to admit the air, but it is aggravated by the heat evolved by the surrounding bodies, and at evening entertainments by the gas-light. Few women can stand it very long; it develops, even in strong men, a shocking and often uncontrollable irritability, which is apt to display itself, at last, in frantic efforts to escape, at whatever risk to other people's toes and ribs.

There is, however, another reason why a New York crowd is, under such circumstances, unusually uncontrollable. Anybody who has paid close attention to the phenomena of New York society must have observed how thoroughly pervaded it is by what may be called a noble discontent. Your genuine New Yorker always wants to be in some other place than where he is. The number of houses in which he can sit down resignedly and be conscious that the present is a happy moment, and enjoy it, are exceedingly few. As a general rule, if he finds himself at Smith's, no matter what pains the host may have taken to make his stay agreeable, he is haunted by a vague suspicion that at Brown's, round the corner, there is better entertainment to be had, and he hankers after it till he either can resist no longer and goes in search of it, or goes home with the feeling that he might have done better, and has had on the whole a stupid evening. In an ordinary "reception" the manifestations of this disease, for disease it is, are very curious and worth observation. It is aggravated somewhat by the practice in which hostesses are apt to indulge of drafting the gentlemen and detailing them in various directions to "converse" with ladies whose society is not sought by volunteers. There are few things more melancholy to witness at an ordinary evening party, where there is no dancing, than the aspect of a gentlemen led off in this way to be "introduced" to a "charming lady," whom he has never seen or heard of before, and with whom, for a few moments after presentation, he exchanges an agonized stare, while both are ransacking their brains for vivacious remarks. The general tendency to imagine that in some other part of the room lighter and more agreeable duty can be found is, of course, increased in cases of this kind by the sense of wrong which the subject of compulsion, let it be ever so sweet, always feels. The consequence is, that except on those rare occasions when "kindred spirits" light upon each other in full dress in a crowded parlor, the guest can rarely entirely rid himself of the belief that if he were down nearer the dining-room, or up nearer the street or out in the hall, his condition would be improved, and that he would have in some way or other, he does not know exactly what, a pleasanter time. This morbid fancy shows itself in people who are conversing by the incoherency of their remarks and the wandering of their eyes all over the room, and in the more desperate cases, in those not actually engaged in small talk, by their resolute dodging about through the crowd with a look of mild despair.

Now, when you take people afflicted with this lust of change, and pack them tightly together in the passages and parlors of a hotel, you stimulate the passion into the highest activity, and the wonder is not that there should be disorder, but that there should not be positive tumult. Nobody wants to stay where he is put, and the slightest effort to go elsewhere sends a vibration through the mass about him. In this case matters were made worse by the fact that Grant was in some other room, and that everybody not only wanted to be about three feet in front of him, but went there for that express purpose. The space around the general, however, although he is not a small man, is limited, and the practice of shaking hands of course restricts the number of those who can occupy it. Hand-shaking, in spite of all the unpleasant remarks that foreign critics make upon it, is a very natural and, in our estimation, very agreeable mode of salutation. It brings people nearer together, not only physically but morally, than a bow can ever do; but the trouble is that with all our great men we never observe any moderation about it. There is a tradition that General Harrison was killed by it, and if Grant does not succumb to it, all that can be said is that he is a man of vigorous constitution. On various occasions he has had to go on shaking with his arm and hand greatly swollen, and when the grasp of each of his admirers must have caused him positive torture. Now shaking a swollen and livid hand may be to some people a pleasure, but it is a barbarous pleasure, in which no person of proper sensibilities would knowingly indulge. On one occasion in this city, shortly after the fall of Richmond, when the general was enduring a good deal of hospitality, he was accompanied by somebody who played for the occasion the part of an exhibitor, or usher, whichever term be the more respectful, who warned the crowd by exclaiming at frequent intervals, "Take his hand gently, gentlemen; the general is greatly fatigued! the general is greatly fatigued!" Admonition of this kind is all the more necessary on these occasions, because in every crowd of his admirers there are always a great many who are far more solicitous about displaying their own feelings than about his comfort, and accordingly present their respects in a wild shake, which probably goes to the victim's soul.

The question arises, therefore, whether when people want to see Grant, or anybody of similar reputation, it would not be well, first of all, to prohibit hand-shaking; then to hold the reception, not in suites of rooms, but in one large one, like Irving Hall or the Academy of Music, and, having put him in some conspicuous place, let the crowd defile before him, and bow or talk to him as they go. It may be said that this would have a monarchical or aristocratic look, and so it would, but sensible people will not be frightened by words. It is one of the court customs which is worth copying, for though it is doubtless in some degree based on a respect for royalty, of which we know nothing, it is also based on convenience. The experience of ages has shown that it is that mode in which great personages can see great numbers of people on the same occasion, with the least inconvenience to themselves or their admirers, and if there is any comfort to be got out of it, Grant is as much entitled to it as any king or queen. Moreover, the work of paying respects could in this way be despatched in half the time it takes to shake hands, and give twice as many people an opportunity of seeing the hero of the evening.

At the Fifth Avenue, the other night, not one half of those present even set eyes on Grant; not a quarter even shook hands with him. Most of the company passed the time in the adjacent parlors and corridors, actively engaged in keeping the clothes on their own backs, and keeping their wives and daughters from being deprived of their hoops, and whatever covers them. Tall men who could see round corners, probably in the dim and distant crowd saw a bobbing about in one spot, such as would indicate a fight at a political meeting, and knew that there the work of presentation was going on, but this only made their own confinement more irksome. Little and middle-sized people simply suffered and perspired.

A PILGRIMAGE TO PETRARCH'S HOUSE AT ARQUÀ.

I.

WE said, during summer days at Venice, when every campo was a furnace seven times heated, and every canal was filled with boiling bathers, "As soon as it rains we will go to Arquà." Remembering the ardors of an April sun on the long, level roads of plain, we could not think of them in August without a sense of dust clogging every pore, and eyes that shrank from the vision of their blinding whiteness. So we stayed in Venice, waiting for rain, until the summer had almost lapsed into autumn; and as the weather cooled before any rain reached us, we took the moisture on the mainland for granted, and set out under a cloudy and windy sky.

We had to go to Padua by railway, and take carriage thence to Arquà, upon the road to Ferrara. I believe no rule of human experience was violated when it began to rain directly after we reached Padua, and continued to rain violently the whole day. We gave up this day entirely to the rain, and did not leave Padua until the following morning, when we count that our pilgrimage to Petrarch's house actually began.

The rain had cooled and freshened the air, but it was already too late in the season for the summer to recover herself with the elastic brilliancy that follows the rain of July or early August; and there was I know not what vague sentiment of autumn in the weather. There was not yet enough of it to stir the but in here and there a faded leaf (for in Europe death is not glorified to the foliage as in our own land), in the purple of the ripening grapes, and in the tawny grass of the pastures, there was autumn enough to touch our spirits, while it hardly affected the tints of the landscape, and to lay upon us the gentle and pensive spell of its presence. Of all the days in the year I would have chosen this to go pilgrim into the house of Petrarch.

"Tears from the depth of some divine despair;"

The Euganean Hills, on one of which the poet's house is built, are those mellow heights which you see when you look southwest across the lagoon at Venice. In misty weather they are blue, and in clear weather silver. On very bright days the lagoon seems to swim under them, and float them on its dazzling expanse, and the October sunset loves them. It dies upon their summits, whither it trails itself in bloody red athwart the crimson water. The hills rise in tender azure before you as you issue from the southern gate of Padua, and grow in loveliness as you draw nearer to them from the rich plain that washes their feet with endless harvests of oil and wine.

Oh, beauty that will not let itself be told! Could I not take warning from another, and refrain from this fruitless effort of description? A friend in Padua had lent me Disraeli's "Venetia," because a passage of the story occurs in Petrarch's house at Arquà, and we carried the volumes with us on our pilgrimage. I would here quote the description of the village, the house, and the hills from the book, as faultlessly true, and as affording no just idea of either; but nothing of it has remained in my mind except the geological fact that the hills are a volcanic range. To tell the truth, the landscape, as we rode along, continually took my mind off the book, and I could not give that attention either to the elegant language of its descrip tions, or the adventures of its well-born characters, which they deserved. I was even more interested in the disreputable-looking person who mounted the box beside our driver directly we got out of the city gate, and who invariably commits this infringement upon your rights in Italy, no matter how strictly and cunningly you frame your contract that no one else is to occupy any part of the carriage but yourself. He does not seem to be the acquaintance of the driver, for they never exchange a word, and he does not seem to pay anything for the ride. He got down, in this instance, just before we reached the little town at which our driver stopped, and asked us if "we wished to drink a glass of the wine of the country." We did not, but his own thirst seemed to answer equally well, and he slaked it cheerfully at our cost.

The fields did not present the busy appearance which had delighted us on the same road as we went to Florence in the spring, but they had that autumnal charm already mentioned. Many of the vine-leaves were sere; the red grapes were already purple, and the white grapes pearly ripe, and they formed a gorgeous necklace for the trees, around which they clung in opulent festoons. Then, dearer to our American hearts than this southern splendor, were the russet fields of Indian corn, and, scattered among the shrunken stalks, great nuggets of the "harmless gold" of pumpkins.

At Battaglia (the village just beyond which you turn off to go to Arquà) there was a fair, on the blessed occasion of some saint's day, and there were many booths full of fruits, agricultural implements, toys, clothes, wooden ware, and the like. There was a great crowd and a noise, but, according to the mysterious Italian custom, nobody seemed to be buying or selling. I am in the belief that a small purchase of grapes we made here on our return was the great transaction of the day, unless, indeed, the neat operation in alms achieved at our expense by a mendicant villager may be classed commercially.

When we turned off from the Rovigo road at Battaglia we were only hree miles from Arquà.

II.

Now, all the way from this turning to the foot of the hill on which the village was stretched asleep in the tender sunshine, there was on either side of the road a stream of living water. There was no other barrier than this between the road and the fields (unless the vines swinging from tree to tree formed a barrier), and, as if in graceful excuse for the interposition of even these slender streams, nature had lavished such growth of wild-flowers and wild berries on the banks that it was like a garden avenue, through the fragrance and beauty of which we rolled, delighted to silence, almost to sadness.

When we began to climb the hill to Arquà, and the driver stopped to breathe his horse, I got out and finished the easy ascent on foot. The great marvel to me is that the prospect of the vast plain below, on which, turning back, I feasted my vision, should be there yet, and always. It had the rare and saddening beauty of evanescence, and awoke in me the memory of all beautiful scenery, so that I embroidered the landscape with the silver threads of Western streams, and bordered it with Ohio hills. Ohio hills? When I looked again it was the storied Euganean group. But what trans-oceanic bird, voyaging hither, dropped from its mouth the blackberry which took root and grew and blossomed and ripened, that I might taste home in it on these classic hills?

I wonder did Petrarch walk often down this road from his house just above? I figured him coming to meet me with his book in his hand, in his reverend poetic robes, and with his laurel on, over that curious kind of bandaging which he seems to have been fond of—looking, in a word, for all the world like the neuralgic Petrarch in the pictures.

Drawing nearer, I discerned the apparition to be a robeless, laurelless lout, who belonged at the village inn. Yet this lout, though not Petrarch, had merits of his own. His face and hands and his legs, as seen from his knees down, had the tone of the richest bronze; he wore a mountain cap with a long tasselled fall to the back of it; his face was comely and his eye beautiful; and he was so nobly ignorant of everything that a colt or young bullock could not have been better company. He merely offered to guide us to Petrarch's house, and was silent, except when spoken to, from that instant.

I am here tempted to say: Arquà is in the figure of a man stretched upon the hill slope. The head, which is Petrarch's house, rests upon the summit. The carelessly tossed arms lie abroad from this in one direction, and the legs in the opposite quarter. It is a very lank and shambling figure, without elegance or much proportion, and the attitude is the last wantonness of loafing. We followed our lout up the right leg, which is a gentle and easy ascent in the general likeness of a street. World-old stone cottages crouch on either side; here and there is a more ambitious house in decay; trees wave over the street, and down its distance comes an occasional donkey-cart very musically and leisurely. By all odds, Arquà and its kind of villages are to be preferred to those hamlets of the plain which in Italy cling to the white-hot highway without a tree to shelter them, and bake and burn there in the merciless sun. Their houses of stuccoed stone are crowded as thickly together as city houses, and these wretched little villages do their worst to unite the discomforts of town and country with a success dreadful to think of. In all countries villages are hateful to the heart of civilized man, who made the town; and I cannot think them pleasing to God, who made the country. In the Lombard plains I wonder that one stone of them rests upon another.

We reached Petrarch's house before the custode had arrived to admit us, and stood before the high stone wall which shuts in the front of the house, and quite hides it from those without. This wall bears the inscription, Casa Petrarca, and a marble tablet lettered to the following effect:

SE TI AGITA
SACRO AMORE DI PATRIA, T'INCHINA A QUESTA MURA
OVE SPIRÒ LA GRAND'ANIMA,
IL CANTOR DEI SCIPIONE
E DI LAURA.

Which may be translated: "If thou art stirred by love of country, bow to these walls, whence passed the great soul, the singer of the Scipios and of Laura."

Meanwhile we became the centre of a group of the youth of Arquà, who had kindly attended our progress in gradually increasing numbers from the moment we had entered the village. They were dear little girls and boys, and mountain babies, all with sunburnt faces and the gentle and winning ways native to this race, which nature loves better than us of the north. The blonde pilgrim seemed to please them, and they evidently took us for Te- deschi. You learn to submit to this fate in northern Italy, however ungracefully, for it is the one that constantly befalls you outside of the greatest cities. The people know but two varieties of foreigners—the Englishman and the German. If, therefore, you have not rosbif expressed in every lineament of your countenance, if the soles of your boots are less than an inch thick and your clothes are not reduced in color to the invariable and maddening tone of the English tweed—you must resign yourself to be a German. All this is grievous to the soul which loves to spread its eagle in every land and to be known as American with the most star-spangled conspicuousness all over the world; but it cannot be helped. I vainly tried to explain the geographical, political, and natural difference between Tedeschi and Americani to the custodian of Petrarch's house. She listened with amiability, shrugged her shoulders hopelessly, and said, in her rude Venetian, "Mi no so miga" (I do n't know at all).

Before she came, I had a mind to prove the celebrity of a poet on the spot where he lived and died, on his very hearthstone, as it were. So I asked the lout, who stood gnawing a stick and shifting from foot to foot:

"When did Petrarch live here?"

"Ah! I do n't remember him."

"Who was he?"

"A poet, signor."

Certainly the first response was not encouraging, but the last revealed that even to the heavy and clouded soul of this lout the divine fame of a poet had penetrated—and he a lout in the village where Petrarch lived and where he ought to be first forgotten. He did not know when he had lived there—a year ago, perhaps, or many centuries—but he was a poet. A weight of doubt was lifted from my spirit, and I responded cheerfully to some observations on the weather offered by a rustic matron who was pitching manure on the little hill-slope near the house. When, at last, the custodian came and opened the gate to us, we entered a little grassy yard, from which a flight of steps led to Petrarch's door. A few flowers grew wild among the grass and a fig-tree leaned its boughs against the wall. The figs on it were green, though they hung ripe and blackening on every other tree in Arquà. Some ivy clung to the stones, and from this and the fig-tree, as we came away, we plucked memorial leaves and blended them with flowers which the youth of Arquà picked and forced upon us for remembrance.

A quaint old door opened into the little stone house—first into a kind of wide passage-way with rooms on either side; and, at the end opposite to which we entered, a door opened upon a balcony. From this balcony we looked down on Petrarch's garden, which, presently speaking, is but a narrow space with more fruit than flowers in it. Did Petrarch use to sit and meditate in this garden? For me I should better have liked a chair on the balcony, with the further and lovelier prospect on every hand of village-roofs, sloping hills all grey with olives, and the broad blue Lombard plain, sweeping from heaven to heaven below.

The walls of the passage-way are frescoed (now very faintly) in illustration of the loves of Petrarch and Laura, with verses from the sonnets inscribed to explain the illustrations. In all these Laura prevails as a lady of a singularly long waist and stiff movements, and Petrarch, with his face tied up and a lily in his hand, contemplates the flower in mingled botany and toothache. There is occasionally a startling literalness in the way the painter has rendered some of the verses. I remember with peculiar interest the illustration of a lachrymose passage concerning a river of tears, wherein the weeping Petrarch, stretched beneath a tree, had already started a small creek of tears, which was rapidly swelling to a flood with the torrent from his eyes. I attribute these frescoes to a later date than that of the poet's residence, but the portrait over the door of the bed-room, inside of the chamber, was of his own time, and taken from him—the custodian said. As it seemed to look like all the Petrarchian portraits, I did not remark it closely, but rather turned my attention to the walls of the chamber, which were thickly over-scribbled with names. They were nearly all Italian, and none English so far as I saw. This passion for allying one's self to the great, by inscribing one's name on places hallowed by them, is certainly very odd; and (I reflected as I added our names to the rest) it is, without doubt, the most impertinent and idiotic custom in the world. People have thus written themselves down, to the contempt of sensible futurity, all over Petrarch's house.

The custodian insisted that the bed-room was just as in the poet's time; some rooms beyond it had been restored; the kitchen at its side was also repaired. Crossing the passage-way, we now entered the dining-room, which was comparatively large and lofty, with a mighty and generous fire-place at one end, occupying the whole space left by a balcony-window. The floor was paved with tiles, and the window-panes were round and small, and set in lead—like the floors and window-panes of all the other rooms. A gaudy fresco, representing some indelicate female deity, adorned the front of the fire-place, which sloped expanding from the ceiling and terminated at the mouth without a mantle-piece. The chimney was deep, and told of the cold winters in the hills, of which, afterwards, the landlady of the village inn prattled less eloquently.

From this dining-room opens, to the right, the door of the room which they call Petrarch's library; and above the door, set in a marble frame, with a glass before it, is all that is mortal of Petrarch's cat, except the hair. Whether or not the fur was found incompatible with the process of embalming, and therefore removed, or whether it has slowly dropped away with the lapse of centuries, I do not know; but it is certain the cat is now quite hairless, and has the effect of a wash-leather invention in the likeness of a young lamb. On the marble slab below there is a Latin inscription, said to be by the great poet himself, declaring this cat to have been "second only to Laura." We may, therefore, believe its virtues to have been rare enough; and if the ghost of Petrarch ever revisits the glimpses of that wide-mouthed fire-place, I doubt not the spirit of this gifted cat purrs softly at his feet and nestles on his knees, or, with thickened tail and lifted back, parades loftily round his chair in the haughty and disdainful manner of cats.

In the library, protected against the predatory enthusiasm of visitors by a heavy wire netting, are the desk and chair of Petrarch, which I know of no form of words to describe perfectly. The front of the desk is of a kind of mosaic in cubes of wood, most of which have been carried away. The chair is wide-armed and carved, but the bottom is gone, and it has been rudely repaired. The custodian said Petrarch died in this chair while he sat writing at his desk in the little nook lighted by a single window opening on the left from his library. He loved to sit there. As I entered I found he had stepped out for a moment, but I know he returned directly after I withdrew.

On one wall of the library (which is a simple oblong room, in nowise remarkable) was a copy of verses in a frame, by Cesarotti, and on the wall opposite a tribute from Alfieri, both manu propriâ. Over and above these are many other scribblings; and hanging over the door of the poet's little nook was a criminal French lithograph likeness of "Pétrarque" when young.

Alfieri's verses are written in ink on the wall, while those of Cesarotti are on paper, and framed. I do not remember any reference to his visit to Petrarch's house in Alfieri's autobiography, though the visit must have taken place in 1783, when he sojourned at Padua, and "made the acquaintance of the celebrated Cesarotti, with whose lively and courteous manners he was no less satisfied than he had always been in reading his (Cesarotti's) most masterly version of 'Ossian.'" It is probable that the friends visited the house together. At any rate, I care to believe that while Cesarotti sat "composing" his tribute comfortably at the table, Alfieri's impetuous soul was lifting his tall body on tip-toe to scrawl its inspirations on the plastering.

Do you care, gentle reader, to be reminded that just before this visit Alfieri had heard in Venice of the "peace between England and the United Colonies," and that he then and there "wrote the fifth ode of the 'America Libera,'" and thus finished that poem?

After copying these verses we returned to the dining-room, and while one pilgrim strayed idly through the names in the visitors' book, the other sketched Petrarch's cat, before-mentioned, and Petrarch's inkstand of bronze—a graceful little thing, having a cover surmounted by a roguish cupid, while the lower part is supported on three lions' claws, and just above the feet, at either of the three corners, is an exquisite little female bust and head. While we thus sketched and idled, we held spell-bound our friends the youth of Arquà, as well as our driver, who, having brought innumerable people to see the house of Petrarch, now for the first time, with great astonishment, beheld the inside of it himself.

As to the authenticity of the house I think there can be no doubt, and as to the genuineness of the relics there, nothing in the world could shake my faith in them, though Muratori certainly characterizes them as "superstitions." The great poet was sixty-five years old when he came to rest at Arquà, and when, in his own pathetic words, "there remained to him only to consider and to desire how to make a good end." He says further, at the close of his autobiography: "In one of the Euganean hills, near to ten miles from the city of Padua, I have built me a house, small but pleasant and decent, in the midst of slopes clothed with vines and olives, abundantly sufficient for a family not large and discreet. Here I lead my life, and although, as I have said, infirm of body, yet tranquil of mind, without excitements, without distractions, without cares, reading always, and writing, and praising God, and thanking God as well for evil as for good; which evil, if I err not, is trial merely and not punishment. And all the while I ray to Christ that he make good the end of my life, and have mercy, and forgive and even forget my youthful sins; wherefore, no words are so sweet to my lips as these of the psalm: 'Delicta juventutis meas, et ignorantias meas ne memineris.' And with every feeling of the heart I pray God, when it please him, to bridle my thoughts, so long unstable and erring, and as they have vainly wandered to many things, to turn them all to Him—only, true, certain, immutable good."

I venerate the house at Arquà because these sweet and solemn words were written in it. We left its revered shelter (after taking a final look from the balcony down upon "the slopes clothed with vines and olives") and returned to the lower village, where, in the court of the little church, we saw the tomb of Petrarch—"an ark of red stone upon four columns likewise of marble." The epitaph is this:

"Frigida Francisci lapis hic tegit ossa Petrarcæ;
Suscipe, Virgo parens, animam; sate Virgine, parce;
Fessaque jam terris Cœli requiescat in arce."

A head of the poet in bronze surmounts the façade of the ark. The housekeeper of the parish priest, who ran out to enjoy my admiration and bounty, told me a wild local tradition of an attempt on the part of the Florentines to steal the bones of Petrarch away from Arquà, in proof of which she showed me a block of marble set into the ark, whence she said a fragment had been removed by the Florentines. This local tradition I afterwards found verified, with names and dates, in a little "Life of Petrarch," by F. Leoni, published at Padua in 1843. It appears that this curious attempt of the Florentines to do doubtful honor to the great citizen whose hereditary civic rights they restored too late (about the time he was drawing nigh his "good end" at Arquà) was made for them by a certain monk of Portagruaro named Tommaso Martinelli. He had a general instruction from his employers to bring away from Arquà "any important thing of Petrarch's" that he could; and it occurred to this ill-advised friar to "move his bones." He succeeded on a night of the year 1630 in stealing the dead poet's arm. The theft being at once discovered, the Venetian Republic rested not till the thief was also discovered; but what became of the arm or of the sacrilegious monk neither the Signor Leoni nor the old women of Arquà give any account. The republic removed the rest of Petrarch's mortality, which is now said to be in the Royal Museum of Madrid.

I was willing to know more of this quaint village of Arquà, and I rang at the priest's door to beg of him some account of the place, if any were printed. But already at one o'clock he had gone to bed for a nap, and must on no account be roused till four. It is but a quiet life men lead in Arquà, and their souls are in drowsy hands. The amount of sleep which this good man gives himself (if he goes to bed at 9 P.M. and rises at 9 A.M., with a nap of three hours during the day) speaks of a quiet conscience, a good digestion, and uneventful days. As I turned this notion over in my mind, my longing to behold his reverence increased, that I might read life at Arquà in the smooth curves of his well-padded countenance. His "bowels of compassion were well-rounded," as I thought, and I had a mind, making sure of absolution, that, if I got speech with him, it would be well to improve the occasion by confessing one or two of my blackest sins.

Ought I to say here that, on the occasion of a second visit to Arquà, I succeeded in finding this excellent ecclesiastic wide awake at two o'clock in the afternoon, and that he granted me an interview at that hour? Justice to him, I think, demands this admission of me. He was not at all a fat priest, as I had prefigured him, but rather of a spare person, and of a brisk and lively manner. At the village inn, after listening half an hour to a discourse on nothing but white wine from a young priest, who had stopped to drink a glass of it, I was put in the way of seeing the priest of Arquà by the former's courtesy. Happily enough, his reverence chanced to have the very thing I wanted to see—no other than Leoni's "Life of Petrarch," to which I have already referred. Courtesy is the blood in an Italian's veins, and I need not say that the ecclesiastic of Arquà, seeing my interest in the place, was very polite and obliging. But he continued to sleep throughout our first stay in Arquà, and I did not see him then.

I strolled up and down the lazy, rambling streets, and chiefly devoted myself to watching the young women who were washing clothes at the stream running from the "Fountain of Petrarch." Their arms and legs were bronzed and bare, and they chattered and laughed gaily at their work. Their washtubs were formed by a long marble conduit from the fountain; their washboards by the inward-sloping conduit-sides, and they thrashed and beat the garments clean upon the smooth stone. To a girl their waists were broad and their ankles thick. Above their foreheads the hair was cut short, and their "back hair" was gathered into a mass, and held together by a converging circle of silver pins.

The Piazza della Fontana, in Arquà, is a place some thirty feet in length and breadth, and seems to be a favorite place of public resort. In the evening, doubtless, it is alive with gossippers, as now with workers. It may be that then his reverence, risen from his nap, saunters by, and pauses long enough to chuck a pretty girl under the chin or pinch an urchin's cheek.

Our dinner was ready by the time I got back to the inn, and we sat down to a chicken stewed in oil and a stoup of the white wine of Arquà. It was a modest feast, but, being a friend to oil, I found it savory, and the wine was both good and strong. While we lingered over the repast we speculated somewhat carelessly whether Arquà had retained among its simplicities the primeval cheapness, of which you read much and see nothing whatever in Italy. When our landlord leaned over the table and made out our account on it with a bit of chalk, the bill was as follows:

	Soldi.
Chicken	70
Bread	8
Wine	20
Total	98

It surely was not a costly dinner, yet I could have bought the same chicken in Venice for half the money; which is but another proof that the demand of the producer is often much larger than the supply of the consumer, and that to buy poultry cheaply you must not purchase it where raised,

——"On misty mountain ground,
Its own vast shadow glory crowned," but rather in a large city after it has been transported forty miles or more. Not that we begrudged the thrifty inn-keeper his fee. We paid it cheerfully, as well for his own sake as for that of his pleasant and neat little wife, who kept the whole inn so sweet and clean; and we bade them a most cordial farewell as we drove away from their door.

III.

Returning, we stopped at the great castle of the Obizzi (now the property of the Duke of Modena), through which we were conducted by a surly and humorous custode, whose pride in life was that castle and its treasures, so that he resented as a personal affront the slightest interest in anything else. He stopped us abruptly in the midst of the museum, and, regarding the precious antiques and curiosities around him, demanded:

"Does this castle please you?" Then, with a scornful glance at us, "Your driver tells me you have been to Arquà. And what did you see at Arquà? A shabby little house and a cat without any hair on. I would not," said this disdainful custode, "go to Arquà if you gave me a lemonade."

Literature.

LITERARY NOTES.

THAT veteran philologist, Dr. Joseph Bosworth, whose name is indissolubly connected with the revival of Anglo-Saxon studies in England, has just brought out a volume of great interest to all who are pursuing investigations into the origin and filiation of the Teutonic languages, including our own. It comprises, in a handsome octavo form, arranged in parallel columns, four remarkable versions of the Gospels—the Gothic text of Ulphilas; the anonymous Anglo-Saxon version, supposed to be contemporary with the Venerable Bede; the translation of Wycliffe (A.D. 1389); and the famous version of William Tyndale, from the first edition of his Testament (A.D. 1525). The celebrated Gothic version by Ulphilas, the apostle of the Goths, the earliest monument of the Germanic languages, dating from the middle of the fourth century, has not been printed in England since 1750 (when an edition by Lye was published at Oxford), and has, consequently, never been of easy access for scholars. The text of Dr. Bosworth's copy is from the latest collation of the famous unique "Codex Argenteus" at Upsal, the most valuable relic of Northern literature in the world. It was supposed for some time that the silver letters of this venerable manuscript were impressed with a stamp on the purple vellum, but careful examination made for Dr. Bosworth shows that it is really written, and a beautiful specimen of early calligraphy. The remarkable analogies of words and phraseology between this ancient record of Northern speech and our own idiom are pointed out by the editor, who has also furnished the volume with copious introductions, fac-similes, notes, etc., making it a valuable addition to both biblical and philological libraries. It is published by Mr. Russell Smith, and printed at the Oxford University Press.

—An edition of the "Works of John Marston," the Elizabethan poet and dramatist, is announced as in progress at Boston. It will contain his dramatic works and poems, "with some account of the author and his writings, and numerous illustrative notes, by F. F. Heard and William F. Fowle, Esq." It will form 5 volumes crown 8vo, so as to range with the late Mr. William Pickering's editions of Peele, Greene, Marlowe, and Webster. The typography is intended to equal that of any book that has been issued from the American press. Forty copies will be printed on large paper at twelve dollars per volume, and two hundred on small paper at four dollars per volume. The only collected edition of Marston's works made in England is that edited by J. O. Halliwell, in three volumes, 1856. Like all that gentleman's too numerous publications it is by no means remarkable for any critical merits, and it is a sign of the growing richness of our libraries that the Boston impression will be "reprinted from the original editions." There are other contemporary dramatists better worth reviving than Marston, but the success of the undertaking—more than half the numbers mentioned above being already subscribed for—will, undoubtedly, lead to future ventures in the same field. They are, indeed, matters of necessity if people will have the books, for the mother country is drained completely dry of them, and there seems little enterprise in England now taking that direction. In fact, we imagine a portion of the above-mentioned edition of Marston would be readily bought for the English market in case there are any left over, after supplying the wants of subscribers.

—The recent death of Sir William Jackson Hooker has been speedily followed by the decease of another eminent botanist, who almost equalled him in reputation, and far exceeded him in the number of his publications. Dr. John Lindley for many years stood in the same relation to the Horticultural Society, in its palmiest days, that Sir W. J. Hooker occupied towards the Royal Botanical Gardens at Kew. As secretary of the society, he gave the impulse that sent out collectors like Douglass, Hartweg, Fortune, and others, to the ends of the earth in search of the rarities of the vegetable kingdom, and it was in his periodicals, "The Botanical Register," "The Gardener's Chronicle," etc., that their acquisitions were recorded, and the names—now familiar, but then new and strange—of fuchsias, verbenas, calceolarias, etc., were first made known to the Western world. Dr. Lindley's publications, all devoted to the cultivation of his favorite science, range in every size and price, from his splendid folio, "Illustrations of the Orchidaceæ" (his favorite tribe of plants, which he brought into fashion), to the school manuals and popular practical treatises on botany and horticulture that have rendered his name universally known. Perhaps the most useful of them is "The Vegetable Kingdom," containing in one capacious volume a condensed account of the structure, geographical distribution, and uses of all the known families of plants. Dr. Lindley was born in Norfolk, in 1799, and died of apoplexy, at the commencement of this month, at his home near London. He was professor of botany in University College, London, and member of most scientific societies in all parts of the globe. For more than thirty years he was the centre of botanical science in England, a position that he filled by right of his energy, intellectual grasp, and unlimited power of enduring labor for the advancement of his favorite studies.

—Among the new enterprises in periodical literature emerging to light at the coming of the new year is a new first-class literary journal entitled the Contemporary Review, edited by Dr. Alford, Dean of Canterbury, and to be published by Alexander Strahan & Co. We believe the minor particulars of size, price, etc., are not yet fully determined on, but no pains or expense will be spared to render it equal to the highest works of its class. A new monthly periodical, "The Journal of Social Science," will also commence with January next. It is edited by Dr. Lankester, and will be devoted to the publication of papers, reviews of books, and information on the various subjects embraced in the departments of the "National Association for the Promotion of Social Science."

—The safe return of Mr. Baker, the African explorer, to Egypt, has caused the publication of more definite accounts of his discoveries in the regions of the Upper Nile than could be drawn from his hurried letters, while still far from civilization. The lake traversed by him is the Lutn-zigi, laid down on the map of his friend, Capt. Speke, though its relation to the stream of the Nile was not properly understood by that lamented traveller. Instead of being a "back-water" to the river, communicating with it by a channel, Mr. Baker found that the river, issuing from Lake Nyanza, flows bodily into Lake Lutn-zigi on the west, and issues afresh from it at its northern extremity, about eighty miles distant from the point of contact. At its exit it forms a sluggish stream about a mile wide, and it is presumed flows from thence to Gondokovow and Khartoum. The lake itself is a remarkable depression amidst very high mountains, exceedingly deep, abounding with hippopotami and other beasts. Perhaps it is to the indefatigable Dr. Livingstone that we must finally look for an explanation of the many vexed questions connected with the geography of the Nile basin. While the public of England and America are anxiously awaiting the narrative of one expedition, he has started on another journey of exploration, intended to connect his discovery of Lake Nyassi with the more northerly waters of Lakes Tanganyika and Nyanza—to ascertain if there is any communication between them, and throw light upon all the points of interest connected with this lately unknown region.

—Few purely literary questions depending for their solution on externa and circumstantial evidence have been more summarily and satisfactorily settled than the point lately raised by Mr. Herman Merivale on the authenticity of the correspondence known to antiquarians and historians as "The Paston Letters." Mr. Merivale's paper on the subject in the "Fortnightly Review" has called forth a masterly reply in the same periodical from Mr. James Gairdner, a gentleman connected with the Record Office, and consequently an expert in many of the details involved in a discussion of this nature. Mr. Gairdner shows conclusively how Mr. Merivale's ex parte brief overstated his case, and taking up his objections in regard to the genuineness of the letters seriatim, he proves how little there is in them that could outweigh the mass of confirmatory testimony apparent on the face of the publication and all the known circumstances connected with its preparation. After this paper it is satisfactory, but not surprising, to hear that the originals of the fifth volume of letters, printed thirty years after the previous four, have been discovered among the papers of Sir John Fenn, by the son of his nephew, Sergeant Frere, by whom they were inherited. It will be remembered that the originals of the four previous volumes were presented by the editor to King George the Third, but they cannot now be found in the Royal Library, and the fact of their strange disappearance formed a principal argument against their ever having existed. The originals of the fifth volume did not share this fate, and have fortunately been recovered at the very time most important for their reputation.

—In his "Reminiscences of a Literary Life" Dr. T. F. Dibdin describes the natural pride and pleasure that he felt on seeing a large paper set of his works valued at one hundred guineas, arising from the proof it afforded that he had not lived in vain, but that his labors had taken permanent root in literature, and were justly estimated by his countrymen. A still further gratification would be in store for the doctor could he see the lately issued catalogue of one of our New York booksellers, where—in a country scarcely known to bibliography in Dr. Dibdin's day—may be found a copy of his various works, making 21 volumes, "all in boards uncut, as clean as when issued from the press," offered at the price of seven hundred and fifty dollars. The catalogue we refer to is that of Mr. J. W. Bouton, 481 Broadway. The occurrence of any single item, at such a price, would have been a rare phenomenon in an American catalogue only a few years since. So cordial, however, has been the response to the parting toast at the Roxburgh Club dinner, "The Cause of Bibliography all over the world," at least in this Western hemisphere, that there seems now nothing startling or unusual in such an item, for which our fathers would have calculated on procuring an entire library. The catalogue in question offers a choice selection of books of the highest class of ornamental art literature, worthy to figure on the same shelf with the works of Dr. Dibdin himself. Among them we notice the Galleries of Florence, Munich, Napoleon, etc.; the "Liber Veritatis" of Claude Lorraine, Raphael's famous "Loggie," or Scripture subjects for the Vatican, Silvestre's "Universal Palœography," Lord Kingsborough's "Antiquities of Mexico," etc., and an equally rich representation of the class of old English literature now most in demand in preference to any other subject among our book-buyers. We allude to books like the publications of the Percy Society, "The Retrospective Review," Nichols's "Literary Anecdotes," Walpole's "Royal and Noble Authors of England," Hollingshed's "Chronicles," "The Harleian Miscellany," etc., all of which and many others will be found temptingly arrayed in the catalogue above mentioned.

—A translation of Goethe's "Faust" into Hebrew by a Jewish scholar, Dr. Max Letteris, and published in Vienna and London, would seem at first to be a mere curiosity, until it is remembered that the oldest literature and language in the world are still living and classic for millions, a medium for the expression and transmission of thought amongst a community necessarily narrow and confined in its sympathies, but marked by great intellectual activity, finesse, and acuteness. The task of successfully rendering Goethe's drama into English has never yet, in the opinion of competent judges, been accomplished, in spite of the numerous attempts that were constantly being made, until Homer took the place of Goethe as the favorite exercise for amateur translators. One may imagine, then, the difficulties surrounding a Jewish scholar engaged in the same task. He has got over some of them by adapting the drama and its persons to the spirit of the Hebrew language and the circumstances of Polish and Lithuanian readers. For instance, Faust is transformed into Elisha ben Abuya, a famous renegade Talmudical scholar and rabbi, who, becoming a sceptic from his attachment to Greek philosophy, is held in perennial reprobation among the faithful, and the other characters are similarly transformed. The distinguished Orientalist, Dr. Zunz, is just publishing "A Literary History of Jewish Sacred Poetry," and many other evidences might be given of the cultivation of modern Hebrew literature.

—The title of Mr. Gladstone's address before the University of Edinburgh, accidentally omitted from the mention of it last week, is "The Place of Ancient Greece in the Providential Order of the World."

—Among Messrs. Longman & Co.'s latest announcements is a book certain to attract attention, "The Diary of the Rt. Hon. William Wyndham, M.P., from 1783 to 1809," the year previous to his death. Hitherto the only memorials of this prominent statesman have been his Parliamentary speeches, and books of that kind count so few readers that he has become little more than a tradition for the present generation. Wyndham was a man whom all parties delighted to honor for his chivalrous spirit, noble figure, lively wit, and powers of reasoning, that would have raised him to the highest rank in the state if an impatience of political intrigue had not kept him aloof from party arrangements. The only portion of Mr. Wyndham's diary that has yet seen the light are some extracts descriptive of his visits to the death-bed of Dr. Johnson and his last conversations with that great man, printed in Croker's edition of "Boswell's Life." They raise high expectations of the value of the diaries, which were then in the possession of Mr. Amyot, the secretary of Wyndham and editor of the collection of his speeches in Parliament.

—Among the recent announcements of Messrs. Harper Brothers is an original work on China, from a source of the highest authority. It is entitled "Social Life of the Chinese, with some Account of their Religious, Governmental, Educational, and Business Customs and Opinions, by Rev. Justus Doolittle, Fourteen Years Member of the American Board; in two volumes, with more than 150 Illustrations." Mr. Gilchrist's biography of Richard Cobden, "the Apostle of Free Trade," including his political career and public services, is also promised by them, as well as several works of fiction, including Miss Edwards's "Half a Million of Money," Mr. J. S. Le Fanu's "Guy Deverell," and Anthony Trollope's "The Belton Estate."

—A curious attempt has been made to obviate the difficulties experienced by booksellers in England from the prevalent practice of selling to their customers at less than the published prices. This has grown to such an extent through increasing competition that no margin for profit is left, and the gradual deterioration of the trade rapidly follows in credit and respectability. A publisher of respectable standing, Mr. Bosworth, of Regent Street, when bringing out a book of considerable interest for clergymen, "The Directorium Anglicanum," a manual of the ceremonial usages of the English Church, attempts to meet the difficulty by declining to name any price to the public at all. He says, in a preliminary note, "As the practice of affixing a selling price to books is—in the absence of any arrangement between booksellers and publishers by which it might be maintained—without principle and an unwarrantable intrusion into the business of others, besides being delusive to the public and ruinous to the bookseller (by informing his customers of the cost of his goods, and thus depriving him of his profit), no nominal price has been attached to this book. Country booksellers may learn the terms on applying to the publisher." If an experiment of this kind had been commenced by one of the leading houses in the trade it would have met with a better chance of success, though it is a question how far it would meet the inconveniences growing out of the present old established system.

—A publication of great attraction for architects and antiquarians is in progress in England, consisting of photographic fac-similes from sketches made during his Continental tours by Augustus Welby Pugin. The drawings fac-similed are five hundred in number, and are brought out in ten parts at one guinea a part. The subjects represented exceed fifteen hundred, several being included on a single sheet, as drawn on the spot from the most exquisite works of the Middle Ages, with the masterly spirit and precision that distinguish all Pugin's works as draughtsman, author, or architect. Perhaps no one ever accomplished the same quantity of work in as short a time as Pugin. Though he died before reaching the age of forty, he had married three wives, built more churches and ecclesiastical structures than any dozen contemporary architects, written ten or twelve quarto volumes full of elaborate plates, drawn and etched by himself, designed the endless series of decorations that enrich every square inch of the new Houses of Parliament at Westminster, and erected and endowed a monastic foundation at Ramsgate that was nearly completed at the time of his death. His opinion was that there were only two things worth living for—sailing and Gothic architecture. In the indulgence of the former of these tastes he at one time in his curious career was master of a Channel lugger or sail-boat, and traded between Holland and England for eggs. Some of his finest etchings were executed on board this vessel, and he used to walk up to his publisher with the copper-plates in the pockets of his sailor's tarpaulin coat. He seemed born to combat the English superstition of respectability, and nothing but the unrivalled talents he displayed could have borne him up against the hostile influence of the profession he had mortally offended by his telling, graphic, and literary satire, "Contrasts in Ancient and Modern Architecture." Enthusiasm for the grand mediæval works of art and architecture made him a Catholic, but he was always thoroughly English in feeling, and, consequently, was never regarded with much favor by the prevalent school of modern Romanists, whose tastes are all ultramontane or pseudo-classical. The revival of an intelligent taste for and appreciation of Gothic architecture is mainly due to Pugin, who first pointed out its distinctive peculiarities. The present publication of his sketches will do much to preserve the memory of one to whom the fine arts owe so much.

PRUNING FOREST TREES.*

THE annexed titles are those of two recent French works which well deserve, if not a full translation, at least an abridged reproduction in English in the United States. We have, indeed, not yet undertaken, upon a large scale, the plantation of artificial or even the systematic treatment of natural forests, but the methods of arboriculture described in these treatises are applicable, with even greater proportional advantage, to small plantations and to trees growing in rows or avenues, or even singly. We often see noble shade-trees disfigured by holes in the trunk resulting from injudicious trimming. The stumps of the amputated boughs communicate their own decay to the heart of the tree, and an oak or an elm which was still vital with centuries of vigorous life is enfeebled, and in the course of a few years prostrated, by disease occasioned by the careless lopping of large boughs.

On the other hand, the frequency of such results has often led to the impression that old and large trees could not be pruned at all with safety, and, consequently, branches which ought to be removed are left to grow until a heavy wind tears them off, thus inflicting a wound more extensive and dangerous than would be occasioned by the most unskilful trimming.

The methods in question have been pursued by Viscount de Courval for more than forty years, and by other eminent foresters for perhaps as long, and the testimony is conclusive that, by judicious pruning, forest trees of any age and of any species, if irregular or defective in growth, may be straightened, improved in form of ramification, and cured of wounds and diseases, not only without risk or injury, but with positive advantage to beauty of shape, security against the effects of strong winds, and to quality and quantity of product in timber.

The first of these treatises is an octavo of some seventy pages of text, with a score of large wood-cuts, and, of course, somewhat expensive; the second, an octodecimo of a hundred and fifty pages, with seventy cuts, is sold at one franc, and ran through four editions in less than as many months from its first publication.

The system recommended is so simple that, though no doubt experience is requisite for its most successful exercise, yet it may be practised with advantage by any man of fair judgment and habits of careful observation in respect to arboreal growths.

The processes differ according to the objects of the cultivator, but, in general, only in respect to the selection of boughs for removal. In the management of the forest the aim is usually to obtain long, straight trunks for timber, with as little expansion of lateral branches as is consistent with the healthy growth of the tree. When trees are planted for shade or ornament a greater closeness of leaf-bearing twigs and a fuller lateral ramification are desirable. But even in this latter case the young tree requires approximately the same treatment as in the forest. The horizontal branches are shortened or suppressed, both to secure a proper length of stem—for even in a shade-tree a certain height is desirable—and to stimulate the growth of the trunk until it has acquired sufficient diameter and rigidity to resist the force of the winds, after which, if the tree is designed for ornament or shade, it may be suffered to expand its boughs with greater freedom.

Experience has shown that the best form of the crown or head for a young tree is the mathematical figure called a circular spindle, composed of arcs of a large circle, or, to express the idea in more familiar terms, its vertical section should resemble a long, narrow leaf, like that of the verbena. After the tree has acquired a strong growth, the spindle should be of greater diameter, and when it approaches its normal dimensions, the head should tend to a globular shape.

* "Taille et conduite des Arbres forestiers et autres Arbres de grande dimension, par le Vicomte de Courval." Paris. 1861.
"L'Elagage des Arbres, etc., par le Comte A. Des Cars." Paris. 1865.

Des Cars describes a very simple and convenient implement for fixing the form of the tree and determining what branches to shorten or to suppress. This is simply a piece of pasteboard, a few inches square, with an aperture of the form corresponding to the age of the tree, and if trees of different ages are to be studied, there may be several apertures of different forms. A piece of pasteboard five or six inches long, and three or four wide, will contain the three cardinal forms. One of these apertures is held at a suitable distance from the eye, with its axis coinciding with the leading shoot of the tree, which is examined through it, and the branches extending beyond it are shortened, the crowded thinned out, and the badly shaped or sickly cut off.

Of course, in a brief notice like this, detailed rules cannot be given, and judgment and observation must decide what and how many branches should be removed; of larger boughs, not more than two or three, sometimes not more than one, should be suppressed altogether in a single season, but you may deal more boldly with smaller branches.

The cardinal rule and cue, which for most purposes is worth all the rest, is, that the boughs should be cut close to the stem, leaving no stump or projection at all; the cut surface should be made to conform to the curve of the trunk, and dressed perfectly smooth, after which it should be immediately coated with coal-tar from the gas-works, applied with a paint-brush. In cold weather the coal-tar may be warmed just enough to allow it to flow sufficiently, at other times it is used without warming.

If the branch so removed is sound it will not decay in the least. Vital sap will pervade it, and the wound will soon heal over. The new wood, it is true, does not actually unite by vegetable growth with the tarred surface, but is closely attached to it, and experiment has shown that when a certain thickness has formed over the wounds, the timber furnished by trees so treated is as strong as that from trees kept close trimmed from their youth.

If the branch is hollow, or if there are rots or cavities in the trunk from other causes, the dead wood must be entirely cut out and the cavity filled with pieces of good, sound wood, dressed flush with the surface of the trunk, and well tarred as before described. New wood and bark form over the plug as over the stump of a natural branch, and the decay of the tree is arrested.

When branches are to be shortened, either with a view to their subsequent complete removal, or for reforming the shape of the tree, the cut should be made just above a thrifty twig, which may serve to "draw the sap" and keep up the life of the branch, and the wound should be dressed and tarred in the same way.

There has been a good deal of discussion and some difference of conclusion as to the best season for performing these operations, but it seems, on the whole, that it does not matter much whether the spring time or the autumn, the summer or the winter, be the period when the work is done, so it be well done. An old orchardist, known to us, being asked what was the best season for pruning apple-trees, replied, "The season when the tools are sharpest," and this appears to be the general verdict of French foresters.

The volumes before us contain ample directions in regard to the treatment of many diseases of the wood and bark where excision is the proper remedy, to the form of cutting tools and other implements, to the precautions for the safety of the pruners, and they constitute, in short, a very complete course of the surgery of the forest. We earnestly recommend a compilation from the two to the notice of some enterprising American publisher.

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH IN AMERICA.*

We have placed below the title of the works of an eminent bishop of the Roman Catholic Church of the United States, a gentleman well known for his kindness of heart, his astute judgment and courtesy of manner, and so influential as to be called (though, as we think, most injudiciously) twice by our Government to diplomatic missions—once by Mr. Polk, in 1846, to a mission to Mexico, which he declined, and again by Mr. Seward, on a private diplomatic errand to Europe, in 1862, which he accepted.

We find a record in these volumes of twenty-five years of leadership of his Church in this country at a time when, as history will hereafter relate, the greatest problem bearing on human rights of several centuries was being solved here—when privilege was struggling with right, and slavery with freedom. Posterity will point to the fact that Archbishop Hughes led the great Church of the past during a crisis of American history which involved the fate of millions and the rights of humanity for a thousand years to come. They will review the glorious record of his Church in the Middle Ages, its sympathy with the poor, its struggles for human rights, its gradual and successful efforts in breaking the fetters of the serf, and its hatred of slavery. They will observe that here its members were especially made up from the poorer classes of Europe, who had themselves suffered from oppression, and they will naturally turn to the life of the distinguished bishop of the Church for noble words in behalf of liberty, for glowing assertions of the great principles of freedom, for at least gentle and Christian expressions of sympathy with millions of slaves, some of whom belonged to the same ancient Church, and all of whom were beneath the same political banner. But they will look for such things in vain.

In the most momentous period of American history, when ideas were clashing and principles were being formed whose eventual contest was to cover the continent with blood, in the years from 1826 to 1860 not a word can be heard from this most reverend priest and bishop touching on human rights as pertaining to the negro. Not a protest—the most gentle—is breathed against the vilest system of oppression which ever disgraced civilization. Not an accent of sympathy is uttered for the millions—some of them sons of the Church—who were bought and sold, who were cut off from legal marriage, whose daughters were made concubines, and who bore wrongs which history almost shudders to relate with a patience that scarce ever murmured, and a spirit of forgiveness which, in the confessors of the Church, has been the ideal of Catholic sanctity for all ages.

Through all these years Bishop Hughes is never heard to invoke even any palliation of this enormous system; he does not instruct or advise his fellow-clergy or subordinates at the South to urge the sanctity of that most ancient sacrament of his Church—marriage—upon the slaveholders; he does not, by any word or deed, seek to retain families together, or to preserve the young girls, even of the Catholic families of Louisiana, from open pollution.

All that vast body of ignorant men and women who so hung on his words he does not attempt even to instruct or influence in favor of the liberty of four millions of chattels. And the reason for his silence is not to be found in any disinclination to speak on public matters, or any want of oratorical ability. He is very ready to speak on "Irish emancipation," but he never thinks of "African emancipation." He delivers orations without number on the sectarian influence of our public schools, on "church debts," on "political economy," on the "social servitude to capital" (not a word of the servitude to Southern slaveholders), on "emancipation in the Middle Ages," but never on emancipation in the United States. His public life (apart from his strictly religious labors, of which we have here nothing to say), in the most trying crisis of modern history, when the spirit on which his Church was originally based was struggling with the greatest organized evil of the world, was mainly spent in attempting to make the American public schools sectarian, and to perpetuate the influence of a narrow-minded priesthood.

The main importance of such a life is as an indication of the spirit of his Church in America. What will be the future of the Roman Catholic Church in the United States? is a question to be seriously considered by all thinkers. So far as political influence is concerned, the Church has here a free field. Nothing can prevent her—except her own spirit—from winning continual victories and establishing herself on the northern continent of America as she has done on the southern. To many persons from our upper classes seeking for repose from sceptical doubt, or hankering after a more ritualistic religion, she offers the perfect rest of infallible authority and the æsthetic enjoyment (though, in America, an imperfect one) of her ceremonial.

A few such are continually joining her ranks. Then the vast body of the poor and the servile class (and we use this expression with no feeling of contempt, remembering that Christianity itself began among the poor and the servants) constantly add to her numbers by their natural increase. The priesthood, too, are doing wisely in building stately and beautiful churches, especially through the smaller towns, so as to secure the habits of reverence of this class for a long time to come. The Roman Church grows then, but we think slowly, in America. Her great want is the want of moral power—and when that is said, all is said. She has no hold over the moral sense of the nation. She commands no respect. The only thing that pledges permanent life to an institution is the moral element, and that the American Catholic Church lacks.

No great idea, no moral movement, no reform, no general improvement of life and character in these States, has ever received any encouragement from the Roman Church as such. It is not found among our servants that their faith makes them more honest or true or kind-hearted. The influence of the priests (with a few noble exceptions) is not generally on the side of temperance, or order, or intelligence, or liberty. It may not necessarily be against these, but it is not conspicuously on their side. Nine-tenths of all the crime and pauperism of the country is found against the names of Roman Catholics, though here we do not charge the fault upon the Church, but only urge that the priests cannot check the vices of a miserable peasantry. There is evidently here no such elevated and self-sacrificing Romanist priesthood as in Tyrol, for instance; and public life shows here few Catholics filled with such noble humanity and profound morality as France presents now in Cochin, and Montalembert, and Gasparin, and Laboulaye.

* "Complete Works of the Most Rev. John Hughes, D.D.," etc. Two vols. Lawrence Kehoe, New York. 1865.

The Roman Church in America is but a shell of moral and spiritual ideas, and from it will spring, in our judgment, no vigorous and permanent growth and life.

A Treatise on Some of the Insects Injurious to Vegetation. By Thaddeus William Harris, M.D. A new Edition. Edited by Charles L. Flint. (Crosby and Ainsworth, Boston.)—This standard work has three epochs: its first appearance in print in 1841, by order and at the expense of the State of Massachusetts; a second edition, with additions and illustrations, by the same authority, in 1859; and the present, which the Legislature permitted in 1861, in order that Mr. Harris's treatise might obtain a wider circulation, and so answer better the ends for which it was composed. It has already obtained the very highest praise for its scientific accuracy and practical utility, and of its original merits it is, therefore, unnecessary to speak. Mr. Flint, the secretary of the Massachusetts State Board of Agriculture, has enlarged the text with foot-notes of his own and from the manuscripts left by the author, and no one will dispute his eminent qualifications for the task. The illustrations are simply incomparable, at least in this country. Mr. Sonrel's patient and minute drawings have an almost microscopic fidelity, and Mr. Marsh's engravings on wood, even as now printed, are a marvel of art. One can scarcely believe that the latter afford no pleasure to Mr. Marsh himself, who found his real triumph and rested his reputation in the first impressions, which he himself made from the blocks, before they were inserted in the book, and of which copies were sent abroad to the various countries of Europe.

The publishers have produced so rich a volume that its popularity will be a marked compliment to the citizens of the Republic, as its execution is an honor to the commonwealth which ordered it. It ought to be added that the insects described are found not only in Massachusetts, but throughout New England, and in most parts of the United States, and that, consequently, the value of the treatise is independent of the locality from which it issued.

Poems.—Songs of Seven.—Studies for Stories. By Jean Ingelow. (Boston: Roberts Brothers.)—If the critics who hailed the poetry of Jean Ingelow as something grand and original, a year or so since, should now be taken and examined apart, could they testify, we wonder, to an unabated enthusiasm? Read in cold blood, these poems do not impress us with their grandeur; and the praise once bestowed on them for authentic power, because there was no echo of Tennyson in them, seems to us rather ludicrous. We think the calmer judgment of Miss Ingelow's poetry must be that it develops a tender love for nature, a high devotion to beauty, and a gift of attenuating and expanding ideas to a marvellous degree of slimness and thinness. Take the much-admired poem called "Divided:" there is but one simple thought in all its thirty-one stanzas, and the rest is nothing but "babble of green fields;" pretty, certainly, but telling little news about nature or her relations to human feeling. "The High Tide on the Coast of Lincolnshire" is a fine ballad, but has the man who wrote "Maud Müller" any right to say it is the best ballad of our time? It is curious to read the rapturous praises (kindly printed by the publishers and sent with the volume) our critics bestowed on Miss Ingelow's fair average. However, Mr. Emerson saluted Walt Whitman "at the outset of a glorious career," and when Alexander Smith appeared there were people to liken him to Shakespeare.

Miss Ingelow's prose volume has been the occasion of nearly as much fine language in the journals as her poems were. Those who read "Studies for Stories" will find them full of a healthy simplicity which lapses occasionally into the healthy commonplace, and not at all extraordinary either in thought or diction.

Rebel Brag and British Bluster, etc. By Owls-Glass. (American News Company, New York.)—Out of the vast storehouse of mistaken prophecies, hopes, opinions, and beliefs in which, from the beginning to the close of the rebellion, our enemies at the South and our friends in Great Britain indulged, with a vain effort to make the worse appear the better reason, and to sustain a struggle against the social order of Christendom, the anonymous author of this pamphlet has gleaned, of course, a measure of very ridiculous chaff. He has sprinkled the solid text with the obvious commentary, and made, as he fairly pretends, "a record . . . very pleasant to read, and instructive to all who are capable of learning." As a piece of literary workmanship, it is not comparable to Mr. Stephens's monograph on the London Times.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

A Concise Dictionary of the Bible. Being a Condensation of the Larger Dictionary. Edited by William Smith, LL.D. Little, Brown & Co., Boston.

Mr. Buchanan's Administration on the Eve of the Rebellion. D. Appleton & Co., New York.

Life and Letters of Frederick W. Robertson, M.A. Edited by Stopford A. Brooke, M.A. Two Volumes. Ticknor & Fields, Boston.

The Positive Philosophy of Auguste Comte. By John Stuart Mill. William V. Spencer, Boston.

The Children's Hour. By E. W. S. and S. W. M. J. B. Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia.

Summer Songs. By H. H. M. Ashmead & Evans, Philadelphia.

The Fly. By Theodore Tilton. Sheldon & Co., New York.

Fine Arts.

THE SIXTH ANNUAL EXHIBITION OF THE ARTISTS' FUND SOCIETY OF NEW YORK.

III.

Mr. Farrer's picture of "Northampton," No. 279, in the corridor, is sure to attract all who enter the galleries with any idea of looking at the pictures. It is just at the left hand of every person who comes up the main stairs, and its brilliancy and strength cannot fail to catch the eye.

It is well that it is hung low, rather below "the line," indeed (we assume that a picture is on the line when its horizon is on a level with the eye); for in this position the sky, by far the best part of the picture, is first seen, and, with many lookers, is almost the only thing seen in the picture. It would be well if a cord or railing could be so arranged that no one could approach nearer to the picture than about the distance of the nearest column of the arcade, about six feet; for, from that distance, the sky and distant hills are well seen, and all is seen of the foreground that is good of it, namely, its force of shadow, which makes the hills and the sky by comparison pale and distant.

It is well that it is hung below the line for this reason, also: it has been painted from a point of view high above the highest part of the foreground. The subject is dioramic. Below the spectator, and at his feet, is a dense grove of trees, which frame in the picture at its bottom edge; and beyond these is a pasture-field, with some cows, and this, which is in effect the nearest foreground, is already very distant. Beyond this is the Mill River, then Northampton village half-hidden among trees, then broad meadows dotted with single trees, nearly all huge elms, with the Connecticut winding about serpent-wise, now showing its full breadth and again but a narrow twinkling line. On the right of the picture is Mount Holyoke, and far beyond this, and closing the distance, a long line of blue hills half shrouded in mist.

We have said thus much of the subject because it is necessary to call attention to the great difficulty inseparable from the task of painting it. There is, perhaps, no class of landscape subject which is so apt to baffle the would-be painter of the whole aspect of nature. The attempt, if made in earnest, to paint such a diorama in full color and with complete recognition of details involves a struggle with very great difficulties and compulsory choice between results which are each desirable, and between which it is hard resolutely to choose. The difficulties are so great that it is not surprising that Mr. Farrer has partially failed to overcome them. It was not to be expected that his powers, as yet evidently not wholly mature, would suffice to the achievement of the complex task of giving, in true relation, details and the whole—delicacy and strength—at once the vastness and the full color of nature. And the choice is so hard to make that it is not surprising that the painter has sometimes chosen wrongly. It is not to be lost sight of, though, that the choice has been wrong. Whether consciously or not, the painter has chosen force rather than refinement, ponderousness rather than delicacy, and violent contrast rather than subtle gradation.

It is in this respect that we think this picture the most faulty. Shortcomings of execution are of little moment as long as the tendency of the work is right, but going off on the wrong road is fatal if long pursued. And this is a very wrong road, however near it may lie to the right one for a certain distance after they fork—this preference of the forcible to the tender, this disregarding of the more important truth of gradation for the less important truth of contrast, this Rembrandtesque treatment of noonday landscape.

The temptation is great, and is masked at first by a most natural and right desire for decision of statement. There are the sunlighted meadows, with the elms standing gravely, each with its shadow at its foot. It is very hard to avoid making these shadows darker and still darker, that the tree may have apparent projection, no matter what else suffers for it. And when they are dark enough to give the desired relief to the trees that cast them, it is hard to help toning down to still greater depth of gloom the shadows of nearer trees and houses, so that, at last, the shadows which are cast upon grass and foliage, several hundred yards from the spectator, are actually black in effect if not painted with black pigment. And so we have reached the bottom of our scale and are still without a foreground. What to do with it? We cannot have sunshine there, for sunshine, in a picture, cannot be had without contrasting shadows, and what shall foreground shadows be if more distant shadows are black? A cloud shadow is our only resource, to cover the whole near foreground and make strong contrasts unnecessary. And accordingly we find a cloud shadow in this place, or what seems to be one, covering all the near trees which frame in the picture at the bottom.

No picture, indeed, can be truly sunny without true gradation of shadows. It is very pleasant to see every house and every tree in this picture carefully painted, as if it alone were the thing under observation, with its own peculiar and measurable shadow, and it is very new and delightful to see all these shadows with sharp edges, for shadows in nature, but much more seldom in art, have such. But the greatly exaggerated depth of the far-away shadows has prevented any delicacy of gradation, without which neither projection, nor brilliancy, nor distance is given in nature, nor can be given in art. If dark masses are positively needed, they are not to be put in, like mosaic, at points all over the canvas. You cannot paint ten miles square of country, and have black shadows under every tree.

In the far distance all is very beautiful. Mt. Holyoke is better worthy of a frame to itself than is the whole picture including Mt. Holyoke. And the cloud drawing is so good that it might almost stand as a model study of sky. As a composition the sky is somewhat deficient in unity, a fault which would be more considerable if the picture were not so uncomposed and broadcast in subject. But, on the whole, where the eye ceases to distinguish minutiæ of form, and sees broad masses only, all is delightful. This is in strange contrast to the foreground, where the trees are wonderfully conventional for Mr. Farrer's work, mannered in drawing, woolly in character of foliage, and without individual character.

In all these respects this picture is much like the "White Mountain Brook," in the Artists' Fund Exhibition last year, over which, indeed, it shows but little advance. There was in that, what there is not in this, beautiful and delicate drawing of simple foreground detail; in that and in this alike is to be found very imperfect drawing of complex foreground detail, as, for instance, foliage, and both in that and in this the extreme distance is admirable. We conclude, after long consideration, and careful re-examination of all Mr. Farrer's work that is within our reach, that he has up to this time shown no power to combine local with general truth. Fruit on a table he has painted admirably; fruit and flowers on the tree he has painted admirably; a bush with large leaves and close at hand he has both drawn and colored admirably (no one should forget the admirable sycamore bush in the study "On the Genesee," exhibited in 1863); any near and tolerably simple thing, of which all the details can be thoroughly made out and elaborated, he can almost perfectly render. So, when a complex subject is so distant that it becomes simple; when mountains are ten miles away and broad in their masses, as in "The Catskills," N.A.D. 1864, "White Mountain Brook," Fund Exhibition of 1864, and "Mt. Washington," N.A.D. 1865; when forests clothe distant hill-sides, as in many water-color and other studies, and notably in the picture under consideration, all goes well. But middle-distance foliage, as in "Goat Island," N.A.D. 1863; in "The Catskills," mentioned above; and in the "Northampton"—surface of field and slope of hill, as in the "Buckwheat Field," N.A.D. 1864, and also in "Northampton"—such things as these he has never rightly painted, and they are nearly always faulty enough to injure seriously his careful and meritorious landscapes.

Miss Fidelia Bridges sends three good studies. No. 89, "September Afternoon," has a country road in it between bushes, a road almost as interesting as a river. This is good student's work and right in tendency. No. 223, "Study in the Woods," is hung too high to be seen rightly, but appears to be even better than the other.

Miss Edith W. Cook has a study, No. 95, "Tahawus Glen, Adirondacks," which is pleasant to see, and full of promise. It does not seem to us so "uncompromisingly" faithful as its neighbor, No. 89, just mentioned.

Mr. R. J. Pattison, in his little picture No. 277, has grappled with a tremendous subject, a "View of the White Mountains and Androscoggin Valley." It is little to say that such an antagonist is as yet rather beyond his powers. We do not object to the taking of a difficult subject, but an artist's technical skill ought to be more nearly equal to the requirements upon it than in this case. Mr. Pattison's color has not been, so far, his strong point, but he has taken a subject involving elaborate and subtle combinations of brilliant color. Mountain drawing is not easy, nor are there many who can do it at all as it ought to be done; this is, we think, Mr. Pattison's first essay, and he has taken the White Mountain group from a point where their full grandeur shows. We had rather have seen a pen-and-ink drawing of the scene. There would more have come out of that. Mr. Pattison's good work of former exhibitions has gained for him respect and secured attention for all his pictures hereafter, but he must not forfeit it by exhibiting work which falls so far short of artistic excellence as this.

For the spirit of Mr. Nast's work in general we have a very high respect The present exhibition gives us no opportunity to do it justice. But, indeed, no exhibition of pictures that we remember has shown Mr. Nast's talent to advantage; "Harper's Weekly" and even dead "Mrs. Grundy" are better galleries of exhibition for him; for the true feeling in his designs make them welcome to all who can feel, while the serious technical deficiencies are less evident and much less annoying in the wood-cut than in color. There is lack of energy painfully evident in all his work on canvas, and his apparent indifference as to whether the lines should go this way or that way, whether the color should be harmonized or not, if it really exists, is cause enough for the technical imperfection of his work.

MUSIC.

THE OPERA.

THAT badly-printed and worse-edited programme-sheet called The Stage, indulged itself last week in quoting from some other paper a fling at Chicago and its opera-house, and a violent attack on the company now performing there. From all that we can learn, even putting aside the indiscriminate praise of the Herald, the company of Mr. Grau possesses much merit, and it will be worth our while to hear them when they come to New York. It is very unbecoming for the associated managers to make an unprovoked attack in this way, because Mr. Grau is praised by their enemy, or because he has refused to join their association. It looks too much as if the manager of the opera now here were trying to prejudice public opinion against singers who have certainly no part in his quarrel, and who deserve to be heard with attention when they come, in the hope of benefiting his own pocket. And this truly ridiculous but false description of the orchestra at Chicago leads us to comment on the fact that Mr. Maretzek's orchestra is by no means so good as it should be. It often plays well, especially when led by Mr. Bergmann, but is very frequently in strong discordance with the effect sought to be produced by the composer. With Mr. Torriani it often plays badly. The reason of the bad effect of even its good playing is that it is very badly constituted. We cannot expect and do not want a full concert orchestra to accompany an opera, but we certainly need a much larger one than we have at present. The numbers of wind and percussive instruments that have been added to the orchestra by modern composers, while they have greatly increased its power, its force of rendering, and its coloring, have quite destroyed its balance of parts. We should be glad to have all the effects which the composer designed perfectly carried out, but either enough violins and stringed instruments must be added to counterbalance the increased number of other instruments, or the score must be altered to suit the orchestra, as it sometimes is to suit the voices. Now, at the Academy of Music we have twenty-three stringed instruments matched against seventeen wind instruments, besides the drums and cymbals. The stringed instruments not only appear feeble when played with these others, but the impression that all this noise leaves in the ear, when it ceases, diminishes the effect produced by the stringed instruments. The pianos appear thin and weak after such tremendous fortes. At least twelve violins, eight violas, ten violoncellos, and eight bassos are necessary to counterbalance so strong a force of other instruments. And this is very nearly the proportion that we find in the orchestra of the Grand Opera of Paris, one of the most perfect in the world, where there are fifty-one stringed instruments to twenty-seven wind and brass. And the increase in wind instruments is almost entirely in the flutes and reed instruments, and not in the brass pieces. Here we have nearly an equal amount of noise, with only half of the sustaining strength. The bad effect of this want of proportion is noticeable nearly every night, while such an opera as "Don Giovanni," with its older style of orchestration, where some of the brass instruments are disused, allows us to see the beauty of proportion.

"Don Giovanni" was given on Monday of last week, with a very fair cast—Zucchi as Donna Anna, Ficher as Elvira, Kellogg as Zerlina, Bellini as Don Giovanni, Irfre as Ottavio, Rovere as Leporello, and Dubreuil as Masetto. The acting was spirited, and the singing generally good. Miss Kellogg sang "Vedrai carino" with taste and expression, the masked trio was delightfully given, and Irfre deserved great credit for his rendering of "Il mio tesoro." Bellini was excellent throughout, as well in "La ci darem" as in either of the serenades.

We are more and more impressed, every time we hear "Don Giovanni," with the beauty of its music; and yet we have been brought irresistibly to the conclusion that, in spite of the lovely airs, the fine instrumentation, and the skill of arrangement of parts, that it is not a good opera. It approaches more nearly to being one than any other work of Mozart's, because the story has a little more sense to it than any of the others, and the music has, perhaps, a little more to do with the ideas and words. "Don Giovanni" is one of the oldest operas on the stage. No older ones, except one or two of Gluck's and one or two others of Mozart's, are ever played at all. It has been considered by many to be the turning point of operatic writing, and is the great model of a large and very prominent school of composers.

The opera was originally a kind of oratorio or sacred cantata, and the operas of "Dafne" and "Euridice," about 1590, by Peri and Caccini, were the first attempts at profane musical dramas. These consisted almost entirely of a kind of recitative, although "Euridice" contained an Anacreontic stanza at the beginning of each scene. This was the beginning of the aria which later became more fully developed in the operas of Cavalli, particularly in his "Jasone." In Monteverde's operas we find not much more than what is called an aria parlante, which is different from our recitative, and is, in fact, a species of melody following the words and paying the greatest attention to their meaning and expression. It was modelled after what the Greek choruses were supposed to have been. An excellent example from his "Ariadne," published in 1607, can be found in Hullah's "Lectures on the Transition Period of Musical History." Operatic writing progressed a little from this time, until it became a series of airs, all of a very formal kind, with their slow and quick movements following each other in regular order, and with little regard for the story, save as a convenient thread on which to string these beads, when it remained stationary for over a century. Gluck was the first composer who brought any change, and to him the opera owes more than to any other writer for an exposition and a realization of its aims, and for the impulse to that advance which it has made and is now making.

Gluck had written much in the usual Italian style and had become convinced of its falsity and worthlessness. He resolved upon making a change, as far as he could, in dramatic music, and bringing it nearer what seemed to him to be the true model. The opera is an elevated form both of music and of the drama. It has all the advantages of the drama, acting and scenery, and unites with these music, by which it is enabled to touch more nearly the heart and its emotions. Music is particularly suited to express the finer as well as the more powerful feelings; for language of excitement is often naturally rhythmical. If the emotions to be aroused and expressed are suitable ones, their expression in music will not seem to us in the slightest degree inconsistent. The music of an opera is, then, properly regarded as a means of expression of the sentiments and feelings of the drama. This is the way in which Gluck viewed it. Music was only one of the means of arriving at the result, which was dramatic force; and not only the music, but the words, the acting, and the scenery and costumes must all bend to that one end. A different school, with Mozart at their head, held and hold that music was of the first consequence and everything else second to it. Some even go so far as to say that to make music a mere aid of the drama degrades and lowers it, as if music were not just that kind of an art that it never could be really degraded in any position, but elevated and made ethereal everything it touched. Gluck, then, from his study and experience, enunciated these principles:

"Dramatic music can only reach its highest power and beauty when joined to a text simple, truly poetic, and exhibiting natural and definite emotions and passions, with the highest possible truth to nature." "Music may be made the language of emotion expressing the various feelings of the heart." "Music must follow with all possible exactness the rhythm and melody of the words." "In accompaniments instruments must be used to strengthen the expression of the vocal parts by their peculiar characters, or to heighten the general dramatic effect by employing them in contrast to the voice, as the text or dramatic situation might demand."

These principles he exemplified first in his opera of "Orfeo ed Euridice," the poem being written expressly for him by Calzabigi, and differing greatly from the received type of Metastasio. There were only two characters, Orpheus and Eurydice, and, in a few scenes, Love, and a chorus of Greeks at the beginning and end—in Tartarus a chorus of shades, and in Elysium a chorus of the blest. The subject was difficult, the new manner of treatment made it still more so, and no opera ever stood so severe a test. It however won its way to all hearts, and is now as fresh as ever, and a standard piece in Germany. This was in 1762. "Alceste" followed, and the two "Iphigenies," all beautiful, and all more nearly perfect than anything previously written. The influence of these works on dramatic music was very great and lives to this day, though of late it has been overpowered by other and opposite influences, and only now is dramatic music beginning to emerge from the depth to which it had been sunk by the Italian school. Gluck immediately affected Méhul, Spontini, and Cherubini, and now Meyerbeer and Gounod especially are the best popular representatives of his ideas. Wagner exhibits them in their purest form, and even goes a little beyond them. He has the truest conception of what dramatic music can and should be, and we have everything to hope from the new school of instruction in that branch of the art which is now being established at Munich under his superintendence. But perhaps Gounod is at present the most pleasing dramatic writer, in that he has yielded somewhat to the demands of the badly-educated public, while he has gone far toward the truth, and by means of a very favorable poem has succeeded in carrying the public a good distance with him.

Mozart, as we said just above, took a different view of the musical drama. With him the music was the chief thing, and the drama had for its principal object the furnishing of effective situations for beautiful airs and passages. A few years later than Gluck's works, in 1781, he produced his "Idomeneo." He had just come from Paris, where he had heard the works of Gluck, those of Piccinni and the Italian school, and those of the pure French school. "Idomeneo" was different from any of these. All of Mozart's previous operas had been written in the strict Italian manner, but in this he struck out a style of his own, which he further carried out in "The Marriage of Figaro," in "Don Giovanni," and "The Magic Flute." His works had somewhat more of body and substance to them than those of the Italians, while he excelled in the variety and in the simplicity of his working up of airs. Piccinni and Sacchini used very generally the standard method of commencing an air by a slow movement ending in the key of the piece, of following that by a quick movement, and of then returning coldly to the slow commencement. All expression and effect were spoiled by this. Movements were used singly, also very slow, and very greatly developed; but these were almost the only kinds. Mozart introduced many new varieties of connecting movements, added new life and charm to the duos, and wrote quatuors and sextetts, which were then almost unknown. He also invented new methods of orchestration, and added new instruments, which were severely condemned by the great teachers among the Italians, and added greatly to the effect of the opera by his skill in harmony and modulation. He, indeed, side by side with Gluck, effected a revolution in dramatic music, and what he taught was indeed beneficial, until it smothered up what was good. Rossini learned his best qualities from Mozart, and through Rossini the Italian school was completely changed. But in spite of all this, the radically wrong idea of the opera with which Mozart started had its evil force, and operas became less and less dramatic and more and more lyrical, until they were hardly dramas at all.

The feeling for the true and the beautiful is, however, now showing itself, and is declaring that Mozart's ideas of the musical drama were mistaken, and that there is a greater height which it can reach yet, if it becomes more natural and less devoted to strict rules which have been imposed on it, but with little reason. For this greater advance, we must look to the men whom Gounod and Wagner represent.

NOW READY.

GOLDEN-HAIRED GERTRUDE.

THEODORE TILTON'S STORY.

A NEW AND BEAUTIFUL MARRIAGE CERTIFICATE,

THE FINEST IN THE MARKET.

Price 20 Cents.

TIBBALS & WHITING,

37 Park Row, N. Y.

JUST PUBLISHED.

The Complete Works of the MOST REV. JOHN HUGHES, D.D.,

LATE ARCHBISHOP OF NEW YORK.

2 vols. 8vo, 1,478 pages, cloth,.....$ 8 00

" " " " half morocco,..... 10 0

☞ There is also a cheap edition. Price $6 00 and $8 00.

LAWRENCE KEHOE, PUBLISHER,

7 Beekman Street, N. Y.

BEAUTY, VIGOR, and DEVELOPMENT—Complexion, Plumpness, Rules of Health, Exercise, with illustrations and practical instruction, Gymnastics, for Men, Women, and Children, in December PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL.

NEW AND SUPERB HOLIDAY BOOKS,

JUST PUBLISHED BY

CHARLES SCRIBNER & CO.,

124 GRAND STREET, NEW YORK.

CHRISTIAN ARMOUR;

OR,

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE CHRISTIAN WARFARE AS EMBODIED IN THE EXHORTATION OF THE APOSTLE PAUL,

"Take unto you the whole armour of God."

ILLUMINATIONS:

I.

TITLE PAGE. The border represents the rich, antique, stained glass window of an old cathedral.

II.

DEDICATION PLATE. Beautifully illuminated.

III.

ST. PAUL TO THE EPHESIANS. Each piece of armor taken up separately. A rich border of oak leaves and acorns, emblematic of strength, in green, red, and gold.

IV.

FRONTISPIECE. Each piece of armor mentioned in the text, thrown together with a motto upon a golden ribbon, after the manner of a coat-of-arms, surrounded with heraldic ornamentation and surrounded with Christian emblems.

V.

GIRDLE OF TRUTH. Border of white snow-drops, emblematic of purity, surrounded by the Bible, and the emblem of the "Lamb of God" bearing the Cross.

VI.

THE BREAST-PLATE OF RIGHTEOUSNESS. In purple, red, blue, green, and gold.

VII.

SANDALS, THE GOSPEL OF PEACE. Surrounded with a wreath of "Forget-me-nots" and Lilies of the Valley, surmounted by the emblems of the Holy Spirit and of the Glory of Jehovah.

VIII.

THE SHIELD OF FAITH. In green, blue, gold, orange, purple, and silver.

IX.

THE HELMET OF SALVATION. Surrounded by the vine in purple and gold, surmounted with the Bible, and silver cup lined with gold.

X.

THE SWORD OF THE SPIRIT, which is the Word of God. A beautiful illumination in gold, crimson, green, and purple.

XI.

THE MANTLE OF PRAYER. Crimson and ermine. Surrounded by a wreath of Convolvulus, the Early Morning's Glory, in purple, green, crimson, and gold.

XII.

THE BANNER OF CHRIST. Scarlet Cross, emblazoned on a white banner

XIII.

THE NEW GARMENT: Immortality. An angel turning back the pages of the Bible, surrounded by a wreath of golden grain, with butterflies interspersed, and surmounted by the Anchor of Hope.

XIV.

I. H. S. In a Golden Halo: Eternal Life. Surrounded by an antique arabesque ornamentation in gold, surmounted with emblems of the Holy Spirit in golden halos.

XV.

EMBLEMS. A beautiful illumination in gold, crimson, purple, blue, green, and orange.

The object of this unique and novel work is to bring the Fine Arts to the aid of the great spiritual truths of religion, and, by presenting them to the eye in a picturesque and attractive shape to impress them more deeply on the mind. The illustrations comprise a series of

RICHLY ILLUMINATED PLATES,

EMBLAZONED IN GOLD AND SILVER,

In the style of the Ancient Missal Decorations, improved and chastened by the refinements of Modern Art.

In one elegant quarto volume, massively bound in Levant and Turkey morocco, bevelled, antique, richly gilt sides and edges, price $20; in cloth, bevelled and extra gilt, $15. Put up in a neat box.

THE BOOK OF RUBIES.

A COLLECTION OF THE MOST NOTABLE LOVE POEMS IN THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

In 1 vol. crown 8vo, printed by Alvord, in 2 colors, on superfine extra calendered tinted paper, bound in extra illuminated cloth, full gilt, $7; in Turkey, extra antique, $10. Put up in a neat box.

There is no love poem of note omitted, and with all those gems long known to the public, there are numerous others hitherto overlooked because of the demerits of the authors in other fields of literary labor or because they were the single songs of those who never sung well but once. Arrayed with reference to the dates at which the authors flourished, the poems furnish a fair view of the progress of erotic poetry, and allow a comparison of styles and merit not to be otherwise attained except by laborious and not over-profitable reading. Every shade of human passion, except the sensual, is illustrated, and it confers credit on the editor to see how happily pure is the result of his labors.

☞ Copies sent by mail or express, freight paid, on receipt of price, by C. SCRIBNER & CO.

SUPERB NATIONAL GIFT BOOK.

THE HOME OF WASHINGTON

AND

ITS ASSOCIATIONS,

HISTORICAL, BIOGRAPHICAL, AND PICTORIAL.

New Edition, Revised, with Additions.

By BENSON J. LOSSING.

Illustrated with 150 Engravings, mainly from Original Drawings by the Author, embracing numerous Views of Mount Vernon, various interesting objects upon the Grounds, Copies of Famous Pictures, Portraits of Washington and other Members of the Family, as well as Distinguished Personages of his Time, etc.

This new edition of this popular national work has been carefully corrected, and very interesting additional matter, with new engravings, introduced. It contains very much valuable information, first published in this volume, relating to the Washington family, which Mr. Lossing's extensive acquaintance and superior facilities have enabled him to collect. This superb work is acknowledged to be one of the most important contributions to our historical literature, presenting a complete memorial of the private and domestic Life of the Father of his Country. It is printed by Alvord on superfine paper, delicately tinted, and elegantly bound in heavy bevelled boards, in new styles of binding designed for the boudoir, parlor-table, and home library.

From the American Literary Gazette.

"It is in every respect a unique volume, for there is no other one which covers the same ground, and it is a companion to every other one which treats of the Father of his Country. It is manufactured in an unexceptionable style. The heavy paper is delicately tinted, the printing is in Mr. Alvord's best manner, and 140 graphic illustrations accompany the text. The book is now quite opportune. . . We feel that we are not only calling attention to a work of historical, literary, and artistic merit, but we trust that we are also subserving the interest of patriotism, when we invite attention to this beautiful volume."

Opinion of Edward Everett.

"This very interesting memorial of the home of Washington is a fit companion to Irving's valuable history, and should be included with it to make the library complete."

Small quarto, extra cloth, new designs, gilt sides and edges, $6 50; morocco antique, and gilt sides and edges, $10 50.

Published by

W. A. TOWNSEND, 55 Walker St., New York.

For sale by all Booksellers.

"WORK FOR WOMEN"—What she can do—by Mrs. G. W Wyllys—Anxiety—Thy Name—Poems—Spiders, variety, sizes, and how they live, in December No. PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. 20 cts.

NEW WORK

BY THEA UTHOR OF THE "SCHÖNBERG-COTTA FAMILY," "DIARY OF KITTY TREVYLYAN," ETC.

WILL BE PUBLISHED DECEMBER 1,

FROM THE AUTHOR.S MANUSCRIPT

WINIFRED BERTRAM,

AND THE WORLD SHE LIVED IN.

By the Author of the "Schönberg-Cotta Family."

One vol. 12mo, to match our three other volumes of the "Cotta Family" Series.

The marked characteristics of the other volumes of this series of books, exhibiting the marvellous power of the author over the moral feelings of her readers, and giving these works such wide and deserved popularity, are conspicuous in this new production. It is the immediate successor of "Kitty Trevylyan," and the only work given to the public by its author since the publication by us of that volume a year ago.

M. W. DODD, PUBLISHER,

506 Broadway, New York.

AGENTS WANTED

FOR

MACKENZIE'S GREAT BOOK.

READY THIS WEEK.

Apply at once to

T. ELLWOOD ZELL, PUBLISHER,

17 and 19 South Sixth Street, Philadelphia.

HON. DANIEL S. DICKINSON—His Portrait, Character, and Biography—in December PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. 20 cts.

THE EVENING POST,

NEW YORK.

EDITED BY

WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT

AND

PARKE GODWIN.

FEARLESS AND HEARTY

IN THE SUPPORT OF THE GREAT PRINCIPLES OF UNIVERSAL JUSTICE AND FREEDOM.

Pledged to No Party,

And looking only to the interests of the whole country, now happily restored and united.

A Good Literary Newspaper,

Containing a carefully selected literary miscellany, comprising poetry, reviews of new works, with liberal extracts, gossip, and anecdotes—the whole forming an excellent variety, in which every reader will discover something to his taste.

Financial and Market Reports

Elaborately and carefully prepared.

TERMS—TO MAIL SUBSCRIBERS.

WEEKLY, $2 per annum; SEMI-WEEKLY, $4 per annum; DAILY, $12 per annum.
Sample Copies sent free. Agents wanted.

AGENTS SENDING US THE MONEY and names of twenty subscribers to our Semi-Weekly paper at $4 each, or forty subscribers to our Weekly at $2 each, will receive one of Wheeler & Wilson's $55 Family Sewing Machines, or one of the Howe Sewing Machines, which sell in New York for $60; or if they should not succeed in making up the full number to entitle them to this premium, they can send us such subscriptions as they have obtained, and deduct 12½ per cent. from the amount of their remittance.

Address

WM. C. BRYANT & CO., PUBLISHERS,

41 Nassau Street, cor. Liberty, New York.

A CONCISE

DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE;

COMPRISING ITS

ANTIQUITIES, BIOGRAPHY, GEOGRAPHY, AND NATURAL HISTORY.

Edited by WILLIAM SMITH, LL.D.

Thick 8vo, cloth, with 270 plans and wood-cuts, $6 00; half calf, $8 00.

This condensation of the "DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE" has been made by Mr. WILLIAM ALDIS WRIGHT, M.A., Librarian of Trinity College, Cambridge, under the direction and superintendence of Dr. WILLIAM SMITH. It is intended to satisfy a generally expressed wish for an account of the most recent Biblical studies in a form adapted for universal circulation. A Dictionary of the Bible, in some form or another, is indispensable for every family. The Divine, the Scholar, and all who desire to investigate thoroughly the various subjects connected with the Bible, and to master those controversies which are now exciting such deep and general interest, must still have recourse to the Larger Dictionary; but to students, to private families, and to that numerous class of persons who desire to arrive at results, simply, this CONCISE Dictionary will, it is believed, supply all that is necessary for the elucidation and explanation of the Bible. It is the main object of the editor to place within the reach of every Christian household a popular abstract of a work which has received the approval of those competent to express an opinion on the subject.

A copy of this work will be sent, post-paid, to any address, on receipt of the advertised price by the Publishers,

LITTLE, BROWN & COMPANY,
110 Washington Street, Boston.

OPINIONS.

"By such a work as this, a knowledge of the Bible is brought within easy reach of all commonly well educated persons, and every man of intelligence may become his own commentator. We are confident that the study of the Bible will gain thereby in fulness and exactitude, in interest and effectiveness. An eminent service is rendered to Christianity itself when such a mass of Christian learning is thus popularized—when, to use the language of a thoughtful contemporary, such a store of gold is drawn out of distant and inaccessible mines, and converted into current coin for the use of the Christian world."—Times.

"An excellence which strikes us in this Dictionary is the first-rate scholarship apparent in every part. The erudition displayed is never second-hand. Each contributor writes on a topic which he has thoroughly mastered and made his own. Thus we have Mr. Rawlinson on Babel and Babylon, Lord Arthur Hervey on the Genealogies, Mr. Fergusson on Jerusalem, A. P. Stanley on David, E. S. Poole on Arabia, B. F Wescott on the Canon, Stuart Poole, of the British Museum, on Chronology."—Baptis Magazine.

SEND FOR A CATALOGUE.

MESSRS. MOHUN & EBBS,

181 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Take pleasure in informing their friends and the public that they have secured the valuable services of

MR. HENRY KERNOT,

so long and favorably known in the book trade to book-buyers in general, and to the heads of colleges and literary institutions, and that he is engaged in preparing

A CATALOGUE OF THEIR EXTENSIVE STOCK,

Comprising Very Choice English Works, specially rich in Best Editions, Curious, Rare, and Unique Works, splendidly Illustrated Volumes (many of which with Extra Plates), with a large assortment of Pickering's Rare and Beautiful Editions, the British Historians, Poets, and Essayists, together with the best American authors; also, Richly Illustrated French Works, including all Doré's Splendid Compositions, selected from one of the largest and finest stocks of Imported Books ever offered to the public.

CATALOGUES will be ready in a few days, and will be sent FREE to any address on application by letter or personally.

181 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

November 13, 1865.

IN PRESS:

POEMS,

LYRICAL, NARRATIVE, AND SATIRICAL,

On the Civil War.

COLLECTED AND ARRANGED BY

RICHARD GRANT WHITE.

This collection, which has been made with great care by the Editor, is so arranged as to represent the succession of incident and growth of popular feeling during the war.

One volume 12mo, stereotyped at the Riverside Press, and printed on tinted paper by Alvord.

THE AMERICAN NEWS COMPANY, PUBLISHERS,
119 and 121 Nassau Street, N. Y.

DORAN'S ANNALS OF THE STAGE.

A NEW AND ELEGANT EDITION.

THE ANNALS OF THE ENGLISH STAGE, from Thomas Betterton to Edmund Kean—Actors, Authors, and Audiences. 2 vols. post 8vo. Elegantly printed, with rubricated title. Cloth, extra, $4 50; half calf or half Turkey, $8.

Also, now ready, a uniform edition of

Dr. DORAN'S WORKS, 9 Vols.

ANNALS OF THE ENGLISH STAGE. 2 vols.
THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND OF THE HOUSE OF HANOVER (the Wives of the Four Georges). 2 vols.
MONARCHS RETIRED FROM BUSINESS. 2 vols.
KNIGHTS AND THEIR DAYS. 1 vol.
TABLE TRAITS, with Something on Them. 1 vol.
HABITS AND MEN, with Remnants of Record touching the Makers of Both. 1 vol.

Sets, 9 vols., in box, cloth, extra.....$20 00
Half calf or half Turkey 35 00
Cloth, vols., separately..... .... 2 25

 Sent by mail on receipt of price.

WIDDLETON, PUBLISHER,
17 Mercer Street, New York.

WASHINGTON AND CÆSAR—The great Roman and the great American compared, with splendid engraved portraits, in December PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS OF PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL,

501 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

In addition to our main business of PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS, we are Headquarters for the following, viz.:

STEREOSCOPES AND STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS.

Of these we have an immense assortment, including War Scenes, American and Foreign Cities and Landscapes, Groups, Statuary, etc., etc.; also, Revolving Stereoscopes, for public or private exhibition. Our Catalogue will be sent to any address on receipt of

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS.

We were the first to introduce these into the United States, and we manufacture immense quantities in great variety, ranging in price from 50 cents to $50 each. Our ALBUMS have the reputation of being superior in beauty and durability to any others They will be sent by mail, FREE, on receipt of price.

☞ FINE ALBUMS MADE TO ORDER. ☜

CARD PHOTOGRAPHS.

Our Catalogue now embraces over FIVE THOUSAND different subjects, to which additions are continually being made of Portraits of Eminent Americans—viz., about

100 Major-Generals,	100 Lieut.-Colonels,	550 Statesmen
200 Brig.-Generals,	250 Other Officers,	130 Divines,
275 Colonels,	75 Navy Officers,	125 Authors,
40 Artists,	125 Stage,	50 Prominent Women.

3,000 Copies of Works of Art,

including reproductions of the most celebrated Engravings, Paintings, Statues, etc. Catalogues sent on receipt of stamp. An order for One Dozen PICTURES from our Catalogue will be filled on the receipt of $1 80, and sent by mail FREE.

Photographers and others ordering goods C. O. D., will please remit twenty-five per cent. of the amount with their orders.

☞ Soldiers' Pocket Albums for 18 pictures, 75 cents.

☞ The price and quality of our goods cannot fail to satisfy.

JUST PUBLISHED,

THE BEST NOVEL OF THE SEASON.

MR. STEWART'S INTENTIONS.

BY FREDERICK WILLIAM ROBINSON,

Author of "Grandmother's Money," "A Woman's Ransom," etc., etc. 8vo, paper. Price 75 cents.

T. O. H. P. BURNHAM, PUBLISHER,
143 Washington Street, Boston.

For sale by all Booksellers.
Sent by mail to any part of the United States, postage free, on receipt of 75 cents.

SYMMETRY OF CHARACTER—The American Baptist talks to illy-balanced Clergymen; The Christian and the Sinner. PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL.

The Largest, the Cheapest, and the Best Children's Pa[per] in America.

THE LITTLE CORPORAL.

A FIRST CLASS PAPER FOR BOYS AND GIRLS,

Published Monthly, in Chicago, Ill., 138 Lake Street,

By ALFRED L. SEWELL.

THE LITTLE CORPORAL contains sixteen pages of first class literary matter. is intended that it shall contain better original Stories, Poems, and other reading for children, and more matter for the price, than any other children's paper on the continent. First No. published July, 1865.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE, ONE DOLLAR A YEAR, IN ADVANCE.

Though the paper itself is more than worth the price, yet for the sake of offering such an inducement as will ensure beyond all doubt a very large list of subscribers to start with, I have determined to give the following beautiful present to every subscriber for one year:

A Superb Quarto Steel Engraving,

THE CHILDREN'S PORTRAIT OF MR. LINCOLN,

Size, 9⅛ x 11¼ inches, engraved in the highest style of the art, expressly as a premium plate for this paper.

☞ SPECIMEN COPY OF THE PAPER SENT ON RECEIPT OF TEN CENTS.

Address ALFRED L. SEWELL,
Care of Dunlop, Sewell & Spalding,
CHICAGO, ILL.

PREMIUMS TO CLUBS.

Every person who shall send six subscribers, and six dollars, will receive as a premium one extra copy for one year, and also a copy of the above Engraving.

Other inducements advertised in the paper for larger clubs.

All pages are electrotyped, and back numbers can always be furnished.

READ WHAT THE PAPERS SAY:

The Pittsburg Christian Advocate says: "The best paper for children, published in this great country of ours, is The Little Corporal. It is a gem in the catalogue of monthlies."

Forney's Philadelphia Daily Press says of it: "Judging from the appearance of the two numbers before us, The Little Corporal is destined to become the great children's paper of America."

"A NEW CHILD'S PAPER.—We have received two copies of The Little Corporal. Judging from these specimens, it is the cleverest thing of its kind yet realized in America. Its whole appearance is in capital taste, and there is evidence in it that its editor has rare tact in catering for the wants of the little ones."—Roxbury [Mass.] Journal.

"Certainly, we have seen nothing in the shape of a child's paper which could compare with this, which comes to us from over the prairies."—Portland [Maine] Daily Press.

"We cannot say too much in favor of this beautiful paper."—Bryan [O.] Union Press.

"It already excels every children's paper we know of in this country."—Chicago Evening Journal.

"The children will be better and happier from reading it."—Henry [Ill.] Courier.

"Indeed, there is no paper of the kind published that approaches it as a juvenile journal."—Poughkeepsie Daily Press.

We might quote hundreds similar to the above, but these will suffice now.

TO CLERGYMEN THROUGHOUT THE UNITED STATES:

As editor of THE LITTLE CORPORAL, I hope to induce Ministers to favor the circulation of my paper among their children as a means of doing them good; and I ask each one to send me the name of some intelligent and respectable lady (for whose integrity he can vouch), who will be willing to energetically canvass her own neighborhood for subscribers to THE LITTLE CORPORAL.

Any Minister addressing me, as shown above, will receive by next mail Circulars, showing the opinions of the Press, and will also be informed in relation to the percentage allowed to canvassers; and may also obtain the paper for his own family at half price.

Address as above stated.

Cut this Out, and Preserve it to Select From.

HURD & HOUGHTON,

401 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

OFFER THE FOLLOWING

ELEGANTLY ILLUSTRATED BOOKS

AT WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.

1. PICTURES OF SOCIETY,
Grave and Gay. Comprising one hundred engravings on wood from the pictures of eminent artists, and illustrated by the pens of popular authors. 1 vol. royal 8vo, beautifully printed and handsomely bound in cloth, full gilt, $10; Turkey morocco, $15.

(JUST READY,)

2. THE ARTISTS' SKETCH-BOOK.
"Irving's Sketch-Book." With more than 130 drawings by eminent artists, including Huntington, Gray, Lentze, Richards, Darley, and others. 1 vol. quarto, new crape cloth, full gilt, $15; Turkey morocco, $18; Levant morocco, crushed, $20.

3. THE DIVINE AND MORAL SONGS OF DR. WATTS.
A new and choice edition. Illustrated with 100 wood-cuts, in the finest style of art, from original designs by eminent artists. Engraved by J. D. Cooper. Printed on best paper and handsomely bound. 1 vol. small quarto, cloth, full gilt, $5; Turkey morocco, $8 50.

(READY DECEMBER 1,)

4. HYMNS IN PROSE, for Children. By Mrs. BARBAULD, author of "Lessons for Children." With 109 wood-cuts from designs by Coleman, Barnes, Kennedy, and Wimperts. Engraved by Cooper. Elegantly printed on fine paper, 1 vol. small quarto, cloth, full gilt, $5; Turkey morocco, $8 50.

(JUST READY,)

5. THE POEMS OF ALICE CARY,
With numerous engravings on wood by Hart, Hennessey, Bellows, Herrick, Perkins, and others. Engraved by Richardson. 1 vol. crown 8vo, cloth, full gilt, $4 50; Turkey morocco, $8.

(READY DECEMBER 5,)

6. THE TWENTY-THIRD PSALM.
Splendidly illuminated from original designs. Each page elegantly printed in oil colors, with emblematic border. 1 vol. quarto, extra cloth, gilt, $5; morocco, gilt or antique, $8 50.

(JUST READY,)

7. THE THREE KINGS OF ORIENT.
A Christmas Carol. Words and Music by Rev. J. H. HOPKINS, JR. Each page printed in oil colors. From exquisite designs. 1 vol. quarto, extra cloth, gilt, $5; morocco, gilt or antique, $8 50.

(JUST READY,)

8. THE FABLES OF ÆSOP.
With Croxall's Applications and a life of the author. Embellished with 111 wood-cuts from original designs by H. W. Herrick. Engraved in a superior manner by Bogart, Felter, and others, and elegantly printed at the "Riverside Press," on toned paper, from new type. 1 vol. crown 8vo, extra cloth, $4; full gilt, $5; half Roxburgh, $6; Turkey morocco, $8; 16mo edition, printed on good paper, cloth, $2.

9. PICCIOLA.
By X. B. SAINTINE. A new translation from the author's last revised edition. With illustrations on wood from designs by Leopold Flameng, and ornamental head and tail pieces. Fine edition, printed on toned paper from new and handsome type. 1 vol. crown 8vo, extra cloth, gilt, $3 50; Cabinet edition, 1 vol. 16mo, cloth, $1 50.

(READY NOVEMBER 28,)

10. THE HUDSON LEGENDS.
Comprising "Rip Van Winkle" and "Sleepy Hollow." By WASHINGTON IRVING. 1 vol. quarto, extra cloth gilt, $4 50; Turkey morocco, $8.

11. A FOREST HYMN.
By WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT. Illustrated on wood from drawings by John A. Hows. This volume has been considered one of the most elegant specimens of typography and wood engraving issued in this country. 1 vol. quarto, extra cloth, gilt, $4; Turkey morocco, $7 50.

12. IN THE WOODS.
With BRYANT, LONGFELLOW, and HALLECK. Illustrated on wood from drawings by John A. Hows. Its contents are Bryant's "Death of the Flowers," Longfellow's "When Woods were Green," and Halleck's "Wyoming." 1 vol. quarto, extra cloth, gilt, $4; Turkey morocco, $7 50.

13. FOREST HYMN AND IN THE WOODS.
In 1 vol. These two exquisite series of forest and flower pictures, when united, afford a work unequalled in attractive variety of illustration. In 1 vol., Turkey morocco, antique, $10.

14. FOREST PICTURES IN THE ADIRONDACKS.
By JOHN A. HOWS. With original poems by ALFRED B. STREET. 16 full-page engravings. 1 vol. quarto, extra cloth, gilt, $4; Turkey morocco, $7 50.

15. CHRISTMAS POEMS AND PICTURES.
A collection of carols, songs, and descriptive poems relating to the festival of Christmas. Richly illustrated with numerous engravings on wood, by famous artists. A new and improved edition. In 1 vol. quarto, extra cloth, gilt, $4; Turkey morocco, $7 50.

16. CHRISTMAS CAROL.
"CHRIST WAS BORN ON CHRISTMAS DAY." With illustrations by John A. Hows. This is a peculiarly unique and beautiful edition of a popular Christmas carol. A rich cluster of holly leaves, printed in colors, forms the engraved title-page. In 1 vol. quarto, extra cloth, gilt, $3; Turkey morocco, $6.

17. A SELECTION OF WAR LYRICS.
With illustrations on wood by F. O. C. Darley. The Lyrics are eight in number, and were selected so as to present the different phases of the war. Mr. Darley's drawings are unusually spirited. In 1 vol. quarto, half muslin, $1 75; extra cloth, gilt, $2 50; Turkey morocco, $6.

18. RIP VAN WINKLE.
A Legend of Kaatskill Mountain. By WASHINGTON IRVING. Illustrated with original designs by Darley, Hoppin, Wm. Hart, and Parsons. 1 vol. quarto, fancy boards, $1 50.

19. LEGEND OF SLEEPY HOLLOW.
From the "Sketch-Book" of Washington Irving. Illustrated with original designs by Huntington, Kensett, Darley, Hoppin, and others. 1 vol. quarto, fancy boards, $1 75.

20. THE VAGABONDS.
By J. T. TROWBRIDGE. With illustrations by F. O. C. Darley. A spirited and notable poem. 1 vol. quarto, extra cloth, gilt, $2 50; half muslin, $1 75.

Sent by mail or express free on receipt of the price.

F. LEYPOLDT,

646 Broadway, New York,

HAS IN PRESS

MOZART'S LETTERS.

Translated by Lady WALLACE.

OUR YEAR.

By Miss MULOCH.

A CHILD'S BOOK IN PROSE AND VERSE.

NOW READY,

The Tauchnitz Edition of DENISE.

By the author of "Mademoiselle Mori." 1 vol. 16mo, paper, 75 cents.

THE HOLY LAND.

By W. HEPWORTH DIXON. 2 vols. 16mo, paper, $1 50.

Mr. Leypoldt has still a few copies of that exquisite book, the

LIFE OF PHILIDOR.

By Prof. GEORGE ALLEN. 1 vol. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

A valuable presentation book for persons of taste.

"We can hardly withhold our tribute of just admiration, when we consider the thorough, conscientious criticism and the truly elegant style which shine forth from every page of this praiseworthy essay."—Berlin Chess Gazette.

"'The Life of Philidor,' by Prof. Allen, is as interesting as a romance. The book has the merit, too, of being one of the best printed on the American continent."—Philadelphia Press.

☞ Copies sent, post-paid, on receipt of price.

NAPOLEON III.—His Portrait, Character, and Biography.

Blind Tom, the Negro Pianist, Portrait and Character, in December PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL.

The Most Original, Sensational, and Philosophical Romance of the Season.

ERRING, YET NOBLE.

A TALE OF AND FOR WOMEN.

1 vol. 12mo, 530 pages, price $1 75.

"Eighty thousand women in one smile,
Who only smile at night beneath the gas."

. . "That for a single offence, however grave, a whole life should be blasted, is a doctrine repugnant to nature."

"The good are ever the most charitable."

"Neither do I condemn thee. Go and sin no more."

The First Edition exhausted, and the Second Edition now ready.

JOHN BRADBURN, Publisher (Late M. DOOLADY),
49 Walker Street, New York.

ON THE STRENGTH OF

CAST IRON PILLARS,

WITH TABLES FOR THE USE OF

ENGINEERS, ARCHITECTS, AND BUILDERS.

BY JAMES B. FRANCIS, CIVIL ENGINEER.

1 vol. 8vo, cloth, $2.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, 192 BROADWAY.

 Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price.

LORD PALMERSTON—His Likeness, Description of Character, and Biography of this remarkable man, in December PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. $2 a year.

STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS OF THE WAR,

obtained at great expense, and forming a

COMPLETE PHOTOGRAPHIC HISTORY

OF THE

GREAT UNION CONTEST.

Bull Run,	Dutch Gap,	Strawberry Plains,
Yorktown,	Pontoon Trains,	Deep Bottom,
Gettysburg,	Hanover Junction,	Belle Plain,
Fair Oaks,	Lookout Mountain,	Monitors,
Savage Station,	Chickahominy,	Chattanooga,
Fredericksburg,	City Point,	Fort Morgan,
Fairfax,	Nashville,	Atlanta,
Richmond,	Charleston,	Mobile,
Petersburg,	Etc., Etc.	Etc., Etc.

Everybody is interested in these memorable scenes.

Just published by

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
501 Broadway, New York.

☞ Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.

THE SEER!

By Leigh Hunt.

The essays in these volumes are mainly devoted to the most familiar topics, and they aim to make known the pleasure which is to be derived from a loving observation and study of the commonest things. Their motto is, "Love adds a precious seeing to the eye," and they beautifully exemplify its truth. Such subjects as "The Cat by the Fire," "A Pinch of Snuff," "On a Pebble," and "A Dusty Day," do not appear, at first blush, to promise much of either entertainment or instruction. But read them and marvel at the subtle alchemy of genius which can turn such trifles into gold. It is, of course, the quaint and genial humor of the author, his felicitous yet almost chatty way of saying his "good things," his opulent and discursive fancy, his rare delicacy of sentiment and perception, and his marvellous memory, which, in a sort of indolent and ruminative enjoyment, throws upon his pages now a choice quotation from the poets, now a suggestive allusion, and anon a pleasant anecdote, that give them such a beguiling charm, and fit them to be the companion of either the winter's fireside or the summer's siesta.—Providence Press.

In two elegant 16mo vols. Price $3.

Sold by all Booksellers, and mailed post-paid by the Publishers,

ROBERTS BROTHERS, Boston.

A NEW HISTORY OF CIVILIZATION—Destiny of America, Indians, American Geographical Society, Horace Mann, in December Phrenological Journal.

THE CHURCH MUSIC BOOK FOR 1865-66

IS

"THE HARP OF JUDAH."

SEVENTY-FIVE THOUSAND COPIES SOLD,

AND

THE DEMAND INCREASING.

Price $1 38.

Specimen sheets free.

OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers,

BOSTON.

PHRENOLOGY IN THE PULPIT—Discussions between two Clergymen; The Presbyterian Standard and The Western Presbyterian on Phrenology. Rich and racy in December Phrenological Journal.

Choice Imported Books at Reasonable Prices.

J. W. BOUTON, having recently returned from Europe, begs to invite the attention of collectors and the public to his selections made while abroad, consisting of fine copies of

STANDARD, MISCELLANEOUS,

AND ILLUSTRATED WORKS,

Among which will be found desirable copies of the following: DIBDIN'S WORKS, 21 vols., boards, uncut; RETROSPECTIVE REVIEW, 16 vols. 8vo, calf, extra; PERCY SOCIETY PUBLICATIONS, 31 vols.; PAINTER'S PALACE OF PLEASURES; WALPOLE'S ROYAL AND NOBLE AUTHORS, 5 vols. 4to, large paper; RAPHAEL'S FRESCOES IN THE VATICAN; MACKLIN'S BIBLE, 7 vols. folio; ART JOURNAL, 25 vols.; CUNNINGHAM'S LIVES OF ILLUSTRIOUS ENGLISHMEN, 18 vols., 400 extra plates; NICHOLS'S HOGARTH, 3 vols. 4to; GROSS'S ANTIQUITIES, 12 vols. folio; LODGE'S PORTRAITS, 12 vols. royal 8vo; PITTI GALLERY, 4 vols. folio; FLORENCE GALLERY, 4 vols. folio; MUSÉE FRANCAIS and MUSÉE ROYAL, 6 vols. folio; BOYDELL'S SHAKESPEARE GALLERY; DUGDALE'S MONASTICON ANGLICANUM, 8 vols.; NICHOLS'S ANECDOTES, 17 vols.; GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE, 211 vols., complete. A choice collection of PICKERING'S and the CHISWICK PRESS PUBLICATIONS; ILLUMINATED MISSALS, etc., etc., all of which are now on view and for SALE by

J. W. BOUTON, 481 Broadway, New York.

 Priced Catalogues sent to any address on receipt of a stamp to pay postage.

ANIMAL TYPES of HUMAN PHYSIOGNOMY—More about the Nose. New Dictionary of Phrenology and Physiognomy, illustrated. No two faces alike—in December Phrenological Journal. $2 a year.

FINANCIAL REVIEW.

Nation Office, Monday Morning, Nov. 27, 1865.

The week which ended on Saturday last was uneventful in commercial and financial circles. The imports at the port for the week amounted to $6,793,221, rather more than the average at this season; the exports—of which the return will not be made until to-morrow—were liberal; in specie, $723,000 were sent abroad. The receipts of breadstuffs from the interior continue moderate; of cotton the supply is increasing; it amounted last week to over 28,000 bales. No great change took place in the money or exchange or stock market. The following table will show the prices of Monday morning, 20th inst., as compared with those of Saturday afternoon, 25th inst.:

	Nov. 20.	Nov. 25.	Advance.	Decline.
United States Sixes of 1881	105⅞	105⅞	....	....
5-20 Bonds, old	102⅛	101½	....	⅝
5-20 Bonds of 1865	100	99⅝	....	⅜
10-40 Bonds	91½	91	....	½
7-30 Notes, second series	97¼	97¾	....	½
New York Central	97¼	97¼	....	....
Erie Railway	92½	93¼	¾	....
Hudson River	109	110	1	....
Michigan Southern	76½	76¼	....	¼
Reading Railroad	114½	116¼	1¾	....
Cleveland and Pittsburg	94½	92⅝	....	1⅝
Chicago and North-Western	37¼	36¾	....	½
" " " Preferred	66¼	65¾	....	½
Chicago and Rock Island	108½	109½	1	....
P. Fort Wayne and Chicago	104⅝	105½	⅞	....
Canton	45½	45	....	½
Cumberland	45	44¾	....	¼
Mariposa	15	14	....	1
American Gold	147	147	....	....
Bankers' Bills on London	108⅞	109	⅛	....
Call Loans	7	7	....	....

About the middle of the week the leading railway stocks advanced with considerable symptoms of activity. North-Western common touched 40; Fort Wayne, 107; Michigan Southern, 78½; Hudson, 111; and Pittsburg, 94½. At these points sales to realize profits checked the advance, and a decline subsequently ensued. For the moment, Rock Island, Chicago and North-Western, and Erie are the popular favorites. But it is due to truth to say that speculation in Wall Street just now is confined to the regular habitués of the Stock Exchange, and that the public are holding off, waiting till the Treasury Report and the action of Congress determine whether or no further efforts are to be made to curtail the currency.

A general decline in Government securities will be noticed. This arises from the apprehension, among national banks and other holders of United States securities, that the Secretary will endeavor to pursue his policy of funding currency into long bonds, which, of course, would involve a further decline in all public securities. There are many among the financial friends of the Government, especially at Philadelphia, who scout the notion of further attempts at contraction at present, and argue that, whatever the private wishes of the Secretary may be, the influence of the South and the West will be cast into the scale against any present reduction of the circulating medium, and that that influence will be potent enough to determine the policy of Government. It is hardly worth while presenting the views of the two contending parties, as within a very few days the question will be set at rest, so far as the desires and recommendations of Secretary McCulloch are concerned. Should the Secretary advise new funding loans, a sharp decline in all classes of Government securities may be expected; should he abstain from any recommendation on the subject, the inference will be that Philadelphia influence has carried the day, and a gradual recovery in prices may be anticipated.

Trade with the South continues unusually active, and the number of steamers plying between Northern and Southern ports is steadily on the increase. It is now much larger than it ever was before the war. Notwithstanding all that is said in newspapers and at public meetings about the poverty of the South and the necessity of Northern relief societies, it is a fact that the South is now consuming and paying for more Northern goods than it ever took in the old palmy days of slavery; that stores in Richmond, Augusta, and New Orleans command higher rents than they ever did before the war; and that skilled labor of all kinds commands higher wages at the South than were ever before known in this country. Whoever has been impoverished by the war, the Southern country, as a whole, seems anything but poor. All who desire work can obtain it, at handsome wages, and goods of all kinds, except perhaps the more expensive classes of luxuries, command a ready sale for cash at all, or nearly all, the central Southern cities. An effort will be made at the coming session of Congress to obtain authority for the issue of $200,000,000 more national currency for the especial use of the South. Its fate will depend in great measure upon the admittance of the Southern delegations to Congress. If they are excluded, the opponents of further paper issues will probably succeed in defeating the scheme. If they are admitted, it is expected that they will make such representations as will ensure the requisite legislation.

Two important legal decisions were rendered last week. One was rendered by Chief-Justice Chase in the United States Circuit Court at Baltimore, Md., in the case of Jackson vs. The Northern Central R.R. Company. Jackson, a British subject, and a resident of Ireland, held coupon bonds of the railroad company, and demanded the full amount of his coupons, while the company claimed the right, under the Internal Revenue Act, to deduct from the amount five per cent. to be paid the United States Government. The Court decided in favor of Jackson, and ruled that foreigners were entitled to the full amount of their coupons without deduction for income tax. The inference is, of course, that foreign bondholders will receive a larger income from American investments than native bondholders, and the effect will be that many foreign houses in this and other seaboard cities will transfer the bonds they hold to their foreign correspondents. The other case, which was tried before Justice Garvin in the Superior Court of this city, was the famous Napoleon Oil case, in which a party who had been "cornered" in that stock claimed damages of the party who had "cornered" him, on the ground that the "corner" was a swindle. The court charged and the jury found for the plaintiff, who got a verdict for the whole amount claimed. The effect of this will be to render Wall Street speculators more careful how they organize "corners" in stocks. It is likely to give rise to a plentiful crop of lawsuits, as under the ruling of Justice Garvin it seems likely that the parties who were so severely bled in Harlem and Prairie du Chien might even now recover damages from the parties who bled them.

The party of British capitalists who, under the lead of Sir Morton Peto, created such a sensation in this country a month ago, have arrived safely at home, and write to say that, in England, a new and lively interest is being taken in American securities. It is not unlikely that considerable parcels of our favorite railway stocks and bonds may go abroad during the ensuing season. There is always a large amount of capital in London seeking investment, and, at the present time, no securities in the London market offer such advantages in point of safety and income as our 5-20 bonds (which the English would not buy at 40) and our better class of railway bonds and stocks. It is, perhaps, to be regretted that the Atlantic and Great Western bonds should occupy so prominent a place in the London list of American securities. The Atlantic and Great Western Railway is a fine road, broad gauge, opening up the oil country, and connecting Cincinnati with New York by a new and short route. But, among our older railway men, the concern has always been received with something like distrust. Like a young man starting in the world, it has its fortune to make, and it seems unlikely that it will escape the crisis through which all or nearly all our railway enterprises have had to pass before they reached a safe and lucrative condition. It has already had some troubles. Not many months since, it could not pay for certain rolling stock ordered in a flush of confidence by Mr. McHenry's friends, and the property was sold to the Erie Company at a considerable sacrifice. When Sir Morton Peto, before his departure hence, attempted to coerce the Erie Company by threats of hostile connections, he was smilingly reminded of the circumstance, and the prediction was made by a shrewd though unpolished manager of the Erie that if "them Englishmen" pursued the course they were taking, the Erie would own the Atlantic and Great Western for one-half its cost in less than three years. Sir Morton is a man of sense, and he probably treasured up the prediction. It will be a pity if our English friends who are disposed to invest their money in this country should regard the Atlantic and Great Western —a new road, running through a new country, built under very peculiar circumstances, and never well considered in financial circles in this country—as the type of American railway enterprises.

FISK & HATCH,

BANKERS,

AND DEALERS IN

GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,

AND

AGENTS FOR THE SALE OF

THE 7.30 POPULAR LOAN,

5 NASSAU STREET,

(Continental Bank Building, near Wall Street).

DEPOSITS RECEIVED, COLLECTIONS MADE.

ALL KINDS OF UNITED STATES

AND OTHER POPULAR

FIRST CLASS SECURITIES

BOUGHT AND SOLD AT MARKET RATES.

WHAT WISE MEN SAY OF

LIFE INSURANCE.

In my opinion, and judging from my own experience, annuities secured for a family are of important service to relieve the mind of the father of a helpless family from a corroding anxiety on their account. It has been for many years a comfort to me that my family will have the benefit of annuities at my decease; and though, on account of my protracted life, the fund will be a great gainer by me, yet I do not regret that, as the gain belongs to a benevolent institution.—Rev. Dr. Archibald Alexander.

Life Assurance may be employed advantageously for the benefit of families and of individuals of all classes of society, as well for those in affluence as for those in moderate circumstances. All may, by the exertion of a little forethought and a small outlay, protect their families from want, independently of any charitable aid.—Rt. Rev. Bishop Potter, of Pa.

The relief from anxiety afforded by Life Assurance very frequently contributes to prolong the life of the assured, while it materially augments the comfort and well-being of those dependent on him. It has also an obvious tendency to strengthen habits of accumulation.—M'Culloch's Commercial Dictionary.

A policy of Life Assurance is the cheapest and safest mode of making a certain provision for one's family. It is time our people understood and practiced more generally Life Assurance. Many a widow and orphan has had great reason to be grateful that the advantage of Life Assurance was understood and embraced by the husband and father.—Dr. Franklin, in 1769.

It is unquestionably the duty of every man to provide, while he yet lives, for his own. We would say that it is not less his duty to provide, as far as he can, against their being left penniless in the event of his death. Indeed, between these two duties there is no general distinction; for Life Assurance makes the one as much a matter current expenditure as the other.—Chambers's Edinburgh Journal.

THE UNION MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

Has paid more than

ONE MILLION OF DOLLARS

To Widows and Orphans.

NEW YORK OFFICE, 151 BROADWAY.

J. W. & H. JUDD, GENERAL AGENTS.

HOME

INSURANCE COMPANY

OF NEW YORK,

OFFICE, 135 BROADWAY.

Cash Capital, - - - - - - -	$2,000,000 00
Assets, 1st Jan., 1865, - - - -	3,765,503 42
Liabilities, - - - - - - - -	77,901 52

FIRE, MARINE, and INLAND

INSURANCE.

Agencies at all important points throughout the United States.

CHAS. J. MARTIN, PRESIDENT.

A. F. WILMARTH, VICE-PRESIDENT.

JOHN McGEE, Secretary.

J. H. WASHBURN, Assistant Secretary.

W. C. NICOLL, Superintendent Marine Department.

COAL.

COAL DELIVERED AT COST.

GLOBE MUTUAL COAL COMPANY.

COAL AT ACTUAL COST TO SHAREHOLDERS.

Shares, $10.

Which entitles the party to ONE TON of Coal per year, at the actual cost, for every share subscribed.

See Prospectus of the Company.

OFFICES:

GLOBE BUILDINGS, 64 BROADWAY AND 19 NEW ST., NEAR WALL.

LET THE PEOPLE SAY WITH ONE VOICE, DOWN WITH THE PRICE OF COAL!

BROWN, BROTHERS & CO.,

56 WALL STREET,

Issue, in New York, Circular Credits for Travellers, available in any part of the world

Marine and Fire Insurance.

METROPOLITAN INSURANCE COMPANY,
108 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Cash Capital, - - - - - - - - - - - $1,000,000
Surplus, over - - - - - - - - - - - - 400,000

This Company insures at customary rates of premium against ALL MARINE AND NLAND NAVIGATION RISKS on CARGO or FREIGHT; also, against LOSS or DAMAGE by FIRE.

If Premiums are Paid in Gold, Losses will be Paid in Gold.

The Assured receive 75 per cent. of the net profits without incurring any liability, or in lieu thereof, at their option, a liberal discount upon the premium.

All losses equitably adjusted and promptly paid.

SCRIP DIVIDEND, declared Jan. 10, 1865, FIFTY per cent.

JAMES LORIMER GRAHAM, President.
ROBERT M. C. GRAHAM, Vice-President.
EDWARD A. STANSBURY, 2d Vice-President.
JOHN C. GOODRIDGE, Secretary.

FOURTH NATIONAL BANK,
27 & 29 Pine St., New York,

Has for sale U. S. 7 3-10 Notes, all sizes; also, One Year Certificates and all other Government Loans.

P. C. CALHOUN, President.
B. SEAMAN, Cashier.
Anthony Lane, Asst. Cashier.

NIAGARA FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY,
OFFICE, 12 WALL STREET.

Cash Capital increased to - - - - - - - $1,000,000
Surplus, Jan. 1, 1865, - - - - - - - - 275,253

Losses equitably adjusted and promptly paid.
Chartered 1850.
Cash Dividends paid in fourteen years, 248 per cent.

P. NOTMAN, Secretary. JONATHAN D. STEELE, President.

PHENIX INSURANCE COMPANY,
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
OFFICES, 1 COURT STREET, BROOKLYN, N. Y.
" 139 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Cash Capital - - - - - - - - - - - $1,000,000 00
Assets - - - - - - - - - - - - 1,500,000 00

Insurance against Loss by Fire, Marine, Lake, Canal, and Inland Transportation.

STEPHEN CROWELL, President. EDGAR W. CROWELL, Vice-President.
PHILANDER SHAW, Secretary.

HOFFMAN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.
Office, 161 Broadway, New York.

Cash Capital, - - - - - - - - - - - $200,000

WILLIAM B. DIXON, President.
JOSEPH W WILDEY, Secretary.

THE
MORRIS FIRE AND INLAND INSURANCE COMPANY,
COLUMBIAN BUILDING, 1 NASSAU STREET.
JUNE 1, 1865.

AUTHORIZED CAPITAL, $5,000,000.
CASH CAPITAL, paid in, and SURPLUS, $885,040 57.

POLICIES OF INSURANCE AGAINST LOSS OR DAMAGE BY FIRE
Issued on the most Favorable Terms.

B. C. MORRIS, President.
WM. M. WHITNEY, Secretary.

E. W CLARK & CO.,
BANKERS AND BROKERS,
35 SOUTH THIRD STREET, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS AND TREASURY NOTES, CERTIFICATES OF INDEBTEDNESS, QUARTERMASTERS' VOUCHERS, COMPOUND INTEREST NOTES.

STOCKS and BONDS of all kinds BOUGHT and SOLD on COMMISSION.

BAIRD & BRADLEY,
CHICAGO
LOAN AND COLLECTION AGENCY.

Investments for a term of years made for Eastern Capitalists. Corporations and Estates amply secured by First Mortgage on Real Estate in Chicago and vicinity, with semi-annual interest payable at any point East.

Real Estate purchased, managed, and sold for Eastern parties.

Notes collected and avails promptly remitted.

The National Park Bank of New York.

CAPITAL - - - - $2,000,000. | SURPLUS - - - - $1,200,000.

This Bank will issue Certificates of Deposit, bearing interest, on favorable terms.

New York, Aug. 21, 1865. J. L. WORTH, Cashier.

Insurance Scrip.

WILLIAM C. GILMAN,
46 Pine Street, New York,
BUYS AND SELLS INSURANCE SCRIP.

The Nation:

A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

This journal will not be the organ of any party, sect, or body. It will, on the contrary, make an earnest effort to bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit, and to wage war upon the vices of violence, exaggeration, and misrepresentation by which so much of the political writing of the day is marred.

The criticism of books and works of art will form one of its most prominent features; and pains will be taken to have this task performed in every case by writers possessing special qualifications for it.

A special correspondent, who has been selected for his work with care, is pursuing a journey through the South. His letters appear every week, and he is charged with the duty of simply reporting what he sees and hears, leaving the public as far as possible to draw its own inferences.

It embraces among its regular or occasional contributors the following names:

Henry W. Longfellow,
James Russell Lowell,
John G. Whittier,
Samuel Eliot (Ex-President Trin. College, Hartford),
Professor Torrey (Harvard),
Dr. Francis Lieber,
Professor Goldwin Smith (Oxford),
Professor Child (Harvard),
Henry James,
Charles E. Norton,
Judge Bond (Baltimore),
Edmund Quincy,
Professor W. D. Whitney (Yale),
Professor D. C. Gilman (Yale),
Judge Daly,
Professor Dwight (Columbia College),

Professor Tayler Lewis (Schenectady),
N. Tourgueneff,
Auguste Laugel,
Judge Wayland,
Frederick Law Olmsted,
Rev. Dr. McClintock,
Rev. Dr. Jos. P. Thompson,
Rev. Phillips Brooks,
Rev. Dr. Bellows,
C. J. Stillé,
Henry T. Tuckerman,
Bayard Taylor,
C. A. Bristed,
C. L. Brace,
William Lloyd Garrison,
Sydney George Fisher,
Theodore Tilton,
James Parton,
Gail Hamilton.

Terms:—Six Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Four Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, Publisher,
130 Nassau street, N. Y.

Pacific Mail Steamship Company's

THROUGH LINE

TO CALIFORNIA,

TOUCHING AT MEXICAN PORTS,

AND CARRYING THE U. S. MAIL,

Leave Pier No. 42 North River, foot of Canal Street, at 12 o'clock noon, on the 1st, 11th, and 21st of every month, (except when those dates fall on Sunday, and then on the preceding Saturday) for ASPINWALL, connecting, via Panama Railroad, with one of the Company's steamships from Panama for SAN FRANCISCO, touching at ACAPULCO.

DECEMBER.

1st.—HENRY CHAUNCEY, Captain Gray, connecting with CONSTITUTION, Captain Farnsworth.

11th.—ATLANTIC, Captain Maury, connecting with GOLDEN CITY, Captain Bradbury.

21st.—NEW YORK, Captain Horner, connecting with COLORADO, Captain Watkins.

Departures of 1st and 21st connect at Panama with steamers for SOUTH PACIFIC PORTS. Those of 1st touch at MANZANILLO.

Through Passage Rates, in Currency.

	First Cabin,	Second Cabin,	Steerage,
On Steamers....	$325.	$225.	$100.

Panama Railroad ticket invariably $25 additional, in currency.

A discount of One-Fifth from steamers' rates allowed to second-cabin and steerage passengers with families.

One Hundred Pounds Baggage allowed each adult. Baggage-masters accompany baggage through, and attend to ladies and children without male protectors. Baggage received on the dock the day before sailing, from steamboats, railroads, and passengers, who prefer to send down early.

An experienced Surgeon on Board. Medicines and attendance free.

A steamer will be placed on the line January 1, 1866, to run from NEW ORLEANS to ASPINWALL, via HAVANA.

For Passage tickets or further information apply at the Company's ticket office, on the wharf foot of Canal Street, North River.

F. W. G. BELLOWS, Agent.

AMERICAN WATCHES.

J. H. JOHNSTON & CO., 150 BOWERY, N. Y., sell at lowest rates

American Gold and Silver Watches,
English Lever Watches,
Fine Swiss Watches.

The handsomest Detached Lever Watch in the market for $25.

PURE GOLD WEDDING RINGS.

Fine Jewelry, diamonds, silver ware, and best quality silver-plated ware of our own manufacture.
Articles sent free of expense to all parts of the country, and satisfaction guaranteed.

BOYNTON'S FURNACES.

Boynton's Brick and Portable Furnaces, Fire-place and Parlor Heaters, Kitcheners, Ranges, Parlor and Office Stoves, are warranted to give satisfaction. Send for circular.

RICHARDSON, BOYNTON & CO.,
234 Water Street, near Beekman, New York.

VANDERLIP & TAYLOR,

LATE

A. RANKIN & CO.,

96 Bowery,
165 Fifth Av.,
and 939 Broadway,
cor. Twenty-second St.

A GREAT ASSORTMENT OF SILK,

MERINO, AND WOOLEN

UNDER-GARMENTS,

FOR FALL AND WINTER.

Gloves of all kinds,

Ties,

Scarfs,

Cardigan Jackets, etc.

DRESS SHIRTS MADE TO ORDER.

Established 1823.

WILLIAM SELLERS & CO.,

1,600 HAMILTON STREET, PHILADELPHIA,

MACHINISTS', FOUNDERS', SMITHS' and BOILER-MAKERS' TOOLS.

SHAFTING, with Ball and Socket Bearings and Double Cone Vice-Couplings, admitting of the easiest possible adjustment.

A complete assortment of PULLEY and WHEEL PATTERNS, from which Castings or finished work will be furnished.

RAILWAY EQUIPMENTS, TURNING and TRANSFE TABLES, and PIVOT BRIDGES.

Sole Manufacturers and Licensees of GIFFARD'S INJECTOR, For Feeding Boilers.

WILLIAM SELLERS. JOHN SELLERS, JR.

MAKE YOUR OWN SOAP WITH

B. T. BABBITT'S

Pure Concentrated Potash,

OR READY SOAP-MAKER.

Warranted double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other saponifier or lye in the market. Put up in cans of one pound, two pounds, three pounds, six pounds, and twelve pounds, with full directions in English and German for making Hard and Soft Soap. One pound will make fifteen gallons of Soft Soap. No lime is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest Potash in market.

B. T. BABBITT,

64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington st., N. Y.

DEMULCENT SOAP,

FOR CHAPPED AND TENDER HANDS,

FOR TOILET AND BATH USE.

MANUFACTURED ONLY BY

J. C. HULL'S SON,

32 PARK ROW, N. Y.

Upwards of 100 styles of Toilet and Staple Soaps. For sale by all Dealers.

ONE PRICE ONLY.

Writing Paper cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Envelopes cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Blank Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Memorandum Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street
Pens and Pencils cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Pocket-Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Portfolios cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Cash Boxes cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Stationers' Tinware cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Account Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Black, Blue, and Red Ink cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau St.
Arnold & Boss's Fluid cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau St.
Scrap Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.

KEYS'

AMERICAN UNION WRITING FLUID, AND COPYING INKS.

THE CHEAPEST AND THE BEST.

Always clean, and flowing freely from the pen, these inks are rapidly taking the place of all others, and merit the special attention of the penman.
On trial they will be found superior in every respect to the imported inks now in use.

REEVES & CO.,
(Successors to J. G. Keys,)
MANUFACTURERS AND SOLE PROPRIETORS,
303 Washington Street (near Reade), N. Y.

MARVIN'S

PATENT FIRE AND BURGLAR SAFE.

Superior to any others in the following particulars
They are more fire-proof.
They are more burglar-proof.
They are perfectly dry.
They do not lose their fire-proof qualities by age.
Manufactured only by

MARVIN & CO., 265 Broadway.
721 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

Send for a descriptive Circular.

PHELPS, DODGE & CO.,

Importers and Dealers in

TIN-PLATE, SHEET-IRON, COPPER, BLOCK-TIN, WIRE, AND METALS GENERALLY;

Manufacturers of

COPPER, BRASS, and WIRE,

19 and 21 Cliff st., New York.

Economical Housekeepers Use

Pyle's Saleratus. | Pyle's O. K. Soap.
Pyle's Cream Tartar. | Pyle's Blueing Powder.

Articles designed for all who want the best goods, full weight. Sold by best Grocers everywhere. Each package bears the name of James Pyle, Manufacturer, New York.

WILLIAM KNABE & CO.'S

GRAND, Celebrated Gold Medal SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT

PIANOS.

These instruments have been for thirty years before the public, in competition with other instruments of first-class makers. They have, throughout that long period, maintained their reputation among the profession and the public as being unsurpassed in every quality found in a first-class Piano.

650 BROADWAY,

AND

CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE, CHICAGO, ILL.

J. BAUER & CO., Agents.

SPECIAL GOLD MEDAL.

(From Watson's Weekly Art Journal.)

AWARDS TO MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—A Gold Medal was awarded, at the late Fair of the American Institute, to CARHART, NEEDHAM & CO., for the best Reed Instrument on exhibition—a most just testimonial.

"They are an exceedingly good substitute for an Organ, and I can speak of them in the highest terms."
GEO. W. MORGAN.

"I have found them to be the finest Instruments of the class I ever saw." GEO. F. BRISTOW.

"They are entitled to be ranked as the first and best among instruments of their class." WM. A. KING.

"The tone is incomparable, and they are far in advance of any other instrument of a similar kind."
CHARLES FRADEL.

THE PARLOR ORGAN,

with the recent improvements of Mr. J Carhart, is, without exception, far superior in QUALITY, POWER, SWEETNESS, VARIETY and EXPRESSION OF TONE. DURABILITY OF CONSTRUCTION, ELEGANCE OF CASE—POSSESSING IMPROVEMENTS APPLIED BY US ONLY.

A Descriptive Catalogue and Price List sent by mail.

CARHART, NEEDHAM & CO.,
97 East Twenty-third St., New York.

PIANOS.

RAVEN & BACON'S PIANO-FORTES.

(ESTABLISHED 1829.)

A full assortment of these Instruments, which have been well known in the New York market for more than thirty years, constantly on hand. We are continually adding improvements to our Pianos, and our facilities enable us to furnish them at terms and prices satisfactory to purchasers. Pictorial circulars sent by mail.

Wareroom, 135 Grand St., near Broadway, New York.

The Horace Waters

Grand, Square, and Upright PIANOS, MELODEONS, HARMONIUMS, and CABINET ORGANS. Wholesale and retail, at reduced prices. To let, and rent allowed if purchased. Monthly payments received for the same. Second-hand Pianos at bargains, prices $60, $75, $100, $125, $150, $175, $200, and $225. Factory and Warerooms, 481 Broadway. Cash paid for second-hand Pianos.

GROVER & BAKER'S

SEWING MACHINES

WERE AWARDED THE HIGHEST PREMIUMS
At the State Fairs of

New York,	Illinois,	Virginia,
New Jersey,	Michigan,	N. Carolina,
Vermont,	Wisconsin,	Tennessee,
Pennsylvania,	Iowa,	Alabama,
Ohio,	Kentucky,	Oregon,
Indiana,	Missouri,	California,

And at numerous Institute and County Fairs, including all the Fairs at which they were exhibited the past three years.

The GROVER & BAKER ELASTIC-STITCH SEWING MACHINE is superior to all others, for the following reasons:

1. The seam is stronger and more elastic than any other.

2. It is more easily managed, and is capable of doing a greater variety and range of work than any other.

3. It is capable of doing all the varieties of sewing done by other machines, and, in addition, executes beautiful embroidery and ornamental work.

GROVER & BAKER S. M. CO.,
495 Broadway, New York.

ESTABLISHED IN 1823.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT PIANOS.

At the Great Mechanics' Fair, held in Boston in October, 1865, Messrs. CHICKERING & SONS were awarded

THE FIRST GOLD MEDAL

For the BEST GRAND PIANOS.

The FIRST SILVER MEDAL
For the BEST SQUARE PIANOS.

The FIRST SILVER MEDAL
For the BEST UPRIGHT PIANOS.

This Fair called forth an UNUSUAL COMPETITION—35 Pianos being represented. The report of the judges is very thorough and very decided on the merits of the CHICKERING PIANO.

THE MICHIGAN STATE FAIR, of 1865, awards Chickering & Sons THREE FIRST PRIZES.

THE INDIANA STATE FAIR, of 1865, awards Chickering & Sons THREE FIRST PRIZES.

THE IOWA STATE FAIR, of 1865, awards Chickering & Sons TWO FIRST PRIZES.

THE WISCONSIN STATE FAIR, of 1865, awards Chickering & Sons TWO FIRST PRIZES.

FOURTEEN FIRST-CLASS GOLD AND SILVER MEDALS IN THE MONTHS OF SEPTEMBER AND OCTOBER, 1865.

Making a total of FIFTY-FIVE PRIZE MEDALS awarded to CHICKERING & SONS, as

FIRST PREMIUMS OVER ALL COMPETITION for the SUPERIORITY OF THEIR PIANOS.

OPINIONS OF EMINENT ARTISTS.

THALBERG.

"I consider Chickering & Sons' Pianos, beyond comparison, the best I have ever seen in America."

GOTTSCHALK.

"I consider Chickering & Sons' Pianos superior to any in the world."

WEHLI.

"I believe that, in every particular, your Pianos are superior to any I have ever seen in this country or in Europe."

SATTER.

"For volume and fine quality of tone, with nicety of articulation, the Chickering Pianos are unequalled."

BASSINI.

"I always use and always recommend your Pianos to my pupils and friends."

MUZIO.

"I consider your Pianos the finest I have ever played upon."

Watson's Art Journal, of November 11, in its criticism of Mme. Abel's concert, says: "Madame Abel performed on the new Chickering Grand, which took the Gold Medal at the Fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanics' Association, held at Boston last month.

"IT IS THE NOBLEST INSTRUMENT WE EVER HEARD IN A CONCERT-ROOM.

"Grand in power, without noise; capable of sustaining any amount of forcing, without losing the rich purity of its tones; clear, bright, and beautiful throughout the entire range, every tone is a pearl of sound, sympathetic and vocal as the finest human voice cultivated to the highest point of perfection."

AGRAFFE BRIDGE.

Pianos with or without the Agraffe Bridge, which we have constantly used for the past twelve years.

WAREROOMS.

652 BROADWAY, N. Y.
246 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.
914 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

Clothing for Fall and Winter.

OVERCOATS
OF
MOSCOW, CHINCHILLE, ESKIMO, and CASTOR BEAVERS.

BUSINESS AND WALKING SUITS FOR MEN.

DRESS AND SCHOOL SUITS FOR BOYS,
VERY SUPERIOR IN EVERY RESPECT,
and
LOW IN PRICE.

DEVLIN & CO.,

BROADWAY, COR. GRAND STREET,
BROADWAY, COR. WARREN STREET, N. Y.

THE BEST SEWING-MACHINES IN THE WORLD.

THE WEED MACHINES,

With all their valuable improvements, entirely overcome all imperfections. They are superior to all others for family and manufacturing purposes, simple in construction, durable in all their parts, and readily understood. They have certainty of stitch on all kinds of fabrics, and are adapted to a wide range of work without change or adjustment, using all kinds of thread. Will hem, fell, bind, gather, braid, tuck, quilt, cord, and, in fact, do all kinds of work required by families or manufacturers. We invite all persons in search of an instrument to execute any kind of sewing now done by machinery to inspect them, and recommend all parties engaging in the sale of sewing-machines to make sure they secure the best by examining the WEED before purchasing. They make the shuttle-stitch, which cannot be excelled for firmness, elasticity, durability, and elegance of finish. They have received the highest premiums in every instance where they have been exhibited in competition with other standard machines. The company being duly licensed, the machines are protected against infringements or litigation.

Reliable agents wanted, to whom we offer great inducements. Every explanation will be cheerfully given to all, whether they wish to purchase or not. Descriptive circulars, together with specimens of their work, will be furnished to all who desire them by mail or otherwise.

WEED SEWING-MACHINE CO.,
STORE, 506 BROADWAY, N. Y.

FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE CO.,

505 BROADWAY, N. Y.

THE BEST FAMILY MACHINE IN THE WORLD.

Wonderful REVERSIBLE FEED MOTION. SELF-ADJUSTING Tension. No Snarling and Breaking Threads. FOUR distinct Stitches.

WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES,

625 BROADWAY, N. Y.,

MAKE THE

LOCK-STITCH,

and rank highest on account of the elasticity, permanence, beauty, and general desirableness of the stitching, when done, and the wide range of its application.—Report of American Institute.

FINKLE & LYON'S

IMPROVED

LOCK-STITCH SEWING-MACHINE.

N. B.—Money refunded if the Machine is not preferred to any in market for family use.

AGENTS WANTED. 538 Broadway, N. Y.

Lock-Stitch Sewing Machines

FOR FAMILIES AND MANUFACTURERS.

THE HOWE MACHINE COMPANY,

ELIAS HOWE, Jr., Pres.,

629 BROADWAY.

Agents wanted.

SCHOOL FURNITURE!

Lecture-Room and Sabbath-School Settees

IN EVERY STYLE,

MANUFACTURED BY

ROBERT PATON,

24 GROVE STREET, NEW YORK.

UNIVERSAL CLOTHES WRINGER,

WITH COG-WHEELS.

The World's Fair in London, the Mechanics' Institute, and Eleven State Fairs have decided that that U. C. W. is THE BEST.

We also WARRANT IT THE BEST and most durable Wringer made. Over 200,000 have been sold, and each family can testify to its superior merits.

"It saves its cost in clothing every year."—ORANGE JUDD.

"One of the most useful articles in my house."—MRS. HENRY WARD BEECHER.

"I heartily commend it."—REV. DR. BELLOWS.

Call or send for illustrated circular, with testimonials, retail prices, and terms to salesmen.

Money can be made rapidly selling them in every town.

R. C. BROWNING, GENERAL AGENT,
347 Broadway, New York.

DECORATED DINNER SETS.

A large variety now opening at

OVINGTON BROTHERS',
Fulton St., near Clark St., Brooklyn.

JOHN V. FARWELL & CO.,

WHOLESALE

DRY GOODS AND NOTIONS,

42, 44 & 46 WABASH AVENUE,

CHICAGO,

AND NO. 5 COLLEGE PLACE, NEW YORK.

SILVER PLATED

TEA SETS, URNS, TABLE CASTERS, WINE CASTERS, etc., etc., of our own make.

OVINGTON BROTHERS,
Fulton St., near Clark St., Brooklyn.

Improvements in Piano-fortes.

One of the simplest and most truly valuable improvements yet made in the Piano-forte is that invented and patented by Mr. David Decker, of the firm of

DECKER BROTHERS, 91 BLEECKER STREET,

in this city. By correcting the only imperfections arising from the use of the full iron-plate, and that, too, by not detracting in the slightest degree from its many positive advantages, the Messrs. DECKER have developed in their instruments a tone at once admirable for its purity, fulness, prolongation, and sweetness, and the high estimation in which their improvement is held is well shown in the rapidly increasing business of their firm.—Tribune.

MANTEL ORNAMENTS.

CHINA VASES, UNIQUE STYLES and VERY RICH. BISQUE and PARIAN STATUETTES and GROUPS. FINE BRONZE, etc., etc.

OVINGTON BROTHERS,
Fulton St., near Clark St., Brooklyn.

FRANCIS & LOUTREL,

45 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK,

STATIONERS, STEAM PRINTERS,

AND

BLANK-BOOK MANUFACTURERS,

Supply everything in their line at lowest prices. Every kind of Writing Paper, Account Books, Fancy and Staple Stationery, Diaries for 1866, Expense Books, etc. Orders solicited.

OAKLEY & MASON,

PUBLISHERS, BOOKSELLERS, STATIONERS,

AND BLANK BOOK MANUFACTURERS,

21 MURRAY STREET,

OLD STAND OF PRATT, OAKLEY & CO.,

Between Broadway and Church Street, New York.

FRENCH CLOCKS.

A splendid assortment in MARBLE and BRONZE. BRONZE STATUETTES, etc., etc.

OVINGTON BROTHERS,
Fulton St., near Clark St., Brooklyn.

SPLENDID PREMIUMS!

PIANOS, MELODEONS, SEWING MACHINES, LIBRARIES, etc., GIVEN to parties getting up Clubs for THE ILLUSTRATED PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL for 1866. See December No., 20 cents, or send stamp for particulars, to FOWLER & WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

NEW YORK

LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY,

112 AND 114 BROADWAY.

This is one of the oldest institutions of the kind in America, having been chartered in 1841, and commenced business in May, 1845.

EVERY ONE SHOULD ENSURE.

While we live we may protect those dependent upon us; but when death severs the tie of all others most dear, it is a consolation to know that our prudence and foresight have made provision for the wants to which we can no longer minister; and the man who has the power, and neglects the opportunity, of providing in this way for the comfort and independence of his family, fails in the duty which he owes to them and himself. Therefore let every one who has not obtained a policy of Insurance upon his life no longer neglect this imperative duty. GREAT CARE SHOULD BE MANIFESTED IN THE SELECTION OF A COMPANY. The

NEW YORK LIFE INSURANCE CO.

Offers the following highly important essentials:

It is a strictly Mutual Company;
It has had Twenty Years' Business Experience;
It has large Accumulated Assets;
It gives Liberal Assistance in the Payment of Premiums;
Its Dividends are declared Annually;
It is prompt in the Payment of all Losses.

IN FACT,

Special care in the selection of its risks, strict economy, and a safe and judicious investment of its funds, emphatically characterize the management of this Company.

Assets over

$4,500,000.

Annual Dividend, January 1, 1865,

50 PER CENT.

Amount Returned Premiums (Dividends) paid,

$1,700,000.

Amount Claims by Death paid,

3,500,000.

During its existence it has issued

Over 36,000 Policies.

TEN-YEAR NON-FORFEITING POLICIES.

The New York Life Insurance Company originated, and was the first to bring before the public, the Ten-Year Non-forfeiting Plan, which has so fully commended itself to the judgment of thinking men that it has become the most popular mode of assurance, and is rapidly superseding the old method of life-long payment. It has received THE UNQUALIFIED APPROVAL OF THE BEST BUSINESS MEN OF THE LAND, large numbers of whom have taken out Policies under it as an investment.

TEN-YEARS NON-FORFEITING PLAN.

A party ensuring by this table, after the second year, cannot forfeit any part of what has been paid in, and his policy becomes a source of income to him while living.

ANOTHER NEW FEATURE.

TEN-YEARS NON-FORFEITURE ENDOWMENT POLICIES.

A party ensuring by this table the amount is received by the assured himself, upon his attaining a specified age, while full provision is made for death occurring prior thereto. As a sure and profitable investment for one's declining years, they deserve the attention of all. These policies are coming into general request. The New York Life Insurance Company have recently prepared A NEW TABLE, BY WHICH THE PREMIUMS CAN ALL BE PAID IN TEN YEARS AND THE NON-FORFEITURE BENEFIT ALSO SECURED.

POLICIES ISSUED IN ALL THE USUAL FORMS.

MORRIS FRANKLIN, President.
ISAAC C. KENDALL, Vice-Pres't.
WILLIAM H. BEERS, Actuary.

☞ Parties desirous of acting as Agents will please apply personally or by letter.

COOKING AND HEATING BY GAS.

EAGLE GAS COOKING STOVES AND RANGES,

GUARANTEED TO BAKE PERFECTLY.

HEATING STOVES, GUARANTEED TO HEAT ROOMS PERFECTLY.

Also,

KEROSENE OIL COOKING STOVES,

The best in market, have regular SIDE OVENS, and guaranteed to BAKE PERFECTLY, and not to Smoke or Smell.

EAGLE GAS STOVE MFG. CO.,
474 Broadway, N. Y.

☞ Illustrated Catalogues sent free.

DECKER & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS OF PIANO-FORTES,

419 BROOME STREET,

One Block East of Broadway, N. Y.

These Pianos stand unrivalled in regard to their singing quality; volume and purity of tone; sympathetic, elastic, and even touch; and durability of construction, which enables them to remain in tune much longer than ordinary Pianos.

JESSUP & MOORE,

27 NORTH SIXTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
128 WILLIAM STREET, NEW YORK,

PAPER MANUFACTURERS,

Have on hand, or make to order at short notice, all qualities of Book and News Printing Papers at current market prices.

UNITED STATES STEEL PEN WORKS,

FACTORY, CAMDEN, N. J.

R. ESTERBROOK & CO.,

STEEL PEN MANUFACTURERS,

WAREHOUSES, { 403 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia. / 42 JOHN STREET, New York.

Samples and prices on application. Lots made to order of any pattern or stamp required.

CAUTION.

These Pens are of genuine American manufacture, and equal in finish, elasticity, and fineness of point to the best imported. They are, therefore, sure to gain the confidence of the American public. The fac-simile of our signature is sufficient security against foreign imitation.

R. ESTERBROOK & CO.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

OF THE OLD STANDARD QUALITY.

TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Warranted.

or Descriptive Name, and Designating Number.

New Series, Good and Cheap, from No. 700 to No. 761.

TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Birmingham. With Designating Numbers.

For sale by JOSEPH GILLOTT & SONS,
91 John Street, New York.
HENRY OWEN, Sole Agent.

THE BEST PIANO-FORTE.

ONE THAT WILL LAST A LIFETIME.

Seven First Premiums in four weeks; two Gold and one Silver Medals; six State Fairs and the American Institute have decided that WM. B. BRADBURY'S New Scale Piano-Fortes are "THE BEST." They "Excel all others in the Essentials of a Perfect Piano-Forte," viz., in Touch, Tone, Power, and thorough Workmanship.

"They are the best square piano-fortes I have ever played upon."—HARRY SANDERSON.

"They are very superior instruments."—GOTTSCHALK.

"Their superior excellence fully proven."—W. BERGE.

"I admire them in the highest degree."—G. W. MORGAN.

Call or send for a Circular, with Illustrations and Testimonials of the most eminent artists and amateurs.

WM. B. BRADBURY,
425 AND 427 BROOME STREET, NEW YORK.

The Nation.

VOL. I.—NO. 23. THURSDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1865. { Six Dollars per Annum / Single Copies, 15 Cents

CONTENTS.

THE WEEK 705
MINOR TOPICS 708
The Work before Congress 710
National Protection for Whites and Blacks 710
Bismark 711
Prices 713
To the Thirty-Ninth Congress: Poetry 714
CORRESPONDENCE:
"Our Southern Brethren" 714
The Sovereignty of the States 715
Mrs. Gaskell 716
The Unsettled State of Europe 717
Old Friends with New Faces 719
LITERATURE:
Literary Notes 719
The Hessians of the Revolution 721
Buchanan's Testament 723
Outcroppings 724
Magazines for December 724
FINE ARTS:
The Exhibition of Pictures by European Artists 726
Music.—"L'Africaine" 727
FINANCIAL REVIEW 731

Six Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Four Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, PUBLISHER, 130 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

The Week.

THE habeas corpus has been restored by Presidential proclamation in all the Northern States. The power which the suspension of the writ placed in the hands of the President has, considering the state of the country, been exercised with wonderfully little abuse. But it is impossible to deny that the precedent set may some time prove a dangerous one. For the first time in the history of constitutional governments the Executive has not only been armed with the power of making arbitrary arrests, but of deciding for what length of time it may exercise it. The constitutionality of the practice has, we believe, been placed beyond question, but its expediency is another matter.

WE had hoped that the recent meeting in Brooklyn, under the joint auspices of the American Freedmen's Aid Commission, the American Union Commission, and the American Missionary Association, was the sign of a popular movement toward concentrating the efforts of the benevolent in behalf of the freed people. This most desirable consummation seems in danger of being delayed, if not rendered fruitless, by new organizations not tributary to the union, and resting on a purely sectarian basis. Such is that which owes its origin to the late Episcopal Convention at Philadelphia. It is obvious that if the Episcopalians are not content with the numerous societies already in existence, the Baptists, Methodists, and other denominations will feel constrained to make an exhibition of their interest in so eminently Christian a cause, and likewise to create boards, appoint superintendents, and send out teachers to the South. Such a contagion, however respectable the motive in each case, would be still deplorable. The union, formed with so much difficulty, and only by the most generous concessions and accommodation, would be shorn of its support and perhaps find its power and utility crippled beyond repair. We sincerely trust the example we have cited will not be followed, and that it may even be abandoned in view of the probable mischief which will ensue.

THE manner in which the insurrection in Jamaica has been suppressed will, if not promptly disowned by the English Government, and, in fact, whether or no, reflect indelible disgrace on the English name. If anybody wants to know how thoroughly pagan an "officer and gentleman" can still be in our day, he has only to read the report of Colonel Hole, of the Sixth Royals, telling of his having hunted down rebels with a boy tied by the neck to his stirrup, and constantly threatened with a revolver, acting as guide, and pointing out the persons to be hanged. The colonel and his coadjutors seem, in fact, to have hanged nearly everybody they caught, and upon the vaguest suspicion. One man was hanged because, after receiving forty-seven lashes, "he ground his teeth, and cast a ferocious look of defiance on the provost-marshal," which the London Spectator truly characterizes as "a worse crime in the sight of God than that of the rebels themselves." Certainly the ferocity of a civilized and educated Englishman or American must, on any theory of accountability, be a sin of infinitely deeper dye than any which a poor benighted and degraded black is capable of committing. There could not, in our opinion, be a more striking proof of the really small impression as yet made upon the world by Christian principles than the remorseless cruelty into which men of English breed invariably plunge whenever they are brought into collision with what is called an "inferior race." The history of the suppression of the Indian mutiny, and of this Jamaica insurrection, will always remain a most shocking revelation of the amount of downright heathenism which still pervades the character of the race which of all others is loudest in its professions of Christianity, and foremost in its offers of instruction in Christian duty to the rest of mankind. The London Times, with characteristic brutality and absurdity, defends the atrocities of the troops on the ground that the pursuit of the rebels was difficult, as if an officer only needs to have a small force, and to have lost a good deal of sleep, to be exempt from the ordinary laws of humanity; or, in other words, as if the weaker one is, the more like a tiger he may behave. And what twaddle there is written both here and in England about the incurable ferocity of the negroes, apropos of this outbreak, as if St. Bartholomew, or the Sepoy massacres, or the massacres of the French Revolution, had never been heard of, or were not the work of Caucasians. It is bad enough that the negro should convert civilized men into Malays, but it is too bad that he should bemuddle their brains every time they begin to argue about him.

GOVERNOR HUMPHREYS, of Mississippi, was, when elected, General Humphreys of the defunct Confederate army, an unrepentant recusant and rebel. President Johnson pardoned him for the purpose of qualifying him for office. He is now in office, and, by way of proving what a "worthy object" he is, has just sent a message to the Mississippi Legislature, in which he declares that negro emancipation has been "accomplished under pressure of Federal bayonets, urged on by the misdirected sympathies of the world." Of the Freedmen's Bureau, he says that "four years of cruel war, conducted upon principles of vandalism disgraceful to the civilization of the age, was scarcely more blighting and destructive to the homes of the white man, and impoverishing and degrading to the negro, than has resulted in the last six or eight months from the administration of this black incubus." Further on he speaks of it as "a hideous curse, permitted by heaven to rule and ruin our unhappy people," and recommends the passage of a law admitting negroes to testify, as the best means of securing the withdrawal of the Federal troops. He must be a very captious person, indeed, who questions the devotion of such a man as this to the new order of things, or fears to hand the State over to him.

THE Boston Board of Trade voted, last week, that it is of vital importance for the Government to sustain and organize, within the sphere of its legitimate powers, that portion of the laboring classes South which cannot be reached by private capital. Mr. Tobey, who moved the resolutions, considered the Freedmen's Bureau a lawful instrumentality for this end, needing only to have its authority enlarged by Congress. Mr. Atkinson objected to this plan that it left out of sight the paramount necessity of protecting free labor at the South. At present there is no security for the isolated Northern men who undertake to plant in Georgia, Texas, and the other States. On another page will be found some of the testimony on which this statement was based. The fact, to our mind, is incontestable; and so, unhappily, is the soundness of the principle on which Mr. Tobey proceeded, to wit: that the time when specie payments can be resumed depends, in no small measure, on the quantity of cotton to be produced hereafter.

The Hon. Martin F. Conway, in a letter to the Times of this city, presents quite forcibly the claims of the Virginia delegation to immediate admission to their seats in Congress. It cannot be doubted that West Virginia exists constitutionally as a separate State only by the confession that Virginia proper has suffered no lapse like the other rebellious States, but has maintained a loyal, even if an inefficient and merely nominal, government. Common sense repudiates the idea that Eastern Virginia was not as thoroughly devoted to secession as South Carolina; and Gov. Peirpoint's administration within the Federal lines, though serving the purpose of organizing a new free State, was certainly nothing else than a ridiculous fiction. The Virginia that consented to a division which was not less a physical than a social necessity, was a very different Virginia from that which chose the representatives now sought to be foisted upon Congress.

Secretary Seward has advised the North Carolinians to follow the example of the South Carolinians, and to ratify the Constitutional Amendment. Why there should be any hesitation about it in any Southern State it is hard to say, as with a good vagrant law they can have most of what they consider the advantages of slavery with but few of its drawbacks.

General Grant is in Richmond, and has been, it is said, talking Mexico there again. We submit, with great respect, that he has, perhaps, said enough about it. His opinions on it being now well known to the country, would it not be well to leave the agitation of the question to others? It is scarcely fair, considering the extreme difficulty of the whole subject, to increase the pressure on the Government.

In another column will be found two letters from the correspondent from whom we have so often quoted already, bearing testimony to the unbroken fierceness of temper of the white people of the South, their undiminished hatred to the Union and to the blacks. More startling reading it would be difficult just now to meet with, taken in connection with such extraordinary utterances as are to be found in the message of Governor Humphreys, of Mississippi, on which we have already commented. We commend it to the attention of Congress, and to that of all other men who feel as they ought to feel the tremendous importance of the question of Southern reconstruction. We doubt if a question of such awful moment was ever submitted to a deliberative assembly. But every utterance that comes from Mr. Johnson just now proves that he is at last alive to the real nature of the situation, and is determined to do whatever the occasion calls for.

It appears that it was owing to a telegraphic blunder that Schuyler Colfax was made to connect "Across the Continent" with "The Duties of the Next Congress" as a subject for a lecture. He confined himself to the former, but would it not have been as well to say a "Journey across the Continent?" Is not this sort of ellipsis a sensational trick which authors of books of travel have wore out?

About a year and a half ago a colored man was expelled from a street-car in Cincinnati, and his action against the company has just been concluded. The counsel for the defence relied upon a printed regulation by which the plaintiff ought to have been riding on the front platform, instead of inside with his wife, and also upon a pretense that the prejudices of the community deserve to be respected. The judge charged otherwise, and the jury returned damages at eight hundred dollars. The plaintiff, like his wife, is a person of light complexion and the most respectable bearing. He was born a slave, but was emancipated by his father, acquired an excellent reputation in Cincinnati, and at the time he was assaulted had just returned from California with a fortune obtained in business there. No better person could have been selected to expose the stupid and vulgar spirit of caste and to obtain a verdict which condemns it definitively.

Sir Morton Peto addressed a portion of his constituents at a dinner at Bristol, on the 13th ult. He had something to say of home politics, but more of his recent experience in this country. The very flattering picture which he drew of our condition at the close of the late tremendous struggle elicits comments from the London papers. They are inclined to respect his testimony, even though they surmise that the show of wealth and prosperity which astonished him may be lacking in reality. Sir Morton assured his hearers that in all his travels in the States he saw nothing to remind him that there had been a civil war; that the army had been absorbed into the civil ranks with marvellous facility and composure; that the national debt would be honorably discharged; and that no young man about to enter business ought to consider his education complete till he had visited America.

The commissioners appointed in England to investigate the Rinderpest, and report means to check its ravages, were naturally not unanimous in their conclusions. What the majority recommend seems, to the London press at least, even worse than the murrain itself. They would suspend altogether, for a limited time, the cattle traffic in Great Britain. This would prevent any movement of cattle except for immediate slaughter to a market or slaughter-house, from healthy districts, and under license. For the rest, there is so much killing that the butchers themselves might stand aghast. Meanwhile the price of meat rises steadily, and the public maw begins to turn to the sea and the rivers for other food. Pisciculture is gaining new devotees, and regard for the statutes for the preservation of trout and salmon is earnestly invoked.

At Christ Church, Oxford, and Cambridge, the charge for "commons" by the butlers of those institutions is undergoing an exposure, and it is found that these gentlemen know on which side their bread is buttered if the undergraduates do not. They amass a handsome fortune by their exorbitant rates, from which they have ingeniously prevented escape by making the record of the Buttery the only one by which a student's residence is proved! Eightpence a day, at Downing College, is the charge for "a modicum of indifferent bread and butter." If more bread is required, it must be paid for at the rate of eightpence for a loaf which may be got at the shops for threepence.

Tom Sayers was buried at Highgate Cemetery on the 15th of last month, and his body was followed to the tomb by a procession of some 30,000 persons, chiefly, of course, of the very lowest character. At the entrance these disreputable mourners became an unmanageable mob, sweeping away the police, and rioting among the graves in the very spirit of Bedlam. Trees, monuments, and railings were damaged extensively, and the quiet with which the coffin was lowered to its place was the only redeeming feature of an otherwise brutal and disgusting exhibition.

At the exposition of the fine arts applied to industry, in Paris, is a painting by Queen Hortense, the mother of Napoleon III. It represents a horseman on guard; the scene is of moonlight, and the horseman's attitude is the pensive attitude of one who "recalls home and friends from distance and the past." There is said to be no doubt of the authenticity of the piece.

M. Guizot is said to be at present occupied with the second volume of his "Méditations Religieuses."

The Parisian authorities have at length decided that the friends of horseflesh may open a butcher's shop for the selling of this sort of meat, on condition that the butcher shall provide himself with shambles devoted solely to the slaughter of horses. An eminent and experienced butcher, M. Gautier (doubtless an enthusiast in his profession), will preside over the destinies of the experiment. Apropos of which is the letter of Dr. Blatin, published in the Débats, denying that horseflesh is heir to the ills of épizootie now afflicting brute-life in France, and declaring that on the contrary it is so wholesome as to be almost a specific against cholera, the soldiers in the Crimea who ate it habitually having suffered comparatively little from the epidemic.

Le Droit gives the story of one of those deeds which seem purely and properly French crimes. Two worthy laborers had a son of eleven years and a little daughter of eighteen months. They were obliged, in going out to work, to leave the latter in the care of the former. One day the poor mother returning found her babe strangled in its bed, and her son hanging dead behind the door. There was no evidence that the violence had been committed by any one outside of the house, and the only light that could be thrown upon the horrible affair was the mother's recollection that her son, when urged to go to school, sometimes threatened to hang himself. It is supposed that he killed his sister and then committed suicide.

The Journal de Roanne tells a pathetic story of the effects of imagination in the case of a poor woman of Roanne, who had promised her dying husband that she would not marry again. After four years of widowhood, she was wooed by one to whom her heart inclined. At the same time she was torn with secret remorse. On All-Souls' day (Nov. 2), she went to pray at the tomb of her husband, and there implored his pardon for having thought of another marriage. In her frantic state she imagined that, in response to her prayer, the word "Never!" came from the grave, and she fell into a swoon. When succor arrived she was able to relate the occurrence, but lapsed from one convulsion into another until she expired.

The German Confederation maintains a garrison at Aix-la-Chapelle, of which the greater part is composed of Austrians and Prussians. While off duty the soldiers are permitted to go about the town with their bayonets at their belts, a custom which the people of Aix now ask to have abolished, as something involving hazard to their peace and safety. Lately there have been disturbances between the citizens and drunken soldiers, in which the latter used their bayonets; and there is common complaint of the ferocity and lawlessness of the Confederate garrison. The soldiers quarrel with men and insult women upon the streets, and on one occasion two of them broke into the Convent of the Sœurs-Grises, from which they were expelled with difficulty, while assailing the religieuses with the grossest language.

A Viennese paper announces that at an early day the use of passports will be abolished throughout Austria. There has been, since 1857, no visa of passports necessary within the empire, and now it is to be dispensed with even at the frontiers. With the new year Saxony abolishes passports, according to a treaty last February with Bavaria, Hanover, and Würtemberg.

The Federal Council of Switzerland is in trouble with the new commercial treaty between France and the Confederation, which obliges the Swiss to treat French Jews according to the equal rights and privileges granted them by French law. But in several of the cantons Swiss Jews have not the rights and privileges enjoyed by Christians, and the embarrassing question is whether these can be extended to French Jews. These cantons have refused to abolish the existing disabilities, and it is probable that the Federal Constitution will have to be so amended as to place Jews throughout Switzerland on the same footing with Christians.

The libraries of all the ministers of the Bourbon Government in Naples have been united, and opened to the public.

Correspondence of a Parisian journal relates that a large part of the Neapolitan population believes the cholera to be the result of poisoning.

The Neapolitan brigands have lately had the happiness to capture, near Salerno, the son of Signor Wenner, a rich proprietor, and now hold the young man subject to a ransom of $100,000. The chief of the band explains to the prisoner that if his father can afford to build such fine country houses as that in which he was captured, he can pay handsomely for his release. This seems reasonable, but it has made country gentlemen in the neighborhood of Salerno very uneasy, and it is said that they remain fortified in their villas, and have given up calling on each other for fear of falling in with brigands if they step out of doors.

Roman correspondence of the Débats describes the office of Papal minister of finance as something embarrassing. St. Peter has not even money enough to pay his employees. It is a question still whether Antonelli will try to put an end to this state of things by seeking an accommodation with Italy. As yet he evidently has not sought it, but attends events with his arms folded, and trusting in Providence—a fine attitude for a Pope, says the correspondence quoted, but not for the minister of a temporal government.

It seems that religious intolerance still exists in Spain to a degree worthy of the days of the Inquisition. An Englishman who sickened and died of the cholera, in Murcia, was abandoned by everybody during his illness, and after his death was refused burial by the clergy, in the cemetery, while no landholder dared give the corpse ground enough to hide. At last the remains were packed in straw, and sent to the British consul at Carthagena.

THE FREEDMEN.

There have been some interesting medical reports to the Bureau during the past week. From them it appears that the number of freedmen in and around Richmond is 25,000. One thousand of them occupy an old Confederate hospital (Chimbardzo), which has been divided into small tenements for families. Nearly all of the occupants are self-supporting, and pay a small rent. The health of this camp is good. The indigent sick in the city are attended under the direction of the Virginia Medical College, without expense to the Government except for medicines. There is an increase of sickness with the approach of cold weather. The orphan asylum is carried on almost entirely by the Society of Friends. The only freedmen's hospital about the city is the Howard Grove Hospital. The Friends also assist in the support of this. Arrangements are making to have the medical duties performed, under the direction of the college just named, by professional assistants, one of the faculty consulting each day. The new system of commuting the hospital ration has created a small fund in the various hospitals for the purchase of delicacies.

There seems to be a decided change in the conduct of the country physicians with regard to the freedmen, and that for the better. Some of them have volunteered to take charge of the freedmen in their vicinity free of charge, provided the Bureau will furnish the medicines, and in many localities the offer has been accepted. Of the planters not a few care for their hands, either according to contract or out of sympathy; but by far the greater portion leave the colored people to care for themselves.

The number of freed people cared for by the Bureau in Louisiana, from July 1 to November 1, was 2,548; of sick and wounded, 1,906, with a mortality of 319. The deaths from yellow fever were fewer amongst the blacks than amongst the whites. The two colored orphan asylums in New Orleans have been consolidated, and are now in charge of the National Freedmen's Relief Association.

When Gen. Sherman arrived at Fayetteville, N. C., he sent to Wilmington 10,000 freed people, who were organized into a colony at Fort Fisher. The mortality amongst them has been fearful. Between March 17 and May 31, 2,000 of them died, which was at the rate of 30 a day. They are now, however, much improved in condition, and doing comparatively well.

The colored surgeon in charge of the freedmen's hospital in Savannah wrote to the surgeon-in-chief of the State for instructions as to whether he should enlarge his hospital with a view to the great increase of sickness. The reply was that the city must provide for its own sick; whereupon, Surgeon Horner, chief medical officer of the Bureau, wrote as follows:

"Whilst the commissioner expects the civil authorities to attend to their own poor, he also expects the officers of the Bureau to see that the sick freedmen do not suffer when these authorities neglect their duty in providing for their wants."

Dr. Horner's report contains the following statistics: Whole number of refugees treated medically from the organization of the Bureau till Oct. 30, 2,551; deaths, 227, or six per cent.; whole number of freedmen thus treated in the same time, 45,898; deaths, 5,804, or 13 per cent.; remaining under treatment Oct. 30, 6,645 freedmen, 338 refugees.

The representations made at the North of the present and prospective suffering amongst the freedmen in Washington have been greatly exaggerated. The instrumentalities for their relief have been so well organized as to allay apprehension for the future. Mrs. J. S. Griffing's official connection with the Bureau has been terminated. Her duty hitherto has been to provide homes for such freed people as desired to go North.

There is a demand for labor in Louisiana that far exceeds the supply. The planters are beginning to make ready for next year's work, and liberal wages are offered along the Mississippi for able-bodied hands.

Rev. T. W Conway has been ordered to report to Gen. Fisk at Nashville, for assignment to duty.

Minor Topics.

Not born in New England (and we beg pardon of all New Englanders, and especially Bostonians, for the youthful inadvertence), what right have we to speak of the sacrificial feast which New England piety and persistence have made, in common with so many other good things, at last national? On this Thanksgiving Day, when so much sound doctrine will be pounded out of so many pulpits, from Bangor to Providence, throughout the whole May-Flowery Kingdom, should one, not native to the land, speak of the great religious festival which sprang from the very essence of New England life? As we hold up to ourselves in this objective light the idea of our presumption, we shudder to think what would have befallen our audacity in the good old days when all the thankful, well-filled stomachs of New England wore the heavenly blue of imputed righteousness, and one had better have been a heathen Pequod or a godless Quaker than a trifler with the austere and solemn mysteries of a Puritan holyday. What would those stern Pilgrim fathers, who have so long landed in such a number of ways on Plymouth Rock (we like them best as we see them in the charming engraving on the reverse side of the national bank-notes), have done with such a scribbler, if they could have laid their devout hands upon him, and confronted him with his Thanksgiving article in their own day?

We were so appalled by these reflections that, when considering how we should treat the subject, we concluded that we would merely speak of pumpkin-pies and turkeys and cranberry sauce. But, indeed, friends, would not that comprehend the whole festival in too many cases? Huge eating is the form that true happiness takes in all people of Northern blood; and whereas the frugal children of the South are as merry as crickets upon an empty stomach, your Northerner is only gay and grateful when gorged. His bosom's lord sits lightest on his throne when neighbored by a potent dinner. We are far from making this a reproach to our race, for we think it the duty of every man to eat a good dinner if he can get it; but we would have grace go before meat, and would mingle a little afterthought with the walnuts and the shag-barks which end the repast.

Doubtless, we are all very thankful to-day; but for what? "Why, sir," says old Jones—who has been so patriotic over the President's proclamation that he would not have faltered to serve up the American eagle on the bars of the national shield, had there been defect of turkey—"why, sir, we are once more a united people." And, in fact, this blessing deserves the first place in our gratitude. Alas! for many years the land has echoed to the awful voice of drums calling so loudly the young and brave to the feast of death, and our hearts may well be light that at our board to-day there is no suggestion of the dreadful past except in the turkey's drum-stick with which the youngest boy, as usual, has been wronged out of his dinner. But, in our national pride and in our personal gratitude, let us not forget the many, many tables at which a dreary absence sits; let us not forget the tables where want pinches the pale face ofthe wife who must attend her "war-broken soldier," like a helpless child, where the empty blue sleeve dangling from the maimed shoulder is the pathetic image of the empty purse; let us not forget the widows' houses in which no table is spread to-day; let us not forget the hungry homes of rebellion throughout the desolated South; nor yet the simple souls in black who came to us so nobly in our need, and who now wait humbly the sign, long withheld, of our gratitude and affection. Yes, we are once more a united people; but let us not forget at what fearful cost, nor fail to thank God that He did not give us peace in our sin, and that He made us suffer until we put slavery away.

"I think," says Smart (who, indeed, occupies so remote a place at The Nation's table that, but for his speaking, we should hardly have known he was there at all), "we ought to be grateful that the women are giving up waterfalls."

Do you, you poor soul? Then why do you not write three columns about it for some newspaper, and boldly attack the waterfall, now it is down? Nay, we say, let the ladies wear their hair how they will, they never can make it ugly nor themselves unamiable in the fond regard of The Nation. If they have appeared at our poor Thanksgiving feast, it is for their presence we must be grateful, and not for their new fancy of dressing their hair à la grecque. As we walk up and down our stately streets, and look at the lovely women going by, we doubt if the women of any other land are so fair, and we are sure that no others are so good; and but that it would be too much like expression of gratitude for the sun, moon, and stars, we think we might properly give thanks to-day for American womanhood. That, too, not less than the republic's manhood, has been tried in the long war now passed, and the heroines of the struggle, if obscurer, are hardly fewer than the heroes. Friends, there is yet a little sherry in the decanter (and if any likes it better, there is water on the table), and so let us drink a health, since it would be absurd to offer thanks for the blessing: The Ladies—May their descending waterfalls drown out and utterly wash away the silly grumblers who accuse them of vanity, idleness, and extravagance.

Without doubt, while we all feel collectively grateful for the happiness bestowed on us as a people, each of us has some individual blessing to acknowledge. To have been prospered in business; to have been spared sickness or saved from death; to have made new friends and kept old ones; to have ended some ancient feud, and taken the hand of him that used to hate us; to have been helped to do charity and aided to show mercy—these are things for some of which we hope each one of us has to be thankful. If any one has to be thankful for them all, he is the happiest man here.

"Yes," says the poet, with a consciousness in his voice, by which we know that he has verses to read, and is guiltily casting about for some absurd pretext to produce them,—"yes, and I believe we have quite as much reason to be grateful for the blessings of omission as for the good positively bestowed. Indeed, I think most of God's beneficence is negative, and that when men faithfully examine their hearts they have to rejoice not that they have received this or done that, but that one thing has been withheld, and that they have been restrained from another. It seems to me we have been put here under healthful and pure conditions, and that the divine goodness is chiefly shown when we are not permitted to change them. At any rate," and here the poet goes on to mumble something about English words set to the feeling of an old Italian hymn, in such wise that he hardly knows whether he is or is not guilty of imitation, and then we catch the verses of his THANKSGIVING.

I.

Lord, for the erring thought
Not into evil wrought:
Lord, for the wicked will Betrayed and baffled still:
For the heart from itself kept,
Our Thanksgiving accept.

II.

For ignorant hopes that were Broken to our blind prayer:
For pain, death, sorrow, sent Unto our chastisement:
For all loss of seeming good,
Quicken our gratitude.

"Why this," comments the preacher, in the tone of a man who has had his thought picked of his valuables, and sees them in the words of another, "is what you would be apt to hear from most pulpits to-day." And none the worse for the pulpits, as we think, but much the better for the pews if they heed the lesson, and do not go home and bury it "deeper than did ever plummet sound" under successive billows of oysters, turkey, and pie.

"At the same time," remarks the business-man, "I think the poet makes his gratitude for the negative blessings too vague. I would have him particularize: he should have specified our preservation from the cholera up to the present time, for I am sure that nothing but God's mercy has saved this filthy city from it, and He alone ought to have the praise. I should also have liked to have him say something about railroad accidents. Every day, as I ride up to my place in the cars, I read of fellow-creatures horribly mangled and ruthlessly murdered on the railroads somewhere; and I think all who travel by rail and come home unhurt, should fall down and thank God for His compassion on them. For me, I am most sincerely and humbly grateful to Providence for three hundred and sixty-five hair-breadth escapes during the past year."

"Well, Bobby, what are you grateful for, this Thanksgiving Day?"

Master Bobby, who never expected to be addressed directly by The Nation, pauses a moment from his engagement with the drum-stick, and then responds in a shrill voice, uniting all that is most pleasing in the squeak of a door and the music of a pencil on a slate, "I was six years old last Saturday."

And you, madam, his mother, it is Bobby himself you are thankful for, that is plain to be seen by any one who looks at you passing your hand proudly over his head and lifting back the yellow hair from the brow bent over the drum-stick. Could any other boy have made such an answer as that?

"On a day like this," says a finely-modulated voice, which the reader must have heard before, "we ought all to be thankful that we are not as other men are." This remark makes the speaker very popular with the company, who, indeed, might have found the poet's verses heavy of digestion, and the business-man's observations not too cheerful, for, at last, most of us will not be kept from doing the evil we want to do, and some of us are directors of railroads. "I say," repeats the speaker, seeing the good impression he has made, "we ought all to be thankful we are not as other men are." The speaker is the Pharisee, and it is he and not poor Ahasuerus who is the real Wandering Jew, or, as the Germans call him much better, the Everlasting Jew. He has survived to this day, and he will never die. He is a very respectable man and his name is Tartuffe Podsnap, Esq.

Friends, let us leave you in your pleasant conceit. We see that the hostess is making those well-concealed signals, which everybody sees, for the host to rise from the table; and we know old Jones, who is so thankful we are a united people that he sets everybody the example of uniting the bulk of several people in his own person, longs to throw himself into his arm-chair before the glowing grate, and cast the bandanna of oblivion over his heavy eyes.

We think all reasonable people must be more than satisfied with the manner in which the Otero murder case has thus far been conducted. The police, in their prompt pursuit and discovery of the supposed assassins of the ill-starred Cuban, did their duty admirably, and Captain Waddy, who made the arrest of Gonzales, may be said to have exceeded, in his professional zeal, the bounds of duty.

We suppose we need not recount minutely the facts of this horrible affair; how Pellicer was taken the day after the murder; how he confessed to the Spanish Consul, implicating Gonzales as his accomplice; how Gonzales was captured, and how the dead man's money was found in his room. The reader has seen all this in the daily papers, where, also, he may have learned much concerning Gonzales which the well-regulated public would wish to know, as, for example, that the miserable man's countenance is "one of the worst that can be imagined, having a most diabolical look;" that "his eyes are deeply set, and have a sinister gleam in them, like the Medusa glitter of the fabled basilisk;" that when suddenly confronted with the corpse of poor Otero, "his dark, evil eye fell on the face of the murdered man," and "instantly a tremor shot through his frame, a gurgling sound issued from his throat, his face grew absolutely livid, his lips parted, and a choking sensation came over him." Captain Waddy's headquarters were besieged for several days, we have been told, by "a crowd of eager visitors," who taxed the good-humored captain's patience to the utmost, "making him repeat, for the hundredth time, the story of the chase and capture of the alleged murderer Gonzales." Indeed, Captain Waddy seems to have been willing to make the affair as much an ovation to himself as possible; and, loth to let his celebrity perish with the indictment of the supposed murderers, he turned the victim himself to account, and achieved continued newspaper compliments by commanding, at Otero's funeral, an escort of a hundred policemen. Nay, besides the newspaper compliments, this last stroke won him the praises of Señor Cuyas, of the Barcelona Hotel, who, after the body was interred, obtained, before the chapel of the cemetery, "a knot of his dark-eyed countrymen," and repeated to them, "for the last time, the oft-told story of blood," and then finally made a neat speech of thanks to the police, and to Captain Waddy in particular. In fact, the business has been conducted from beginning to end with the utmost harmony between the hero of the drama, Captain Waddy, and Señor Cuyas, a subordinate charater of great merit.

In working up the interest, however, it seems to us that injustice has been done to Gonzales, not as a character—(for, certainly, no man accused of murder could wish to appear more impressively to the public than he has been made to)—but as the prisoner of the law, and under its protection.

Captain Waddy, having satisfied his curiosity as to the effect of the dead man's appearance on his victim, and finding that Gonzales could not be induced to look at it a second time, next proceeded to gratify his professional vanity at the expense of the prisoner. He took him to a photographer's and had a picture made of himself and his prey:

"The captain dressed himself in the same costume which he wore at the capture of Gonzales, and a picture was taken of both men in the position in which they were at that time. The captain is standing with his right hand grasping Gonzales' collar and his left hand, with the club, holding his wrist. Gonzales' head is thrown back, and he is in the same attitude as he was on the sidewalk outside the Centre Street boarding-house. The captain and his charge then returned to the station-house."

We confess that we sicken as we read this, and have scarcely stomach to comment on it. The hard conditions of society impose on some the necessity of taking thieves and murderers, and we suppose it is well that the officers of the law should have some sort of interest in it, and a professional pride in the execution of duty. But why should Captain Waddy like to be pictured with his clutch upon a prisoner's collar, and his face looking into the terror and agony of the prisoner's face? Was the picture meant to be engraved for the criminal journals, or is it to be multiplied and offered for sale at the stationers'? Or does Captain Waddy merely wish to preserve for his own delight the proudest moment of his life, and hand down the image of it, a ghastly heirloom, to his descendants? Would some hangman like to be photographed with his foot on the spring of the trap?

As far as the miserable Gonzales was concerned, the transaction was so gross a violence to his defencelessness, that we hardly know how to characterize it. Captain Waddy seems to have thought that his prisoner was his property, his slave, his chattel, his beast, with which he might have his will in any way he chose. But he really had no more right to make Gonzales minister to his horrible vanity, than he had to hail from the street the first man he met, and compel him to the like office. One figures to himself the Spaniard's amazement and bewilderment at Captain Waddy's proceeding, and his dumb doubt (which never could have struggled to a protest in English) whether all this were lawful and just, and cannot but answer him that it was neither.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

THE WORK BEFORE CONGRESS.

THOSE who predicted that the great difficulty before Congress would be the harmonious organization of the House will, by the time this paper meets the eye of the reader, have seen their error. The true difficulties are yet to come. While the elements which will enter into the political problem are so incalculable that no foresight can now predict its solution, we may, nevertheless, take a passing glance at the points likely to be the center of interest for several months to come.

First in order, as in importance, comes the grand question of the reconstruction of the Union. It is universally expected that the present Congress will virtually settle both the time and the terms on which the States lately in rebellion may fully resume their dissevered relations with the national Government. Their claim to participate as co-equal partners in that Government having been totally forfeited by their own act of war, their re-admission to their old rights and privileges must depend upon such conditions as the Government itself shall impose. These conditions have not been and cannot be determined by the Executive branch of the Government alone. What is called "the reconstruction policy" of President Johnson is merely tentative and initiatory, and it remains with the legislative branch of the Government to take a deliberative survey of the whole field, to confirm or annul such acts of the Executive as do not rest upon positive law, and to fix, by appropriate legislation, the whole policy of the future.

In entering upon this part of its labors, Congress will have need of all the lights which can be thrown upon its path by experience and observation. The condition of society and the state of opinion in the Southern States they are bound, by every consideration of justice and public policy, thoroughly to scrutinize and to understand before deciding a question so momentous. Are those States which have so lately dropped the sword of rebellion, if at once restored to all their ancient powers, likely to prove safe and peaceable members of the body politic? This is a question not to be lightly settled, after a few weeks of wordy warfare. The consequences of a wrong decision are too fearfully grave to permit that headlong tendency which is so apt to control our politics to usurp the place of reason and deliberation. We seek to become settled, and are impatient of delay; but it becomes us to remember and apply the axiom, that "nothing is ever settled until it is settled right."

Next in importance to the re-admission of the lately insurgent States, and, indeed, indissolubly connected with it, comes the question of the rights and future status of four millions of emancipated bondmen. That question, aside from its intrinsic importance, is forced upon the early attention of Congress by the late action of several Southern States which have attempted to "hedge" against their overwhelming losses of slave property by enacting codes for the future government of the freedmen. The second clause of the Constitutional Amendment (now secured, beyond peradventure, by the certain acceptance of the requisite number of States) imposes upon Congress the duty of giving effect to the prohibition of slavery "by appropriate legislation." How far this is to operate as a grant of power to regulate the labor-system of the South, and to interpose the strong arm of Federal control between the exactions and oppressions of a "Code Noir" and its victims, will be the subject of early and warm debate. The doctrine of State rights versus Federal supremacy will be again thoroughly agitated, and we hope with good result. That the liberties of the black race are ultimately secure, we do not for a moment doubt. The Supreme Court as at present constituted would enforce the essence of the Constitutional Amendment, with or without that "appropriate legislation" on the part of Congress which it contemplates. But in a matter of such immediate consequence to every individual freedman, it would not be proper that the protection of their rights should be postponed to the remote contingencies of a judicial decision. What every man needs is justice, and justice must be brought to his own door, or the Government which is instituted expressly to secure this has failed of its end.

We attach little importance to the classification attempted by certain journals of the members of the present Congress as "Radicals" or "Conservatives" upon the questions in issue. There are reckoned in the House of Representatives 143 Unionists to 41 Democrats, and in the Senate 39 of the former to 11 of the latter. This leaves out of account (as is proper for the present) 58 representatives and 22 senators chosen, or to be chosen, in the eleven lately rebellious States. The Democrats elect all belong to the Bourbon school of politicians, and have not learned that the war has abolished slavery, nor forgotten that their party, in conjunction with the slave power, once ruled the Union. Their affinities can be accurately foretold. But it is idle to speculate about the action of the majority. While a great number of them owe their election to the predominant anti-slavery sentiment in their districts, many represent merely the triumph of a "Union" sentiment, or a coalition against the secession heresy. This element is rather negative than positive, and is quite likely to act upon the theory so elaborately defended by the late Mr. Buckle (and of which Stephen A. Douglas was the champion in this country), to wit: that expediency and not justice should be the aim of the legislator. Whether there is a sufficient number of stern believers in a loftier creed, to whose undimmed vision shines for ever the polar star of justice, like the flaming cross before the victorious legions of Constantine, yet remains to be seen.

Of the other measures likely to engage the attention of Congress, the financial problem is perhaps the foremost. The policy of expansion, as is widely felt, is to give place to the policy of contraction. Yet the latter policy cannot be carried into general effect so long as the national bank issues are being multiplied so rapidly as the existing laws permits. For the Government to recall its own issues of "legal tender" while suffering the banks to issue an unlimited amount, upon no other basis than its own bonds, of fluctuating value, is thought by multitudes to be the reverse of wisdom. Congress will have to consider the whole question of the currency maturely, and perhaps amend it in important particulars.

The internal revenue system will also undergo changes. There will be more than the customary pressure from special interests which declare themselves over-taxed, and some of those interests will probably be successful. It is known that the burden of taxation may be safely reduced, consistently with the future wants of the Treasury, and the tendency is, as in Great Britain, to concentrate the tax upon as few articles as possible. In no event, however, must the necessity of a sufficient revenue to yield a considerable sinking fund, in addition to the current expenditure, be lost sight of.

The existing tariff upon imported goods is not likely to be seriously disturbed. High as it is upon most articles, the feeling is strong that we should discourage the importation of mere luxuries. But the tariff of twenty-five per cent. upon books, and of twenty per cent. upon printing paper, operates injuriously upon the diffusion of knowledge, and should be promptly reduced or repealed.

The attempt will be renewed to pass a general bankrupt law, but it is unlikely to succeed, until, at least, the next "commercial crisis" shall render the measure more universally popular.

The Pacific Railroad, left in a provoking state of suspension by the action (or non-action) of the last Congress, will be again vigilantly brought to the notice of the national legislature by the special committee of which Senator Howard is the chairman. Of its future fortunes and of the probable influence upon them of the late Western tour of British capitalists, of which we have heard so much, we have no present room to speak.

The questions of the repeal of the confiscation law and of the test-oath of July 2, 1862, will doubtless cause protracted controversy, and will be settled or postponed according to the now uncertain judgment of the majority upon the overshadowing issue of reconstruction.

NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR WHITES AND BLACKS.

NEVER, since legislation was, did a legislative body come together under such a weight of responsibility, and charged with duties of such far-reaching and long-enduring issues, as the Congress which assembled at Washington last Monday. It is more than a legislative body. From the necessity of the case, it largely partakes of the nature of a constituent body. For it has to decide questions and settle policy which are to determine the political condition of half the Republic. By its power of excluding the persons elected from the States lately in rebellion, it can fix the conditions on which alone they can come in, reaching to particulars of domestic policy and of the treatment of their inhabitants which belong, in ordinary times, exclusively to the determination of the States themselves. The Thirty-eighth Congress made itself immortal by the passage of the Constitutional Amendment abolishing and for ever prohibiting slavery. The Thirty-ninth has the not less glorious, but much more arduous, task of organizing the victory of the nation over its rebels into institutions assuring for ever the safety and happiness of all the inhabitants of that chastised region, and the prosperity, honor, and glory of the whole Union.

But though the task is arduous, and one that may well excite the most serious reflection and the liveliest sense of personal duty, it is one that needs only the application of plain common sense, in the light of the facts of our history for the last seventy-five years, to make the difficulties disappear and the necessary action obvious. Slavery was the occasion of the war. Slavery had practically abolished the clauses of the Constitution securing freedom of speech and of the press, and the right of the citizens of one State to claim the privileges of citizenship in every other State. And slavery had defied the general Government to enforce the Constitution in these particulars within its sacred domain. There can be no question as to the duty of Congress to provide for the protection of all the good people of the United States in travelling whithersoever they will in the Southern country, and of saying and printing whatever they choose there, subject to the laws of the land constitutionally expounded, without danger from lynch law, whether administered within or without the walls of a court-house. This it was always the duty of Congress to do, and it is not to be supposed that it will permit the old reign of misrule to be established anew, now that the opportunity of reformation is forced upon it. Formerly, too, slavery held one-sixth part of the inhabitants of the land in the vilest bondage on which the sun ever shone, which reduced them to the condition of the brutes that perish, as far as human wickedness could effect such fiendish metamorphosis. But slavery compelled the nation in its own defence to adjudge it worthy of death, and to carry the sentence into execution. In all the revolting States it has no existence, and though it has the name of living in two semi-loyal commonwealths, it is virtually dead even there, and will soon be buried out of sight by a constitutional decree of the nation. But its victims survive, crushed, maimed, degraded, helpless. The nation has given them their freedom; it is to see to it that they are secured in the perfect enjoyment of that freedom by all guarantees which wisdom and experience can devise. It is doubly bound to this duty by the fact that it is to the flower of their race, bond and free, that the great victory of right over the powers of darkness is in part due.

To take the last and most pressing duty first, how is Congress to perform to the unfortunate victims of slavery the duties which have devolved upon the nation? Plainly, by charging the nation with their protection against the white population until this last is content to leave them in the enjoyment of equal rights with themselves. The moment the Constitutional Amendment becomes a part of the law of the land, Congress is directly invested with full power to legislate to this end. But we believe that it is fully empowered, by the necessity of the case, to act at once, and to require the repeal of all the black laws which the rebel States are busy in passing, as essential to their restoration, or, this failing, to declare them null and of no effect. To leave the negroes at the mercy of such merciless legislation were scarcely a less crime than the rehabilitation of slavery proper. Protection to the persons and property of the freedmen is the first duty of the Government, and this is to be afforded at any expense, any risk, and any amount of exasperation and mortification of the late masters and the "white trash" worse than they. And this we conceive to be a duty precedent to that of investing the freedmen with the right of suffrage. It is well known that we go as far as the farthest in claiming for the black men of the South equality as citizens with the white men, subject to no other conditions or restrictions than such as apply impartially to all, white and black. But we would not have this question, on which there exists an honest difference of opinion among loyal men, mixed up with that of protection, on which there ought not to be the least discrepancy, and will not be except on the part of rebels at heart. The nation may at least extend to the freedmen the protection which it gives to women, minors, and its other non-voting members. As it is obvious that the ordinary tribunals and officers of the late slave States are not to be trusted with the execution of laws securing this protection, provision must be made for enforcing them outside of, or rather within, the States themselves. The nation should be willing, and we believe is willing, to maintain an army of two hundred thousand men for twenty years, if necessary, to garrison the rebel States and enforce the national laws. Military tribunals, or special magistrates with a military force behind them, should have supreme authority in all cases affecting the freedmen, until the States show themselves fit to be entrusted with their protection.

Without this national protection the gift of suffrage would be but a new power of mischief put in the hands of the ruling class at the South. We utterly dissent from the doctrine that the ballot alone is sufficient to enable the negro to protect himself. Should the late seven States agree to give him the franchise on condition that all national interference were withdrawn, and he be left to their tender mercies, the ballot would be but a mockery to him, and a new strength to the hands of his old masters. Is the negro to be supposed superior to all the inducements of terror and interest and influence which are all-powerful but too often at the North? How many of the workmen in the navy-yards, in Democratic days, voted any other than the Democratic ticket? We will not argue too curiously as to how it has been since the Republicans came in. How many of the employees on the Camden and Amboy and New York Central Railways vote contrary to the known wishes of the directors? Have there been no instances of agents of factories marching up to the polls at the head of the operatives, all voting as one man? And is it very long since the oldest, wealthiest, and most respected inhabitants of this city were deterred from voting by fear of death or wounds in the attempt? And can the negroes be expected to resist the temptations of interest and the influence of intimidation more resolutely than intelligent and comparatively independent voters at the North? No; the armed protection of the nation will be needed by the negro at the polls as much as in the fields, in the school-house, in the church, and in the court-house. Give him effectual protection in his contracts, his labor, his family, his education, his freedom of locomotion, his right to bear arms, to sue and to testify in all courts, and the right of suffrage will not be long withheld from him, even if it cannot be secured along with those other rights.

Not merely the rights of the blacks at the South, but those of the whites at the North, before referred to, demand a resolute determination on the part of Congress to hedge them round with national bayonets, and to maintain an imperium in imperio at the South until the white men there have become accustomed to see their former slaves exercising the rights of freemen, and also learn that their own prosperity and safety are bound up with those of the freedmen. For the slave States never were really fit to govern themselves. They require a season of probation and education to prepare them for the new state of peace, safety, and prosperity which courts their hand. For Congress, in protecting the freedmen in their rights, and Northern men in theirs, will be conferring these blessings on their late enemies, and in the highest and truest sense be returning good for evil.

BISMARK.

Of all the civilized countries yet saddled with the mediæval institution of a hereditary nobility, Germany carries the load of the most arrogant and needy variety. The English nobleman seeks a post of honor in his country's service; the cavaliers of old France took for their maxim, Noblesse oblige. The German aristocrat renders this "Nobility exempts"—from taxation and public responsibility. If in the possession of an estate, which case is the exception, for there is not a single Protestant nobleman in the receipt of half a million of income, he devotes himself to the badgering of his tenants. If poor, as he is in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, he achieves a lieutenancy, or attains the position of ornamental footman to the reigning prince. The only disgrace he never incurs is a mésalliance with any of the thriving bourgeoisie who are rapidly rising above the ruins of the old order. Still, subserviency is the road to power; and the monarchs, especially those of Prussia, conscious that their own importance is greatly enhanced by the existence of a class which, while dependent on the throne for the very necessaries of life, is not more cringing to them than overbearing to the mass of the people, have been at some pains to preserve the race from extinction. Thus these barnacles on the ship of state, not unlike the slaveholders of our own South, whom they resemble in bigotry, scorn of labor, and self-conceit, have maintained almost a monopoly of the most influential public offices, and a disproportionate influence on the politics of the country.

In some respects a fair type of his class, Charles Otto, Count of Bismark-Schoenhausen, is decidedly their superior not only in intellect and education, having taken a university degree, but also in the fundamental character of his politics. Though found, at this moment, on the side of legitimacy in the contest respecting the distribution of domestic power, he has given ample proof that this position, instead of being regarded by him as the final end and goal of all political action, is adopted to subserve a temporary purpose. He belongs to the school of politicians known in Europe as the Napoleonic, having been initiated by the first and perfected by the third Napoleon. Unscrupulous in the choice of means, peculiarly adroit in the mixture of truth and falsehood, regardless of tradition as well as of positive law, levellers in the spirit of a centralizing despotism, and even revolutionary when it serves their ends, these men are filled with hatred of the people and of all popular aspirations, on the suppression of which they can alone exist, and which occasionally they, nevertheless, pretend to favor. In times of political transition, when the public are halting between two opinions, and the uncertainty of affairs reflects this vacillating condition of the general mind, there are fits of impatience which lead people to crave the attainment of no matter what result, at any cost, in preference to the characteristic indecision of the period. It is in answer to such demands that the Napoleons and Bismarks of the day, like the tyrants of the Greek republics, strut their hour upon the stage, achieving successes which, though really fraught with losses to the masses, are preferred by them to the imperceptible gains. Expediency is the only rule of action of these bastard statesmen; to find occupation for their talent for bringing about results they are constrained to raise complications where none would otherwise exist, and aggravate those they find existing. On the other hand, they often become benefactors of the human race against their will, because the necessity of self-preservation and self-aggrandizement compels them to launch their boats on the strongest currents, which, in the nature of things, invariably follow the channels of progress in the end.

All these peculiarities are strongly exemplified in the brief career of the subject of these remarks. Born at Brandenburg, in 1813, he lived on his farmers until 1847, and then entered the parliament called by Frederic William IV. as a reactionary of the straitest sect, distinguished only by that "plantation manners" style of oratory, then little known in Europe, by which he rose into notoriety. In 1851 it procured him the position of Prussian representative at the restored German Diet at Frankfort. He then contracted an admiration for Louis Napoleon, which so far influenced him during the Italian struggle of 1859 that the degree of favor toward France and of coldness to Austria with which he acted led to his recall by the ministry. After having served for some years as ambassador at St. Petersburg, and for a short time at the Tuileries, he was called to the head of Prussian affairs on the 24th of September, 1862.

At one of the first committee meetings of the chamber he took occasion to remark that great questions are not decided by speeches and majority resolutions, but by "blood and steel." When the assembly met in January, 1863, and voted that the ministers had violated the constitution, he declared that political conflicts, if not adjusted by compromise, are always decided by force. He denied the power of the House to make rules of order binding upon the ministers in debate, and when the Speaker was sustained by the House in calling a member of the cabinet to order, the ministry withdrew, and declared they would not return until expressly exempted from parliamentary discipline. The struggle ended in the dissolution of the chamber. The next assembly having convened November 9, 1863, and having refused to vote a loan of twelve millions of thalers to enable the Government to uphold the unity of the Danish monarchy under the treaty of London of 1852, Bismark declared that the Government meant to take the means of carrying out its policy wherever it should find them, and dismissed the chamber with a speech in which he declared that they had taken sides with the enemies of Prussia for the purpose of coercing the Government in violation of the constitution.

Ever since his assumption of the government it has been his studious effort to direct attention from these intestine broils to the subject of foreign affairs. A very liberal commercial treaty with France having been made the subject of remonstrances by the Austrian government, coupled with a proposal to enlarge the German Diet by a house of representatives elected by the people, Bismark replied that Austria must either make common cause with Prussia, "or seek her centre of gravity at Buda." In 1863 Francis Joseph convened all the German monarchs at Frankfort, and submitted a crude project of reform of the German confederation, without manifesting any anxiety to have it maturely considered before adoption. Prussia refused to attend, complaining that Austria wanted to take Germany by surprise, and that the project was not to be thought of unless the proposed representatives were to be elected by universal suffrage. At this point the death of the King of Denmark overturned all existing calculations. Both Prussia and Austria had stipulated at London, in 1852, that on the occurrence of that event the duchies Sleswick and Holstein, which the deceased monarch had inherited, not as King of Denmark, but as Duke of Holstein, should fall to the new King of Denmark, who, as such, would have had no title to the succession, and should be and remain integral parts of the Danish kingdom. The German Diet and the lesser German monarchies were not parties to the treaty of London, and were, therefore, free to insist, as they did, that these provinces were the rightful inheritance of the Prince of Augustenburg, and entitled to the protection of the German confederation, to which they belong, against all encroachments by the Danes or other foreigners. The logical result would have been an alliance of Prussia and Austria with Denmark against the Diet. Bismark did join hands with Austria; but the alliance with Denmark was impracticable, first, because the national pride of Germany, in Prussia as well as out of it, was deeply enlisted in the revindication of these duchies, and still more because Prussia itself had long coveted their possession. When, therefore, the Diet deliberated upon the occupation of the disputed territories, the two great powers went no further than to procure the substitution for that measure of an "execution," that is, of an armed invasion to overcome the recusancy of the new King of Denmark, in not submitting his claims to the adjudication of the Diet. Having carried this amendment, they moved that the "execution" should be committed to them exclusively. Meeting with a peremptory refusal, they curtly declared that they would take the matter into their own hands, and proceeded to fulfil their engagement to guarantee the integrity of the Danish monarchy by invading that very kingdom for not submitting the question of its disintegration to a hostile party, and closed a very successful campaign by the treaty of August 1, 1864, in which, notwithstanding the fulminations of the English diplomatists at the conference at London, Denmark renounced all claim to the duchies. Then ensued a diplomatic struggle between the victors relative to the division of the spoils, resulting in the treaty of Gastein, which gives Sleswick to Prussia and Holstein to Austria. But this agreement was made in open contempt, not only of the Duke of Augustenburg, the party whose "rights" constituted the sole excuse for any one's interference, but of the German confederation, of which both Prussia and Austria are constitutive members, and, therefore, clearly bound by its decrees, and which is the only representative of that German nationality to vindicate which was the ostensible object of the war. The assertion of a right to do as they have done, implies, on the part of Austria and Prussia, a right to make partition of all the smaller states, and forebodes a bisection of Germany as the issue of the efforts for its unity, while the protest of the Diet applies not more strongly to the present confiscation of the provinces than to the betrayal of them in 1852, and is incompatible with any action of these powers in which Germany is interested, not in subordination to the nominal head of the German confederation.

On the other hand, Bismark is entitled to the credit of having proved by experiment that there is practically no power in Germany outside of Austria and Prussia, and that the remaining principalities are incapable of postponing their selfish desires to a common purpose, and forming a balance of power in the German body politic. This idea of a trias has been exploded by the pressure administered by Prussia. The lesser states have suffered the golden opportunity of vindicating the national honor, when betrayed by the two great powers in the earlier stages of the struggle, to pass unimproved, and it will not return. A feeble protest was all they dared interpose. By inducing Austria to accept a share of the spoils, Bismark has further dispelled the illusion hitherto kept up by the latter power that it would protect the small fry of the old empire against the ambitious designs of Prussia. The consequence is not only a loss of German influence by Austria, but the parting of the last moorings of the little monarchies. Long since deprived of the good-will of their subjects, these petty rulers have now lost even their reliance on Austrian support, and are poised in mid-air, ready to be submerged by the waves of the next grand political inundation, which will probably scatter them as waifs on the strands of Prussia, Austria, and possibly, for a time, of France. Thus the great question has been relieved of a number of its embarrassments.

PRICES.

During the war we were treated nearly every day to long and solemn exhortations from the newspapers, addressed to the speculators, warning them to desist from their wicked practices of running up the price of gold. There were many writers, and there was a large portion of the public, who could not be persuaded that if the speculators could somehow or other be punished or restrained, the ups and downs of the gold market would not cease, and legal tenders drop down to par, or nearly par. Nor was there the slightest use in calling their attention to the fact that it was the uncertainty created by the events of the war that gave the speculators all their power of mischief; that the real root of the trouble was in the public mind, which was agitated by hopes and fears; and that as soon as public events resumed their ordinary course, the speculators could no more speculate in gold than live in an exhausted receiver. There is, in fact, no more use in declaiming against gambling in the public funds during great political convulsions, than in inveighing against flies for appearing in dining-rooms during the hot weather. But the preaching went on in this case till Congress tried its hand at punishment in 1864. The great "gold bill" was introduced which was to drive the speculators back into their dens, and cover the political economists who advised their being let alone with confusion. The result was that gold ran up to nearly 300, and the bill, after having done immense mischief, was repealed in twelve days. This put a stop to the preaching on this subject. The speculators were henceforward treated with silent contempt; and, as everybody knew who had ever given any serious thought either to the laws of trade or the laws of human nature, the wretches found their occupation gone the minute the war was over. Gold still remained to be bought and sold. The speculators were as anxious as ever to run it up. But the public mind was no longer agitated by the storm of war; the price ceased to vary to any but a very slight degree.

Peace, however, did not bring any great diminution in prices. In fact, they have been rising steadily since very soon after Lee's surrender. The causes of this are to be sought either in the state of the labor market, or in the proportion borne by the quantity of currency in existence to the quantity required, or in taxation. To find them in any of these, however, would have required a good deal of thought and research, so the easier course was resorted to of abusing the butchers and bakers and grocers as extortioners. The dearness of everything was ascribed to a conspiracy amongst the tradesmen, and people were gravely encouraged to form anti-meat and other self-denying clubs for the purpose of bringing the harpies to their senses. All this was pure waste of paper and ink, though a great many simpletons read it as gospel. As a general rule, people know themselves when beef and cloth are dear without being told by their newspapers, and know also whether or not they can afford to buy them; and unless some great change should take place in human nature, persons who like beef, and find that their means enable them to eat it, will continue to do so as long as the world lasts, newspaper advice to the contrary notwithstanding. Providence has provided means of putting prices down, when they get higher than the supply warrants, far better than any club can devise. When meat gets dear, those who feel its dearness eat less of it, or stop eating altogether, without waiting for a hint from the press; and as these constitute a considerable proportion of the public, the butcher very speedily knows that if there be any room for coming down, down he must come. This class, therefore, could do no more for cheapness by signing their names to a pledge than they do without it. Those, on the other hand, who like meat, and can afford to eat it at any price, will continue to eat it, no matter what editors may say.

We need hardly say no clubs of this kind were ever formed. The mass of the community being sensible and economical people—as the mass of every community must be which is rapidly growing rich—they continued to manage their own affairs as before, and to regulate their butchers' bills without submitting them to a council of their neighbors or publishing them in the daily papers. A movement got up by some ladies whose zeal outran their knowledge, for the formation of an anti-foreign goods association, towards the close of the war, ended in the same way. In the first place, there were not enough women found to forswear foreign goods, or any other goods that suited their tastes or their pockets, to make the smallest impression on the market. In the second place, the retailers were found anything but ready to come forward as patriotic venders of native manufactures. Not only were they not willing to confine themselves to the sale of American goods, but they were found to be rather inclined to sell everything as foreign goods—the reason being that, in spite of many luminous articles in the magazines and daily papers, people were found to prefer French gloves and French and English cloth, whenever they could afford to buy them, for the simple reason that they were better and more durable. The association said they were not, but the persons who wore them flattered themselves—like the buffalo with regard to the proper side of his hide to be exposed to the weather—that they knew better.

We now hear no more talk of voluntary associations for the promotion of cheapness. The denunciations of the butchers and bakers have also ceased, and prices are higher than ever, although gold has for some months back remained stationary. As long as it was only in currency that prices rose, of course there was something to hope from Congress or Mr. McCulloch, but neither he nor Congress can bring about contraction in specie, or make either food or clothing one cent cheaper except by reduction in taxation. The indications that the present high prices and their upward tendency are due to a constant and of late rapid increase in the value of gold in circulation are numerous enough to satisfy us that we shall never again see the "old prices." The movement is not confined to this country. It is apparent also in France and England, where, however, the suffering or inconvenience will be much greater from it than here. In both these countries there is a vast body of annuitants, who cannot at all, or cannot readily, change their investments, to whom every fall in the value of money is a positive and irretrievable diminution of income. In America almost everybody can readily adapt his income to prices, either by a change of investments or a rise of wages; but the sooner we all make up our minds that the rise takes place, not owing to the deep-laid villany of speculators but in obedience to a great economical law, the easier the transition will be. It can be greatly mitigated, however, by a reduction of taxation, and what reduction can be made, if any, with a due regard to the public credit, it will be the business of the present Congress to decide, with the light furnished them by the commission which has been sitting in this city during the summer. If something cannot be done to lighten people's burden, here in New York, business will inevitably be driven to other places, and we are not sure that the country would not be benefited by a greater distribution of it.

TO THE THIRTY-NINTH CONGRESS.

O PEOPLE-CHOSEN! are ye not
Likewise the chosen of the Lord,
To do His will and speak His word?

From the loud thunder-storm of war
Not man alone has called ye forth,
But He, the God of all the earth!

The torch of vengeance in your hands
He quenches; unto Him belongs
The solemn recompense of wrongs.

Enough of blood the land has seen,
And, not by cell, or gallows-stair,
Shall ye the way of God prepare.

Say to the pardon-seekers: Keep
Your manhood; bend no suppliant knees,
Nor palter with unworthy pleas.

Above your voices sounds the wail
Of starving men; we shut in vain
Our eyes to Pillow's ghastly stain.

What words can drown that bitter cry?
What tears wash out that stain of death?
What oaths confirm your broken faith?

From you alone the guaranty
Of union, freedom, peace, we claim:
We urge no conqueror's terms of shame.

Alas! no victor's pride is ours
Who bend above our triumphs won
Like David o'er his rebel son.

Be men, not beggars. Cancel all
By one brave, generous action; trust
Your better instincts, and be just!

Make all men peers before the law,
Take hands from off the negro's throat,
Give black and white an equal vote.

Keep all your forfeit lives and lands,
But give the common law's redress
To Labor's utter nakedness.

Revive the old, heroic will,
Be in the right as brave and strong
As ye have proved yourselves in wrong.

Defeat shall then be victory,
Your loss the wealth of full amends,
And hate be love and foes be friends.

Then buried be the dreadful past,
Its common slain be mourned, and let
Its memories soften to regret.

Then shall the Union's mother-heart
Her lost and wandering ones recall,
Forgiving and restoring all:

And Freedom break her marble trance
Above the Capitolian dome,
Stretch hands and bid ye welcome home!

JOHN G. WHITTIER.

Correspondence.

"OUR SOUTHERN BRETHREN."

BOSTON, Nov. 25, 1865.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

DEAR SIR: The enclosed letter from our correspondent has been in my hands for some weeks. I have not sent it to you before because I did not wish to put into print statements so strong as to discourage Northern men from going South until such statements should be confirmed from other sources of information, as they have been.

The letter is dated from Galveston, but does not give the writer's impression of Texas, but of South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama. In the latter State he saved the cotton-laden boat on which he was passing down the Tombigbee River, and his own life with it, by his great coolness in directing the escape of the boat from a band of guerrillas who attacked and followed three miles down the river, an account of which he gave in a letter to his father —not to me. E. A.

WEBOS RANCH, Isaquena Co., Mississippi, Nov. 13, 1865.

I regret to state that under the civil power, now deemed by all the inhabitants of Mississippi (since the order of President Johnson revoking Gen. Slocum's decree in relation to the State militia) to be paramount, the condition of the freedmen, in many portions of the country, has become deplorable and painful in the extreme. I must give it as my deliberate opinion that the freedmen are to-day, in the vicinity of where I am now writing, worse off in most respects than when they were held as slaves. If matters are permitted to continue as they now seem likely to be, it needs no prophet to predict a rising on the part of the colored population, and a terrible scene of bloodshed and desolation; nor can one blame the negroes if this proves to be the result. I have heard, since my arrival here, of numberless atrocities that have been perpetrated against the freedmen. It is sufficient to state that the old overseers are in power again. The agents of the Freedmen's Bureau are almost powerless. Just as soon as the United States troops are withdrawn, it will be unsafe for the agents of the Bureau to remain. The object of the Southerners appears to be to make good their often-repeated assertion to the effect that the negroes would die if they were freed; to make it so, they seem determined to goad them to desperation in order to have an excuse to turn upon and annihilate them. There are within a few miles of where I sit writing several Northern men who have settled here, designing to work plantations; they all assure me that they do not consider themselves safe in the country, and two of them, ex-colonels of the United States army, are afraid to leave their places without an armed escort. Other Northern lessees do not dare remain on their places.

The following is another letter of an earlier date from the same source:

GALVESTON, Texas, Oct. 16, 1865.

DEAR SIR: I leave here this afternoon for Houston. You asked me in your last letter what my ideas were in relation to cotton-planting.

If Northern men will assimilate to these half-civilized Southerners, will consent to give up all the ties that connect them with their homes, promise to oppose negro suffrage to the death, and submit to a constant and untiring surveillance of every action, they will be permitted to remain in this Southern country, although any man born north of Mason and Dixon's line, or who has ever borne arms in the Federal army, will be regarded with more or less distrust, will hear his friends, sentiments, and education made the subject of never-ceasing abuse and vituperation, and must never expect to be allowed to advocate any theory that does not meet general favor. If any man from the North comes down here expecting to hold and maintain radical or abolition sentiments, let him expect to be shot down from behind the first time he leaves his house, and know that his murderer, if ever brought to trial, will be acquitted by the jury. If the military are withdrawn, his home will be no protection, and he may expect to be hung from his own chamber-window. I tell you, Mr. Atkinson, these men are only taking breath and recuperating; not that there is the slightest danger of any immediate outbreak—the Southern people are too smart for that. They will never again measure strength with the North, unless their success be assured beforehand. In case of foreign war or domestic convulsion at the North, they will rise, but they will never try it alone and without assistance. Meantime, they propose to take it out in hating. Already our officers are the subject of a social ostracism.

It will be possible, by minding one's own business and not interfering with politics on either side, by keeping at home as much as possible, and adopting a conciliatory policy, to get along; but for one I should rather plant under the old state of affairs, for then it was fair and open warfare, and we knew what to expect; now there are hundreds of the most bitter and resentful secessionists at home who were then in the army.*

These men say what they will do, and I believe them. I repeat that any man of radical views who comes down here to plant cotton will be in constant danger, day and night, unless he holds his tongue.

The Union that these men fancied they were returning to is the old Union of Pierce and Buchanan. My room-mate on the Magnolia told me he would make one of a party to assassinate all the officers connected with the Freedmen's Bureau in a minute. I told General Gregory of it, but the remark was too common to attract notice. Nevertheless, if people think these threats mean nothing they are much mistaken, else I am a very poor judge of human nature.

Military law is the only chance or hope for permanent order in this unhappy country. I begin to think, with Carlyle, that "America is the dirtiest chimney of the nineteenth century, and must burn itself clean."

The ministers of the Gospel of all denominations, the instructors of the youth of the country, the women and the young men, all hate the North with a degree of intensity that cannot be exaggerated. The only men on whom it is possible to depend, singular as it may appear to you, are the leaders of the South during the war. Convert such a man as their Vice-President, Stephens, and his influence for good will be immense, but the masses of the people are beyond our reach.

The wealthy and educated men of the South are not so foolish but they must see how useless all this blind hate is, and if you can secure their influence in abating it you will have done all that can be done at present. All our officers will confirm my assertion, when I say that the soldiers and officers of the Confederate army are more moderate, more reasonable, and milder in their views than those who never fought for the cause at all.

* Mr. K. attempted cotton-planting last year on the Mississippi.—E. A.

I find our officers are getting to return hate for hate, and no wonder.

They were and are a conquered people, and can only be held as such. They must be held down, or they will hold us down.

THE SOVEREIGNTY OF THE STATES.

III.

THE STATES UNDER THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AND THE CONFEDERATION.

WE have seen that when the people of the colonies took up arms in defence of their liberties they entertained no purpose of revolution, of separation from the mother country, or of establishing a new political sovereignty or sovereignties; that the course of events gradually forced upon them the conviction that their only security was to be found in national independence, and that in proportion as they were weaned from their hereditary reverence for British supremacy, a Congress of their own creation advanced step by step to the sovereign position formerly held by the government of the British Empire. Congress sanctioned the establishment of provisional, and afterwards of permanent, local governments. Congress appointed the leaders and controlled the operations of the national armies which achieved our national redemption, and Congress finally declared the independence of the people of the United States and severed for ever the tie which had bound them to the parent land.

The members of the Congresses of 1794, 1795, and 1796 were appointed partly by the popular branch of the colonial legislatures, in which case it was thought necessary to submit the choice thus made to ratification by popular conventions, partly by members of those legislatures acting, after the dissolution of the assemblies, as self-constituted committees, and, in a still larger proportion, by popular conventions assembled without warrant of law, upon the call of influential individuals. It does not appear, I believe, that in any case the freemen voted directly for the delegates in the primary municipal assemblies, and therefore, as I have before remarked, the immediate relation between constituent and representative did not exist. The members of Congress were accordingly representatives of the people at large, and not of this or that particular district, or county, or other territorial circumscription, and they expressly declared themselves, in the most general and broadest form of expression, to be "delegates appointed by the good people of the colonies." All this clearly shows that the provincial governments, both those which held over under the old colonial organization and those established under the authority of Congress, were regarded as bodies of very limited powers and of purely local jurisdiction, and thus far we find not the slightest countenance for the notion of any sovereignty but that of Congress.

It may seem idle to enquire whether the Declaration of Independence either conferred the attribute of sovereignty upon the States or recognized it as subsisting in them, for it is evident that it was invested with no power to make such a grant, no authority to bind the people by such a concession. But, in spite of unpatriotic sneers at its "glittering generalities," the Declaration of Independence has always been regarded by our soundest statesmen as an authoritative statement of the principles of American liberty, and of the American political system. Hence, though it is of earlier date than the confederation and the Constitution, it is of importance as our expository commentary on those instruments.

The Declaration of Independence, so far from proclaiming the several nationality, sovereignty, or independence of the single States, does not even recite their names, or designate them in any way except by the comprehensive appellation of the United Colonies and the United States of America. There is not in the document, from beginning to end, a single phrase which recognizes even so much as the municipal individuality of the States, except the fact that the collective name of the Republic, whose independence was declared, is, grammatically speaking, a plural. It nowhere appears from this instrument that any one colony had its special history, its special rights and powers, its special grievances, although it is notorious that some of them were, strictly speaking, provinces, some proprietary corporations, and some technical chartered colonies; that their privileges under the British Crown were widely different; and that, in many cases, the tyrannical acts most loudly complained of by one colony in nowise extended to or affected the others, in nowise infringed the rights which those others claimed. If the framers of the Declaration considered the States as distinct, sovereign, and independent, why should they have specified the grievance of one as the grievance of all? What had independent Georgia or South Carolina to do with the oppressions of independent Massachusetts or Virginia? The answer is plain: When the Council and Assembly of New Hampshire resolved that Congress ought to "declare the Thirteen United Colonies AN INDEPENDENT STATE," they spoke the will of that "people" in whose "name" and by whose "authority" Congress issued its for ever memorable Declaration. With the American people, the "Thirteen United Colonies" was but a "geographical expression," not implying plurality of sovereignties. They regarded themselves and were regarded by their delegates as ONE in birth, allegiance, interests, rights, duties, political principles, political destiny. They declared themselves absolved from allegiance to the British crown because, by keeping among "us" standing armies in time of peace, without the consent of "our legislatures;" by cutting off "our" trade with all parts of the world; by imposing taxes on "us" without "our" consent; by taking away "our" charters and abolishing "our" laws; by numerous other acts of purely local tyranny, which injured none but the immediate citizens of the colony aggrieved; and, finally, by plundering "our" seas, ravaging "our" coasts, burning "our" towns, and destroying the lives of "our" people, the King of England had "abdicated the government" of his American subjects and forfeited the sovereignty of their common, undivided, and indivisible country.

Up to this point, then, there is no question that, both historically and legally, the sovereignty, when it departed for ever from the British crown, lodged and became vested in the whole people of the Thirteen United Colonies, or, as they now called themselves, States. It is equally certain, as has been before said, that no one colony or State ever achieved its own separate independence and sovereignty, either with or without the consent of the rest. Hence, it irresistibly follows that the States individually are possessed only of just such and so many of the attributes of sovereignty as the people of the United States have conceded to them.

The words "sovereign" and "sovereignty," it is to be remarked, do not once occur in the Declaration of Independence. They were now and then vaguely used in public documents at an early period of the Revolution, but the first time that either of them is to be met with in a context which both fixes and defines its meaning as applied to the States, is in the Articles of Confederation. The second article of this instrument—which in various passages declares the union witnessed by it to be "perpetual"—runs as follows: "Each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled." In other words, the people of the United States renounced in favor of the individual States all the prerogatives and attributes of sovereignty which they did not, by the Articles of Confederation, expressly reserve to themselves, as represented in Congress. What, then, were the "sovereign" attributes reserved, or, if the words of the instrument be insisted on, "delegated" to the United States, and what were those conceded to, or "retained," by the individual States?

The Articles of Confederation are to be construed, like any other legal instrument, as a whole, and if, through inadvertence, misapprehension, or excess of caution, words, phrases, provisions, or reservations inconsistent with the general scope and purpose of the articles, and with the plain and obvious intent of their authors, were introduced into them, they are to be interpreted in a sense consonant with the general character and object of the document, or rejected altogether as repugnant and void. This is a principle of construction universally applied to contracts, conveyances, wills, and other legal writings between private parties, as also to acts of legislation, to governmental grants and ordinances, and to treaties between sovereign powers. All such instruments are to be so interpreted ut res magis valeat quam pereat, so as not to defeat themselves, and the subordinate word or clause must yield to the supreme and general purpose. Tested by this principle, it will be found that the word "sovereignty," as used in the Articles of Confederation, means only municipal and territorial individuality, and local jurisdiction. The States "retained" the nominal quality of "sovereignty"—a quality now, for the first time, claimed in their behalf—while, by the same act, they acknowledged themselves destitute of all its substantial attributes, just as a king who has abdicated or been deposed is still complimented with the title and ceremonial honors of "Majesty," and as a dowager duchess, though superseded by a younger incumbent, is still saluted as "Your Grace;" or—to use a more national, and therefore a more patriotic illustration—as a gentleman once a member of Congress continues to be addressed as "the Honorable Mr. So-and-so" to the end of his life. The parallel, indeed, is not exact, because the States professed to delegate what they had never possessed—the real prerogatives of independent supremacy—while the dethroned monarch, the widowed lady, the Honorable James Brooks, and the Honorable Fernando Wood have lost material powers and privileges which they once actually enjoyed.

I may here observe, by way of parenthesis, that I am arguing, for the moment, upon the supposition that the Articles of Confederation were really a contract between parties competent to enter into such stipulations. These articles were, indeed, often spoken of at the time as a "compact," but the ablest constitutional expositors have always held that the word, as thus used, did not imply what was not the fact, namely, that it was an instrument whereby certain engagements and certain concessions were really made by independent parties competent of themselves, or duly authorized by others, to contract. The articles were no more a contract than was the Declaration of Independence, which nobody ever dreamed of designating by that appellation. The Congress which framed them was elected in the same informal way as its predecessor; the credentials of a majority of them came from voluntary popular assemblies gathered in pursuance of no law; and though, in a few instances, the State legislatures had passed resolutions vaguely authorizing the delegates to co-operate with those from other States in measures calculated to give greater force and authority to the action of Congress, most of the members had no instructions whatever more specific than simply a testimonial of their election. But a more conclusive objection to the validity of this instrument, regarded purely as a contract between the States, is the want of all power in those corporations to set themselves up as parties to such an instrument. They were, as has been sufficiently shown, in no sense "sovereign," except as any town or even highway district is sovereign; they were not independent, except as their people shared in the common independence which all were struggling to conquer. The Articles of Confederation, then, were an application by the people of the United States of the principles promulgated in the name and by the authority of that people in the Declaration of Independence. They were in the concrete what the Declaration was in the abstract.

But to return to the question, What sovereignty was reserved or delegated to the United States, what conceded to or retained by the individual States?

The first article provides that the style of the confederacy shall be "The United States of America."

The second has been already quoted.

By the third, the States "enter into a firm league of friendship with each other for their common defence, the security of their liberties, and their mutual and general welfare, and pledge themselves to assist each other against all force offered to, or to attacks made upon, them or any of them," etc., etc.

The fourth recognizes a community of rights in the whole people of the Union, by securing to the citizens of each the rights of citizenship in all—a provision utterly inconsistent with the idea of a distinct nationality or political sovereignty in each State.

The ninth declares Congress to be invested with the sole and exclusive right and power of determining on peace or war; of sending and receiving ambassadors; entering into treaties and alliances; establishing prize courts; deciding all disputes between States concerning boundary, jurisdiction, or any other cause whatever, and all disputes growing out of conflicting grants of land by different States; regulating the alloy and value of coin; fixing the standard of weights and measures; establishing post-offices; raising money on the credit of the United States; building and equipping a navy; directing the operations of the land and naval forces of the Union, and with other important prerogatives of sovereignty.

On the other hand:

By the sixth article the States are forbidden to receive embassies; to enter into any conference, agreement, alliance, or treaty with foreign powers or with each other; to lay any duties which may interfere with the stipulations of treaties entered into by Congress; to maintain an army or a navy in time of peace, or to engage in war except for self-defense in case of actual invasion.

After all this, it is very evident that those who insisted on the concession or retention of the "sovereignty" of the States had no clear notions of the meaning of the word. It could not be intended to cover the right of secession; for by the very terms of the confederation, Article 13, the Union was declared to be perpetual, and it is difficult to imagine how any statesman could ever have supposed a government to be "sovereign" which could have no foreign relations, or even be known to foreign powers as having any political existence except as a municipal corporation; which could not maintain at its will an army or a navy; and which had, moreover, expressly acknowledged the supremacy of another body in every attribute, every power, every jurisdiction, by which nations are known to the world as bodies politic.

True, the States could tax their own citizens for purposes contemplated by the constitutions which they had framed for themselves by authority of Congress. So can every city, and, in States where people learn to read, so can every school-district; but they are not, therefore, sovereign.

They could define and punish crime. So can many inferior jurisdictions. The city of Boston made it a crime to smoke cigars in the streets, and punished its first mayor for a violation of this law; but Boston is not, for this reason, an empire. They could organize and discipline a militia. The city of London had, and perhaps still has, its "Train-bands," but it acknowledges the supremacy of Parliament.

The great defect of the confederation was the want of an express grant by the people to Congress of powers necessary for efficiently carrying out the will of the people, not the reservation of powers to the States which, from the very nature of the case, they were incompetent to exercise. The question of MacFingal:

> "For what is your Congress and its end?
> A power to advise and recommend!"

suggests the difficulty, though it does not state it with logical precision. So far as the foreign relations of the Union were concerned, Congress had most, though certainly not all, of the necessary powers. The Government could have gone on had Congress been invested with the means of making itself respected and obeyed at home. While the war lasted, the pressure of necessity and the spirit of patriotic forbearance secured, in a sufficient degree, the harmony requisite for the conduct of the military operations; but that pressure once removed, the elements of discord developed themselves, and it was seen that the people of the Union must provide, by a new fundamental law, more energetic and authoritative organs for the expression and the execution of its sovereign will. G. P. M.

MRS. GASKELL.

LONDON, Nov. 18, 1865.

THE ranks of our English novelists have sustained a heavy loss by the death of Mrs. Gaskell. The death was a very sudden and unexpected one. Within the last few months Mrs. Gaskell had bought a small house in the little Hampshire market-town of Alton, and was stopping there for the purpose of furnishing it. On Sunday she was dining with her daughters, when she suddenly fell off her chair. She died within a few hours, and, I believe, was never conscious after her seizure. On your side the Atlantic she must have numbered thousands of readers, as I have seen her novels in book-stalls all over the Union. She counted many Americans amongst her intimate friends, and her house at Manchester was visited by almost every American traveller who had letters from the New England literary community. On this account, as well as from the fact that she was in many ways a representative English writer of the highest class, I think you will like to know what little there is to tell of the authoress of "Mary Barton."

If you can pardon the paradox, I should say that the most remarkable feature about Mrs. Gaskell's life was that there was so singularly little to be said about it. Even in these days, when novel-writing is about the most lucrative of professions, women seldom become authoresses unless there is something exceptional about their lives. Most of our chief lady novelists have in some form or other strayed beyond the fold of commonplace existence before they began to write—have, in fact, life-dramas of their own. As far as I am aware, Mrs. Gaskell had none, except in as far as any human being has some sort of drama in which he or she has been the chief performer. Her early life was, I have heard, passed at Knutsford—the original of "Cranford." At the ordinary age that English girls marry, she married the Rev. William Gaskell, who has been for many years the minister of one of the chief Unitarian chapels in Manchester, and who was then, and is still, one of the most popular ministers in the Unitarian denomination. Americans, used to the tolerance which prevails amongst them with regard to religious differences, must find it difficult to understand the social penalties—if it is not too strong a word—adhering to the mere fact of not belonging to the Established Church in England. In the great manufacturing towns of the North, the Unitarians are an opulent and influential body, and Unitarianism has always been considered, I scarcely know why, the most genteel, or, more strictly speaking, the least ungenteel, form of dissent in England. Still, as a matter of fact, the wealth and rank and intelligence and culture of English society are to be found amidst the members of the State Church; and if you do not belong to it you are placed socially at a disadvantage. This fact accounts, I think, to some extent for the length of time which elapsed before Mrs. Gaskell entered the field of literature. My impression is that she must have been close upon forty before she began to write, or, at any rate, to publish. It was in the year 1848 that she first came before the world. Some short time before she had lost her only son, and in order to distract her grief she took to writing. The result was "Mary Barton." The book was published anonymously, and I have been told that even members of her own family were ignorant of its authorship till long after it had made its appearance. The novel was a brilliant success. In those days of 1848 and 1849—those anni mirabiles of Continental revolution—the working-man question had assumed an importance it has never quite attained to since. It is not my intention—God knows—to decry in any way the cause of labor; and it was the fact that the model working-man, the intelligent mechanic, was credited at that period with virtues and acquirements which calmer consideration has not led the public to endorse to the extent which was then fashionable. "Mary Barton" coincided exactly with the popular enthusiasm of the day. It was a plea for the operative as against the employer of labor, and as such it created an immense sensation. The cotton interest resented bitterly charges which they held to be ill-founded; and when it was discovered that the author of "Mary Barton" was a Manchester lady, the wife of a minister to whose congregation many of the chief mill-owners belonged, very great indignation was not only felt but expressed by the society in which Mrs. Gaskell had hitherto moved. In fact, she was very much in the position that I suppose a Southern clergyman's wife who had written an anti-slavery novel would have been in some years ago in America.

However, the popular success of "Mary Barton" must have more than compensated for the ill-feeling it created amidst the cottonocracy as the name of its author became known. Mrs. Gaskell found herself famous. Never, I think, was there a woman less injured by success, or who bore her honors more quietly and retiringly. I remember—at the time she first visited London as a successful authoress—an anecdote worth, perhaps, repeating now. She was seated at a dinner-party by Bulwer. In the course of conversation, she asked Sir Edward if he knew Manchester. "The only thing," was the baronet's answer, "that I ever knew about Manchester was that Mary Barton was born there." But in spite of her success, Mrs. Gaskell never entered much into literary society. Her visits to London were neither long nor frequent, and her home was with her family at Manchester, where she led, I fancy, rather a secluded life. She was a slow writer, and with the exception of some short stories and sketches which appeared in Dickens's "Household Words," she allowed four years to elapse from the publication of "Mary Barton" before she brought out her second novel. "Ruth" was comparatively a failure. In the first place, the star of Currer Bell had arisen meanwhile, and had somewhat eclipsed that of the authoress of "Mary Barton." And secondly, the subject-matter of "Ruth" was one with which Mrs. Gaskell was scarcely qualified to deal. It was her nature to resent bitterly injustice and wrong, and "Ruth" was intended to be a protest against the cruelty of our social laws towards fallen women. But the very purity and sensitiveness and refinement of Mrs. Gaskell's mind rendered it impossible for her to describe a Magdalene in her true colors. The element of passion was one above or below her grasp, as you choose to consider; and "Ruth's" fault was polished away to such minute dimensions that she had really nothing in common except her womanhood with the poor lost women whose wrongs Mrs. Gaskell sought to expose. "Ruth" was followed by "Cranford," and by "North and South," both which novels appeared originally in "Household Words." Clever as these novels were—perfect, indeed, as delineations of different phases of English life—they lacked, somehow, any central interest, and they did not do more than sustain the reputation of their authoress.

In 1857 Mrs. Gaskell brought out her life of Charlotte Brontë—the cleverest, in my judgment, of all her writings. The dreary life of Haworth, the chill, bleak moorland scenery, the strange, uncanny Brontë household, are brought before the reader with a dramatic power unequalled in any modern biography that I know of. Unfortunately, this book, which will unite the fame of Currer Bell with that of Mrs. Gaskell, was the cause of bitter trouble to its author. It was undertaken as a labor of love, and the biographer identified herself with the fortunes of the Brontës to an extent which obscured the calmness of her judgment. The proximate cause of the sort of Nemesis which overtook the Brontës was the misconduct of their only brother. Naturally enough, the sisters attributed his ruin not so much to his own wickedness and weakness as to an unfortunate liaison which he was supposed to have formed. Mrs. Gaskell, taking the Brontë view of the question, commented on the assumed depravity and falsehood of the lady in question in very strong terms. Friends of the lady took the matter up, and Mrs. Gaskell was forced to acknowledge that her statements were not borne out by the evidence at her command. The affair would have been unpleasant to any one, but the authoress of "Mary Barton" was too sensitive not to feel the annoyance to an almost morbid degree.

Some years, I should think, must have elapsed before she brought out her next novel, "Sylvia's Lovers." Here, too, the inability to comprehend, or at any rate depict, passion of the highest order marred the great beauty of the work. With the exception of "Mary Barton," none of her novels was so popular as "Wives and Daughters," which for the last year has been publishing in the "Cornhill Magazine." I hear that it is not finished in MS., so that we shall never know the end of Molly's heart-aches and Cynthia's flirtations. Strangely enough, the last pages Mrs. Gaskell must well-nigh have written were those describing the sudden death of Osborne Kenley, and the trouble which befell the household. Within a few days her own house was to be in mourning for a death not less sudden.

Whenever the literary history of our time is written, one of its most curious features will be the extraordinary success of women as novelists. "If there is one thing," Lord Macaulay said, "about which mankind are honest, it is in the books they read." The circulation, therefore, of a book is a very fair estimate of the value placed upon it by the public. Judged by this test, the literary claims of our female novelists are indisputable. Currer Bell, Mrs. Gaskell, Miss Evans, Miss Braddon, Miss Young, and Mrs. Riddell stand in the very first rank of popular novelists. Amongst this company Mrs. Gaskell would hold a very high place indeed. In power of delineation, in the finish of her word-painting, in the grace of her style, she perhaps excelled any of her fellow-writers. Moreover, in these days when Carlyle and Ruskin have done so much to destroy the grand simplicity of English writing, it is no small praise to say that she wrote plain Saxon English.

In private life she was a bright, kindly English lady, as free from the affectations of authorship as if she had never written anything but a private letter in her life. I should fancy that as a young woman she must have been very handsome. Even late in life there was a very present beauty about her broad, high forehead, and her deep, wistful eyes, and her sweet, sad smile. For many long years she had always taken a deep interest in the question of American slavery; and, unlike many of the old anti-slavery party, she, though living in Manchester, never failed to express her strong sympathy for the cause of the North. One of her latest magazine papers was an article in "Macmillan's Magazine" on the death of Colonel Shaw. And those, I believe, who knew her best, loved her even more as a woman than they admired her as a writer.

THE UNSETTLED STATE OF EUROPE.

PARIS, November 3, 1865.

TWO years ago Europe was looking towards America, and deplored, with a pity mixed with disdain, the unhappy events which, in her opinion, could only end in the final disruption of your republic. On your side all was anarchy, disorganization, and weakness; on her side, all was firm and solid. The momentary greatness of the American democracy was nothing but a castle built of cards, an artificial structure without foundation, which the wind of the first revolution would overturn. Our political Cassandras did not spare their gloomy prophecies, their interested advice, their profound counsels. But now all is changed; they seem like men awakened from a long slumber; they rub their eyes, and see you, with astonishment and envy, stronger than ever, more united, and, worst of all, better than ever, since you have thrown off slavery, which was your crime and their opportunity, your weakness and their strength. And, as they look around and condescend to choose a nearer field for the exercise of their sublime intellects, they see that everything in their own Europe is as uncertain as it seemed to be some time ago in America. Not that civil war is openly raging between the nations of the old continent, and that great armies meet on the old battle-fields of the Rhine, of Italy, and of Germany, but the political field is utterly confused; it seems as if some wicked hand had thrown into utter disorder the pieces of the chess-board, and tossed kings and bishops and knights into an inextricable heap. The "balance of power" is utterly lost, and so is the balance of the mind. In this Europe of the nineteenth century, which prides itself on its liberalism, the axioms and dogmas of Hobbes, of Macchiavelli, of Julius Cæsar, are reviving like forgotten phantoms. Between historical rights and popular rights, between legitimacies and nationalities, between Cæsarism and democracy, the minds of men are lost, like a ship among breakers or contrary currents. Before I enter into any details and attempt to draw a picture of our political chaos, I will say at once that this extraordinary confusion arises from the fact that the establishment and triumph of the second French Empire has acted on Europe like a dissolving force. There is a permanent contradiction between the aims of the empire and its means. A system which intends to represent democracy and crushes the people under the weight of its despotism, which appeals to nationalities and nurses in its armies the love of war and of adventures, which pretends to be founded on universal suffrage and leaves only a nominal power to the representatives of the people, is, in fact, a living lie; it has corrupted public opinion in France, and the extraordinary triumphs of its policy abroad have finally corrupted public opinion all over Europe. The spirit of the second of December, made up of fraud and violence, has conquered everything. The old votaries of liberty and of liberal institutions, the candid admirers of political sincerity, feel themselves humbled and forgotten; they are dead among the living. They are obliged to turn their eyes to America in order to satisfy themselves that a free people may exist, that Cæsars, Bonapartes, and Bismarks are not absolutely necessary to a nation, that diplomacy can be something else than a fraud. But with majorities, be they made of the people or of sovereigns, success is good conduct; the means are forgotten in the end; and after a time the means themselves are admired, even when they at first seemed wicked and fraudulent.

I believe in moral epidemics as much as I do in cholera or the plague. The contagion of that spirit which I cannot better characterize than by calling it the spirit of the Second of December has pervaded one nation after another. You may think me a monomaniac, but I have even at times discovered a trace of it in the secession of the South; the insurrection of the Southern States was planned by men of whom many had visited France at the time of the establishment of the empire. The movement of secession was nothing but a coup d'état, an attempt to overthrow an established constitution and to substitute might for right. But I will not follow this comparison too far, but go back to Europe. To-day I shall confine myself to Germany, as the German question is about to take on presently a prominent importance.

The condition of Austria is critical, even more so than that of Prussia; the last Italian war has left this ancient empire in a state which may well alarm its statesmen. They tried first, after the termination of the war which separated Lombardy from the empire, to enter on the path of constitutional government, in order to give some satisfaction to the numerous nationalities which compose the population of Austria. But in order to realize this progress, it was thought necessary to harmonize the laws of the country. Schmerling made it his object to create an Austrian parliament under the name of Reichsrath, and to destroy the municipal and provincial institutions, which he thought in opposition with his schemes of centralized government. Had his views been sincerely supported by the crown, had his new constitution been inspired by a spirit of real liberalism, it would, perhaps, have been possible to merge the numerous nationalities of Austria in a new nation—to substitute a feeling of unionism for the secular provincialism of the Germans, the Tchegues, the Hungarians, the Slavonic races; but this was not the case. The Emperor felt in a measure the necessity of a change, but he did not desire to leave too great a place to constitutional and liberal ideas; his instincts were at variance with his interest; in his court nothing but hatred and disdain was felt for these rising men, most of them of obscure rank and condition, who dreamt of introducing the habits of free government in a country which has always been subjected to despotism. Without the active and generous support of the executive power, it is not possible to impose constitutional government on a numerous and proud aristocracy. But this was not the only obstacle. Had all the nations of Austria cheerfully sent their representatives to the Reichsrath, it might have become a real and living parliament, though with great difficulty; but one nation stood aloof, and that nation happened to be one of the most important in the empire, not only by its numbers, but also by its traditions and its history. Hungary would not be represented in the Austrian parliament, and, if Hungary is not Austria, it may at least be said that Austria is not Austria without Hungary. The Magyars maintained that there was only, and could only be, what they called a personal union between their old kingdom and the empire; they were unwilling to change anything in their old constitution and to accept the changes forced momentarily upon them after their unsuccessful rebellion of 1848; Francis Joseph was nothing to them if he did not come among them to receive from the hands of their primate the crown of St. Stephen. They owed their loyalty to the King of Hungary, not to the Emperor of Austria. Many attempts were made to reconcile these historic theories with the necessities of the time and of parliamentary government; it would be idle to tell the long story of the negotiations of the party of centralization and of the party of the personal union. The resistance on the part of the Hungarian noblemen was due to their pride, to their hatred of constitutional government, and to their desire to oppress the secondary nationalities which had long been subjected to the Magyars; on the part of the followers of Kossuth it was owing to revolutionary ideas, to the hatred of the Hapsburg, and to the desire of separating Hungary altogether from Austria.

In the face of such a unanimous hostility, the Reichsrath and the crown were powerless; the new parliament was like a man whose right arm has been cut. It was legislating for the empire without being composed of the representatives of the whole empire. The Emperor did not see with as much sorrow as the Austrian liberals the inanity of the first efforts made for introducing the parliamentary system into his empire. When these efforts were proved vain, he determined to throw himself on the side of the old Hungarian aristocracy. He was encouraged to take this step by Bismark, when Austria became the ally of Prussia against Denmark. The object of Bismark was simple enough; he had a great desire not to see Austria become a constitutional power, and he knew that the Emperor would wound the ambitions and passions of Germany if he sacrificed to the Hungarian nationality the hopes of the German populations of his empire. The young Emperor did not appreciate fully the treacherous designs of his new ally; he believed in the promise which Bismark undoubtedly made to support him if Italy, aided or not by France, attempted to conquer Venetia. He did not, however, dare to suppress the constitution which he had himself given to his people; he merely suspended it, but this suspension is equivalent to its abolition. Every wish of the Hungarian magnates has been satisfied. Hungary is to preserve its historic rights, its complete autonomy, and even its despotic authority over the Slavonic populations which have so long been enslaved by the Magyars. The Croats, the Transylvanian Germans, the Hungarian Wallachs, are sacrificed in the new system which has bought up the loyalty of Hungary. The constitutional revolution which has just taken place, far from being a liberal revolution, is a reaction towards aristocratic and feudal ideas. The Emperor is now levying taxes without the consent and vote of a parliament, and he finds himself again in the place where his ancestors used to be; he may be cheered in Pesth by a crowd of magnates, but he has lost the confidence and affection of the most enlightened among his German subjects. The step which he has taken may not be a definite one; he may soon try a new policy. But these variations, these irresolutions, are perhaps the most alarming symptoms of the unsettled condition of his empire. Any system is better than no system. Austria seems to me like a patient who tries doctor after doctor, and medicine after medicine, and hastens in that way the fatal conclusion of an incurable disease. Incurable! The word is, perhaps, too severe; I have drawn a dark picture of the state of the empire, and I could have made it much darker, if I had spoken of its finances; but to give you the real expression of my thought, I must add, nevertheless, that there is in this old empire a strange and astonishing vitality, that it has often met with even greater dangers, that defeat and adversity seem to have no complete power over this singular country, made of so many distinct and even hostile nations; its position in the valley of the Danube, between the highly cultivated parts of Germany and the semi-barbarous nations of the Lower Danube and of Turkey, ensure to it an importance which the follies of its rulers and the faults of its government can hardly destroy. It is like a trait d'union between civilization and barbarism; between Christianity and Mohammedanism; the friends of progress ought not, therefore, to wish for its complete dismemberment and destruction; they ought rather to desire that the spirit of liberty should enter and pervade the old edifice, which has been erected during the Middle Ages. Looking at events from this point of view, I am not of those who applaud the actual triumphs of the Hungarian aristocracy. I regret that the Austrian Reichsrath should have been such a short-lived and impotent parliament; I believe that even German bureaucracy and pedantry is better than the domination of petty magnates, than the enslavement of the rural populations, than the disintegration of the empire, resolving itself in a hundred jealous little states, than the abdication of European culture before the Eastern culture. I still hope that the day may come when Austria, abandoning her last conquests in Italy, will throw all her energies in the direction of the Lower Danube, without losing its legitimate importance in Germany. But I hardly expect to see my wishes realized without great convulsions, without wars and revolutions. Nations, like men, seem unable to learn much by the experience of others, and often learn little from their own experience. Nothing but force could drive Austria from Lombardy, though every sensible Austrian felt that Austria was in Lombardy like a stranger, and could never win the loyalty of the Italian people. The strong quadrilateral of Verona and Mantua still defends Venetia against the legitimate hopes and ambitions of Italy, and nothing but force will drive the Austrian armies from the last parts of Italian soil which they defiantly preserve. To all the difficulties which are here presented, add those which arise from the confused state of the German confederation, from the intermeddling of Austria in the Danish affairs, from the dangers which may arise from the convention of Gastein signed between Austria and Prussia, and you must acknowledge that the position of Austria is far from being an enviable one and that their story forms a fit chapter of these studies of what I have called "the unsettled state of Europe."

A. L.

OLD FRIENDS WITH NEW FACES.

THE bloodlessness of turnips is a fact undoubtedly established by science; but the kindred assumption, that diplomatic correspondence must be dry and juiceless, is one on which we have learned to look with misgiving, especially since we read Mr. Seward's report on Mexican affairs for 1865. It is a large volume of state papers, to which the student of contemporary history may turn for instruction concerning the French conquest of Mexico, and the foundation of Archduke Maximilian's imperial rocking-chair upon the volcanic ruins of the republic; but the report has also a lighter character, which opens upon the reader with the charm of surprise when he comes to the account given to Mr. Seward, by the Mexican Minister, of the dinner which the latter received last year from distinguished citizens of New York, in compliment to his personal and official qualities.

Señor Romero had cause (as what public man who has ever been reported has not cause?) to be dissatisfied with the newspaper histories of the dinner and its eloquence, and he prepared in Spanish a faithful relation of the whole affair, which he caused to be exactly done into English, and which he then sent to Mr. Seward. This relation embraces a narrative not only of the dinner in question, but also of a previous dinner given by Señor Romero to the eminent gentlemen who afterwards returned his compliment. In both cases full reports of the speeches are given, with brief notices of the character and position of the guests, and a statement of the places which they relatively occupied at the time, while the whole is concluded with a copy of the bill of fare, diplomatically subscribed "Delmonico." An exalted restaurateur is thus made to fill that high station in public affairs to which his talents entitle him, and his bill of fare assumes the dignity of a state paper. It is, of course, not possible to say that if Mr. Delmonico could have foreseen the distinction he was to achieve in Mexican affairs he would not have subscribed his bill of fare, addressing it to some personified general public, "I have the honor, sir, to renew to you the assurance of my distinguished consideration—Delmonico;" but we rejoice that the choice was not offered him of language alien to the national spirit, and that his name appears signed with a republican simplicity, "Fruits et Dessert—Delmonico." We imagine that this fortunate accident must have consoled Mexican patriots fighting against the government forced upon their country, while it gave all Spanish-America a pledge that the representation of the principle of Spanish-American liberty was worthily entrusted in this country to a man who could dine at such a democratic restaurateur's. We hope it has also not been without effect in Europe. We figure to ourselves the dismay of courts not accustomed to the publication of bills of fare among state papers when they came to that august signature, "Fruits et Dessert—Delmonico," and tried to evolve a meaning from the appearance of the bill among our public documents, and we suppose that the Emperor of the French, who, while in this country, had scarcely the means of making acquaintance with those costly birds, must have been greatly disturbed by the words "canvas-back ducks" among the rotis. That imperial Macchiavelli would suspect a more dangerous game than that which plainly appears to us under the name given, and, remembering Mr. Pickwick's declaration of love disguised in the phrase, "Chops and tomato-sauce," would shudder at the menace with which these canvas-back ducks might be stuffed.

But it is not in the reproduction of Mr. Delmonico's bill of fare that Señor Romero is most ingenious, that Mr. Seward is most amusing. The one eminent statesman furnishes to the other, in the biographical notices of his guests which we have already mentioned, a great deal that is useful for Spanish-Americans to know, and even more entertaining for us to read. Perhaps, also, there is instruction for us in all this; and the Secretary of State has, while he diverted, wished to teach us by what slight shades of misconception the alien mind produces a ludicrous image of that which is gravest and awfullest in our esteem. The French, who love to call Shakespeare the Divine Williams, and who always spoke of a certain English statesman as Sir Peel, have produced the same sort of flavorous absurdity which Señor Romero carries to such delightful excess in his relation. It is not a mistake, but something much droller than a mistake, when he describes Mr. Bancroft as enjoying "a well-deserved reputation as a literary man," and Mr. H. E. Pierrepont as a "protector of the fine arts," and belonging "to one of the oldest and most respectable Huguenot families." Hon. George Folsom is a "distinguished member of the Ethnological Society of New York, and consequently a noted philologist;" Mr. J. W. Hammersley is "of an ancient and notable family in this city," and though not a politician (because, singularly enough, of his "independent position"), "his heart is entirely American, and he considers that the absolute independence of this continent from the old is (as he eloquently expresses it) a principle filtered in the veins of every true son of Washington by the milk that he has drawn from his mother's breast, a password and countersign, and a terrible monition to Europe!" It is on Mr. Bryant, however, that Señor Romero expends the wealth of his peculiar powers of characterization, and we cannot forbear presenting to our readers the reflex of our reverend poet in the admiring Spanish-American mind:

"Mr. William Cullen Bryant is a most respectable elderly person, great poet, eminent literary man, and one of the first editors of the press of this city. As a poet he has been a perfect prodigy of precocity and lengthened genius, to be compared only with Lope de Vega and Voltaire. When he was only nine years old he published his first verses, and at thirteen a regular poem, in connection with other beautiful compositions, was issued to the eyes of the world. He is now over seventy years of age, and has just given light to a new poem that has called forth the eulogy of the press, and in which his robust mental faculties have not deteriorated in the slightest degree. By the refined taste displayed in his compositions, he is considered as a poet of the most classical taste that this nation has hitherto produced. To the golden crown that girdles his venerable head may be added the respectability which Mr. Bryant enjoys for his knowledge, his well-tried probity, and his constancy in defending the most disinterested political opinions. In regard to these, Mr. Bryant belongs to the extreme portion of the Republican party, being, consequently, an abolitionist. Septuagenary as he is, he still preserves the moral and physical vigor of youth, and is ready to defend any cause that has for a foundation liberty and justice; he has also all the necessary activity to be even now chief editor of the New York Evening Post."

It is, of course, not possible to know what may have been the Spanish of which Señor Romero says the foregoing is "a correct translation in the English language;" but we assure him that the English is very funny, and that it reads like the English of a Spaniard who had acquired fluency in our tongue from perusal of the newspapers. Señor Romero could scarcely have understood this, however, and it is difficult to comprehend why the Secretary of State, to whom all this was unofficially addressed, should have caused it to be printed in a public document. Señor Romero would have been amply protected from the mischief likely to attend his erroneously reported remarks by the publication of the remarks alone; and the condition of Republican Mexico is such that she can ill afford to have her representative laughed at to serve the end we have hinted. If the Secretary of State merely wished to make fun, why, there are the reports of our own ambassadors abroad, which are sometimes infinitely amusing.

Literature.

LITERARY NOTES.

THE oldest literary property in England is now in the market. The proprietor of the venerable "Gentleman's Magazine," Mr. John Henry Parker, of Oxford, finding himself obliged to live in the south of Europe on account of ill health, announces that he is unable to give it the requisite degree of attention, and is willing to treat with a purchaser. It is to be hoped, for the sake of the associations connected with the name of "Sylvanus Urban," that it may fall into hands which will keep up its old renown. It is now one hundred and thirty-four years since Edward Cave sent out to the world, with considerable misgivings, No. 1 of his sixpenny pamphlet, whose destiny was to outlive all its contemporaries and the greater portion of the periodicals that have started since. It was founded on a basis of pure piracy, being mostly a selection from the papers of the day, with scarcely a word of original matter, as the motto, still to be read on the cover (of interest to Americans), "E Pluribus Unum," proclaims. The extraordinary success of this compilation led to its gradual improvement, to which the advice and co-operation of Dr. Johnson much contributed. In 1778, Mr. John Nichols, the celebrated literary antiquary, became connected with the magazine. Under his charge it assumed the decided turn for antiquarian subjects of all kinds—topographical, literary, historical, etc., that has ever since distinguished it. That fine scholar and genial writer, Rev. John Mitford, became editor about 1830, when a "New Series" was commenced. The most brilliant period of the magazine's existence was at this date, and for a few years subsequently. Many of Mr. Mitford's papers are extraordinary and attractive specimens of learning, fine taste, and vivacity, and would well bear republication in a separate form. About ten years since the veteran periodical became the property of Mr. Parker, the Oxford publisher. He is well known for his various books on Gothic architecture and kindred subjects, and has done more for the revival of those studies than any other non-professional man. The leading tastes of an editor are sure to be reflected in the works under his control, and the "Gentleman's Magazine" has of late been rather too exclusively devoted to architectural antiquities, so that it needs a new editor, such as Rev. A. Dyce or Mr. J. P. Collier, to restore the balance that should exist between literary and graphic antiquarianism. One of its most valuable features has been kept up through more than a century with commendable care—its "Obituary," or biographical sketches of deceased persons. This makes the two hundred and twenty volumes that now form the set indispensable for every library of reference, and it is accordingly to be found in most of our public and large private collections.

—If ever there was a writer unsuited for the mass of the British public who patronize cheap literature at the railway book-stalls, we should say it was Dr. O. W. Holmes, and that the "Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table" was the book they could least understand or sympathize with. Nevertheless, the accidents of literary proprietorship play strange freaks with books. The "Autocrat" now exemplifies both extremes of the booksellers' scale. Three or four rival twenty-five cent editions compete for purchasers from the million, while an embellished impression "with twenty-four illustrations engraved by Linton, from drawings by J. Gordon Thomas," is got up to attract the more select and the aristocratic classes. Dr. Holmes may well enjoy this unsought-for and genuine acknowledgment of the merits of his works.

—Contemporary with the French translation lately mentioned of "Mrs. Caudle's Curtain Lectures," appears a fine English edition illustrated with a chromo-lithograph and numerous wood-cuts by Charles Keene, beautifully printed on an extra-toned paper, etc., so that Douglas Jerrold's jeu d'esprit may fairly be considered a classic. No other contribution to Punch, not even excepting Thackeray's "Book of Snobs" or "Jeames's Diary," has met with anything like the same success. Since the loss of John Leech, indeed, that paper has lost much of its old attraction, and its value as a property has seriously diminished. Some of Leech's best designs, which had been mostly lost sight of, are contained in a handsome volume just published, entitled "Follies of the Year." It is composed of the series of colored etchings made by Leech for the frontispieces of "Punch's Pocket-Books" for no less than twenty years, 1844 to 1864, with some explanatory notes by Shirley Brooks. The collecting of Cruikshank's etchings and wood-cuts has become a recognized pursuit in England; it is not difficult to foresee that every scrap and fragment from Leech's pencil will soon possess an equal or superior value.

—The new work by Algernon Charles Swinburne, "Chastelard: A Tragedy," is now in press from the sheets supplied in advance of publication, as per agreement, to Messrs. Hurd & Houghton. In what style the author of "Atalanta in Calydon," whose mind seems (to judge from that work) thoroughly saturated and interpenetrated with classical feeling, will treat a subject of more modern date and less remote interest, is a legitimate subject of curious enquiry for poetical students. The success of "Atalanta" will probably call the attention of our publishers to Mr. Swinburne's first publication, "The Queen Mother and Rosamond: Two Plays," as yet hardly known to American readers.

—The publishers of the Globe edition of "Shakespeare's Complete Works," Messrs. Macmillan & Co., announce with justifiable satisfaction that the sale already, within, we believe, less than a year, has exceeded fifty thousand copies, and they are now advancing steadily beyond that number. This is an extraordinary result to happen with a book that every reader was supposed already to be in possession of, and shows what an inexhaustible mine the first-class works of the world always present for intelligent enterprise. A good article, combined with a low price, will always attract purchasers, without any possibility of glutting the market. "The Globe Shakespeare" is carefully edited by the gentlemen engaged in the preparation of the Cambridge edition in eight vols. 8vo. The typography is clear and legible, though, we think, neither the type nor the size and shape of the book will compare with a one-volume Shakespeare published by Whittingham in 1830, now very scarce. The latter, however, was issued at one guinea, and the "Globe Shakespeare" at three-and-sixpence, which accounts in a great measure for the favorable reception it has met with. The "Globe Shakespeare" has not been reprinted in this country, but quantities of the English edition have been introduced with the names of American publishers on the title, and by a curious variation from former usage the selling price has been actually raised considerably above the current English rate, to adapt it to the present increased scale of charge for American books.

—The recognition of the rights of authors and artists implied in the passage of an international copyright law between England and France, is gradually bearing fruit in the increased relations between the literary men of the two countries, and the interchange of artistic works, as book illustrations, etc., which are made available for impressions in both languages. By arrangements of this nature the talents of Gustave Doré are becoming as familiarly known in England as in his native country. His designs would almost have defied the copyist, or, at all events, could not have been reproduced in that manner at anything like a remunerative price. Now, by stereotypes and duplicate impressions of the plates, they are issued with English text as regularly in London as in Paris. His illustrations to the Bible have cost the owners for designing and engraving nearly four hundred thousand francs. When an outlay of this magnitude can be divided and partly borne by a foreign house, the chances that really good works will be undertaken are much increased, and the arts receive an impulse accordingly. A beautifully illustrated book by M. Figuier has just been published by Messrs. Chapman & Hall, "The World before the Deluge," translated from the French, with two hundred and twenty-five ideal landscapes of the ancient world, figures of animals, plants, fossil remains, etc. These are the identical illustrations of the Paris edition. Another elegant scientific book is now preparing on the same plan, "The Heavens, an Illustrated Hand-Book of Popular Astronomy," by Amédée Guillemin, edited by I. Norman Lockyer, imperial 8vo, with over two hundred chromo-lithographs and wood-cuts by M. Becquet, of Paris. These facts are worth noting, as showing the emollient effects of literature on traditional national hatreds and antipathies, now, happily, growing more and more obsolete every day.

—Another brother of the Kingsley family appears in literature, though in an entirely different department from those occupied by the Cambridge professor of history and his brother Henry, the novelist. Dr. G. H. Kingsley comes forward as editor of one of the forthcoming issues of "The Early English Text Society"—a reprint of Francis Thynne's strictures on Speght's edition of Chaucer, 1598, a curious specimen of Elizabethan philological criticism, entitled "Animadversions upon the Annotacions and Corrections of some Imperfectiones of Impressiones of Chaucer's Workes reprinted in 1598." The other parts furnished for the present year's guinea subscription by the society are "The Story of Genesis and Exodus," an early English song of about 1250 A.D., now first edited by Mr. R. Morris from the unique MS. in Corpus Christi College, Cambridge; "Morte d'Arthure," from the Thornton MSS. preserved in the library of London cathedral; "The Romance of Merlin," from a MS. in the Public Library, Cambridge; and Sir David Lyndesay's "Monarche," from the impression of 1552, an edition lately discovered of this work of the Scottish poet, six years earlier than any previously known to exist.

—Two of the most distinguished authors of France, already famous in other walks of literature, M. Thiers and M. Henri Taine, are making their début as writers on art. The first volume of a "History of Art," by M. Thiers, is just about to appear, and great expectations are raised concerning it from the well-known general "habileté" of the author on every subject that he discusses. It is now said that M. Thiers began his literary career as an art critic, and that his mode of treating art matters marked a new era in journalism. M. Taine's work is already published, and, under the title "Philosophie de l'Art," contains the substance of his inaugural lectures as professor of the School of Fine Arts at Paris. In it he inculcates the idea that the philosophical study of art is no longer to be pursued by itself, apart from the other departments of human knowledge, and that the business of philosophy in relation to art is no more to frame axioms and definitions, but to point out natural effects and laws, testing its different manifestations by their sympathies for nature and humanity, and rejecting nothing as low or ignoble that harmonizes with their feelings.

—The scanty musical literature of England has been much enriched lately by new publications, which, though chiefly translations from the German, show that an interest in the cultivation of the science is gradually increasing, and with it the number of purchasers for books on the subject. It is curious that while the unpromising period of the last century gave birth to two such standard and voluminous works as the "Histories of Music" by Dr. Burney and Sir John Hawkins—one in four and the other in five volumes quarto—the succeeding seventy-five years should be almost barren in the production of any books of importance for the musical library. It is only with the recent attempts to introduce music in the course of educational studies, and to encourage its practice among the people, that the literature of the science has shown signs of increasing in bulk and value. During the late English publishing season have appeared Carl Engel's work on "The Music of the most Ancient Nations," an elaborate and exhaustive book, showing great archæological and scientific research; "Lectures on the Transitional Period of Musical History," by John Hullah, in continuation of his former series on the origin and early growth of music during the Middle Ages; "Furioso, or Passages from the Life of Ludwig von Beethoven," from the German; "The Autobiography of Louis Spohr," the composer and violinist; Dr. Schlutter's "History of Music," translated from the German by Mrs. R. Tubbs; and "The Letters of W. A. Mozart, 1769–1791," translated from the collection of Louis Nohl by Lady Wallace. As a fresh contribution to the history of this born musician, who, in a short life of thirty-five years, enriched his science with works that grow in value and estimation with every succeeding generation, they are of great interest to many besides mere musicians, and give further testimony to, without explaining, the wonderful youthful precocity that in him was not followed by its usual accompaniments of disappointment and decay in maturity. The most valuable general book of reference on musical history and biography, the "Biographie Universelle des Musiciens et Bibliographie Générale de la Musique" of M. Fetis, is just completed in the new and enlarged edition of MM. Didot, forming eight volumes octavo.

—The annual trade sale of Mr. Murray, at which, after an excellent dinner at the Albion Tavern, his publications are offered to the representatives of the London booksellers there assembled at a slightly reduced rate in order to offer a temptation for liberal purchases, has just taken place. The results are considered significant of a lively demand for new and standard books; and as an index of the comparative taste of the public, a notice of the number of some of the principal works offered is worth making. 4,800 copies were sold of Dr. Livingstone's forthcoming "Narrative of his Expedition to the Zambesi River;" 600 of Fergusson's "History of Architecture," Volume I., an enlarged edition of his "Handbook of Architecture," beautifully illustrated; 3,700 of Dean Stanley's second volume of "Lectures on the Jewish Church;" 700 of Bertram's "Harvest of the Sea," a new book on fish and fishing; 8,000 copies of Dr. Smith's "Bible Dictionary Condensed," in one volume, published at one guinea; 500 of Dean Milman's "Translations from the Great Dramatists;" 1,800 Smiles's "Lives of Boulton and Watt," forming Volume IV. of his "Lives of the Engineers;" 600 of Rev. George Rawlinson's "Babylonia and Medea," the new volume of his "History of the Five Great Empires of Asia;" 500 of the "Student's Blackstone," and 1,500 of the "Student's Manual of Sacred History"—two new volumes of the series, the previously published volumes of which ("Student's Greece, Rome, France, etc.") sold to the extent of 10,200 copies; 200 of Grote's "History of Greece" was considered a fair sale for a book of that magnitude, while 9,000 of Mr. Markham's histories were disposed of, and 8,000 of "Little Arthur's History of England;" 1,200 copies of Hallam's works, and 1,000 of Lord Byron's Poems, show the permanence of standard authors. The amount of the entire sale was about thirty-five thousand pounds.

—Among the large number of authors returned to the new Parliament who will give a literary tone to the deliberations of the collective wisdom of the nation is Mr. Torrens McCullagh, whose "Lectures on the Use and Study of History," "Industrial History of Free Nations" (two vols. 8vo, 1846), "Memoirs of Richard Lalor Sheil" (two vols., 1855), "and more recent "Life of Sir James Graham," show the acquirements of a practised writer and sound thinker upon political and historical questions. Mr. Torrens McCullagh was brought up to the bar, but has never sought for general practice. He has been a member of the Government Commission of Enquiry on Irish Pauperism, and took an active part in alleviating the distress caused by the famine in Ireland. He stood, by invitation of the electors, for the important metropolitan borough of Finsbury, and was triumphantly returned; a fact that testifies to the improved intelligence of the community since the time when to be known in literature was dangerous to the aspirations of a statesman.

—Messrs. Little, Brown & Co. will add to their list of valuable publications illustrative of American history, during the present season, some important books, including "The Life and Times of Joseph Warren," by Richard Frothingham; "Life and Public Services of Samuel Adams," with his correspondence, etc., by William V. Wells, in three vols. 8vo; "History of the Life and Times of James Madison," by Wm. A. Rives, the second and concluding volume; and "Orations and Speeches on Various Occasions" by Edward Everett, Volume IV., and last.

—An interesting volume for antiquarians may be looked for in a book announced by Mr. Hotten, of Piccadilly, "Hone's Scrap-Book," a supplementary volume to the "Every-Day Book," the "Year Book," and the "Table Book," from the MSS. of the late William Hone, with upwards of 150 engravings of curious or eccentric objects, thick 8vo, 800 pp. If this work answers the description, it will be well received by all who, from familiarity with his "Every Day-Book," etc., are aware of the services rendered by Hone, through every discouragement of poverty, privation, and sickness, to the knowledge of old English customs, manners, traditions, etc., from which our acquaintance with the past derives its most vivid coloring. In this capacity the value of his works was recognized by Southey and other historians. Early copies of the "Every-Day Book" and its companions, with choice impressions of the cuts, are scarce, and now bring a high price, though the profits of their publication were insufficient to keep the author out of a debtor's prison. Mr. Hotten, who announces the book, has brought out some curious and valuable books, and is following them up in a line peculiar to himself, as the following titles from his list of books in press will show: "History of Sign-Boards from the Earliest Times to the Present Day, with Anecdotes of Famous Taverns and Remarkable Characters," with 100 illustrations; "Puniana, or the Piccadilly Riddle Book," an entirely new collection—illustrated by 100 exquisitely fanciful conceits from the pencil of the editor, Hon. Hugh Rowley; "The Choicest Jests of English Wits, from the Ruder Jokes of the Ancient Jesters to the Refined and Impromptu Witticisms of Theodore Hook and Douglas Jerrold, including the Cream of Joe Miller, comprising the best Sayings, facetious and merry, which have contributed to give to the country the name of Merry England"—edited by W. Moy Thomas, and uniform with the "Choicest Humorous Anecdotes and Short Stories in the English Language," "Choicest Humorous Poetry," and "Choicest Epigrams," each in one volume.

—"Kent's Commentary on International Law Revised, with Notes and Cases brought down to the Present Time," edited by J. T. Abdy, LL.D., is announced for publication by Messrs. Deighton, Bell & Co., of Cambridge. The letters of "Historicus" have drawn general attention to this portion of Chancellor Kent's commentaries. It is recommended by the author, Mr. Harcourt, as the most authoritative work on the subject, and having no equal in any European book.

THE HESSIANS OF THE REVOLUTION.*

THE number of mercenaries furnished by German princelets to the British Government in the War of our Independence was 29,166,† of whom no less than 17,313 returned to their native country. The other 11,853 fell in battle or succumbed to the diseases incident to a soldier's life in a strange and variable climate. The loss by desertion was entirely inappreciable; the "call of duty" bound the German of the eighteenth century with a spell of which the American of the nineteenth can form no conception. An army, kidnapped in part from among the lowest dregs of the population, and pitted against a people with whom they had never had a thought of quarrel, fought with heroic courage, and endured the sufferings of a protracted captivity, without even seriously entertaining the idea of seeking safety and freedom in flight from its oppressors.

The idea that the progeny of these Hessians constitutes any considerable portion of the population of this country is unfounded. Introduced as a mechanical force, they were withdrawn in the same manner, and left no impression behind them. Their fortunes enlist the attention of the student of German rather than of American history, as an episode bringing into full relief the political and social condition of Central Europe to an extent which would otherwise have remained unnoticed, if not unknown. It is because these bondmen depleted the English Exchequer to the amount of £6,096,857 5s. 11¾d.‡ that they provoke enquiry; and it is because of that handsome little item—representing in absolute value more than twice its amount at the present day—only £4,306,743 7s. 3d. flowed into the army-chests, and £1,790,113 15s. 8¾d., or nearly three-tenths, swelled the revenues and, for all practical purposes, the privy purses of the illustrious sovereigns who had impressed them, that the investigation becomes instructive.

Of the entire contingent 16,992 were subjects, native or kidnapped, of the Landgrave of Hesse; the rest were supplied in various proportions by the Duke of Brunswick, the hereditary Prince of Hesse-Hanau, the Margrave of Anspach, the Prince of Waldeck, and the Prince of Anhalt-Zerbst, potentates distinguished from the mob of their peers and colleagues chiefly by their parts in this transaction.

Charles I. of Brunswick (1735–1780) had managed to involve his principality of 150,000 inhabitants, sadly wasted and worn in the Seven Years' War, and incapable of yielding a revenue of more than a million and a half, in a debt of twelve millions of thalers, which his efforts to make gold had not availed to discharge. He paid a salary of thirty thousand thalers to his opera manager, Nicolini, and another of three hundred to his librarian, Lessing, then the foremost light of German literature. He had found it necessary to check his own extravagance by placing his treasury under the custody of his heir-apparent Ferdinand (duke from 1780 to 1806), a man of some ability and with a tendency to avarice. Father and son looked upon the British proposal as a godsend, and signed a treaty in forty-eight hours after the opening of negotiations. The men were promptly stolen and delivered; but shoes, stockings, and overcoats, not obtainable on the same terms, had to be procured, as well as a new set of uniforms, with English funds at Portsmouth. On the transports the recruits were packed six in a bed, and their pillows are compared, in the military report, to pin-cushions. They revenged themselves on their sovereign by being taken prisoners at Saratoga, thereby not only diminishing his chances of extraordinary compensation on the death or maiming of any of them, but also keeping him in mortal fear of their being exchanged and sent back to their native country, in which case their recitals would necessarily have destroyed the chances of further recruiting. The supplications of his minister to avert such a calamity are heart-rending. There is not another instance on record of such a display of energy by a German government in behalf of its subjects abroad.

* "Der Soldatenhandel deutscher Fuersten nach Amerika (1775–1783). Von Friedrich Kapp." Berlin: Franz Duncker. 1864. 8vo, pp. 300.

† Exclusive of 2,365 Hanoverian infantry.

‡ Including £509,000 16s. 11½d. paid the troops from Hanover.

The Landgrave of Hesse, Frederic II. (1760 to 1785), differed from the prince in being rich and powerful. His forefathers had kidnapped and traded in soldiers for a hundred years. The business, in his hands, was systematized and productive. Cassel, his capital, gloried in palaces and public buildings, erected with the funds thus realized, and his court was a colony of Versailles. He had imported the cast-off mistress of the Duc de Bouillon, and paid her a salary of forty thousand thalers. He refused to see any of his legitimate children for twenty-nine years because their mother had left him on his embracing Catholicism. Yet he left sixty millions of thalers in ready money, at his death, the earnings of his subjects under the flags of foreign countries. The Seven Years' War had swept away the youth of his dominions; scarcely had a recovery set in, when one-twentieth of the entire population was sent to America. More experienced in these negotiations and less pinched for money than any of his illustrious competitors, he succeeded in making far more favorable terms with his English customers.

The hereditary prince of this monarchy administered the government of the county of Hanau as a sort of appanage. He had the avarice and the licentiousness of his father, coupled with a detestation of anything that even bore the appearance of refinement. Of his innumerable illegitimate children, two have achieved a dismal notoriety as the brothers Haynau. Twenty-two others were born of a Miss Schlottheim, his avowed mistress, all, as she is particular to state in her memoirs, "without love." She at first fled to elude his advances, but was captured and delivered up to him by her own parents. A lady of Cassel who related this circumstance in conversation, and found that it excited some disgust, observed that it would have been out of the question for the Hessian gentry to have allowed such an advantage to escape them. It was this gentry which afterwards encircled the throne of Jerome Napoleon.

Of Prince William's English epistolary style, the following specimen has become immortal:

HANAU, 1 May, 1776.

TO THE EARL OF SUFFOLK:

MY LORD: The luck I have had to be able to show in some manner my utmost respect and gratitude to the best of kings, by offering my troops to his majesty's service, gives me a very agreeable opportunity of thanking you, my lord, for all your kindness and friendship to me upon that occasion, and begging your pardon for all the trouble I may have provided you in this regard.

My only wishes are that all the officers and soldiers of my regiment, now to his majesty's orders, may be animated of the same respectful attachment and utmost zeal I shall ever bear for the king, my generous protector and magnanimous support. May the end they shall fight for answer to the king's upper contentment; and your laudable endeavors, my lord, be granted by the most happiest issue. The continuation of your friendship to me, Sir, which I desire very much, assures your goodness and protection to my troops. I ask in their names this favor from you, and hope they will deserve it.

Excuse me, Sir, if I am not strong enough in the English language for to explain as I should the utmost consideration and sincere esteem with which I am for ever, my lord, your most humble and very obedient servant,

WILLIAM, H. P. of Hesse.

None of these potentates, however, have so varied a personal history as Christian Frederic Charles Alexander, the last of the margraves of Anspach and Baireuth, whose father, Charles Frederic William, a good shot, had once, for the diversion of his mistress, and at her suggestion, brought down a chimney-sweep from the top of a house with his rifle, afterwards indemnifying the widow with a donation of five florins. On another occasion the same monarch, having commissioned a Jew to procure certain diamonds to be presented to the King of England, discovered, after the present was made, that Bohemian glass had been fraudulently inserted in place of the jewels. The Jew was immediately dragged to the capital, and handed over to the executioner, who tied him to a chair, and drew the sword of justice. In his agony the unfortunate man jumped up, and ran around a long table with the chair tied to his back, crying out piteously for only a moment's audience with the landgrave; but the executioner was too practised a hand to be foiled in that way; reaching across the table he struck the blow with unerring accuracy, and Jew, chair, and head tumbled in a heap upon the floor. Nor was this rigor by any means exercised upon Jews exclusively. Counts and colonels are known to have been executed, while the reasons for which they suffered were never mentioned. Christopher William von Rauber, accused of having ridiculed the government in print, was sentenced to slap himself on the mouth, to burn his pasquil, and then to be beheaded; the last clause of the sentence was mercifully commuted to life-long imprisonment, but all his property was confiscated. A Hungarian who had shot the margrave's orderly was broken on the wheel. A Prussian soldier's wife, who had induced a private of the margrave's body-guard to desert, was hung, and the Prussian recruiting officer, who had been arrested at the same time, imprisoned. The deserter himself was too valuable a piece of property to be damaged. A citizen of Gunzenhausen, doing duty as sentry, so ill versed in military etiquette as to obey the personal command of the margrave to hand him his musket, was tied to a horse's tail and dragged through a pond, and died a few days after. A gamekeeper, who had the charge of the margravial hounds, was accused by backbiters of neglecting them. The sovereign rode up to his door, called him out of his house, and shot him down.

The wife of this great man had insisted on sending her son to study at the republican university of Utrecht. Having completed these studies, he had made the tour of Italy, but returned with a constitution greatly shattered by vicious indulgences, for which his august father immediately wreaked condign vengeance upon his tutor, a privy counsellor of state, and cast him into prison; whether he remained there, or whether he was beheaded, rumors are conflicting. Perhaps in consequence of his semi-republican education he so far departed from the traditions of the family as to admit ladies who were not of noble birth to his court; but it was on condition that they should never utter a word in their mother tongue, a stipulation which the ladies from Paris exacted as due to them. Being at this moment in debt some five millions of thalers, he received the British emissary with open arms, and made all haste to furnish his contingent. The transaction has obtained a place in German classical literature, from at least an allusion to it in Schiller's play of "Kabale und Liebe," "Love and Intrigue." He introduces the margrave's avowed mistress, Lady Milford, whose real name was Lady Craven, as the only person of condition in all the land who is alive to the tyranny of the proceeding. Learning that the diamonds which the prince sends her were bought with the blood-money obtained for these recruits, she rejects them with disdain. "My sons are among them, too," says the lackey who brings them. "Not by compulsion, I hope?" enquires the lady. "O dear, no!" he answers; "all volunteers. Two or three jackanapes stepped out of the ranks and asked the colonel what he took for a yoke of men? But our gracious sovereign had them shot in the presence of all the regiments. Their brains spurted over the paving-stones, and we all shouted, 'Ho for America!' Then the drums beat, and off they went, orphans howling after their hiring fathers, and mothers telling their husbands to run bayonets through their children, and bride and groom hewn asunder with sabres, and aged crones throwing their crutches after their departing sons."

All this is founded on fact. The Anspach troops mutinied while on the way down the river Main in boats, and might have robbed the margrave of all his vested rights in their flesh and blood had he not ridden night and day to overtake them, and overawed them, partly by the grandeur of his presence and partly by means of his double-barrelled rifle, with which he posted himself on one of the boats, and accompanied the transport to the Netherlands. "At the sight of His Serene Highness," says a contemporary newspaper, "the good soldier shed tears of joy, and took up his march in patience." But the hussars of the Bishop of Würzburg were also called in to keep up the effect.

Frederic Augustus, the last of the princes of Anhalt-Zerbst (1747-1793), reigned over 20,000 subjects, among whom, ever since 1716, the deaths had exceeded the births. Brother of the Empress Catharine of Russia, he was a caricature not only of monarchs in general, but even of the little monarchs of Germany. His hatred of Frederic the Great, his near neighbor, was such that in 1763 he took a final leave of his dominions, and spent the rest of his life at Basle and Luxembourg. After frequently admonishing his subjects not to violate the sanctity of his retreat with petitions for the redress of grievances, he put up a placard expressly forbidding such impertinences. His life was cut short by the execution of Louis XVI.; on hearing of that calamity, he steadfastly refused all nourishment, and expired in a few weeks. His troops were accepted by the English only at his urgent solicitation. Some of his French letters are even more curious than the English ones of the hereditary Prince of Hesse-Hanau. "Four brothers in Dessau," he writes to an English diplomatist, "had six hundred hounds in common, all quartered upon the citizens. A fine garrison! And at the first crack of the whip they assembled like soldiers at the beat of the drum. Whew! If we could make the Americans scamper like these hounds! But that will require troops?" He even offers the King of England "two frigates and two sloops of war, which will be found indispensable—1, to keep up the communication with the Anhalt troops; 2, to convey reinforcements; and 3, to enlarge the British navy."

There were also negotiations with the rulers of Würtemberg, Bavaria, Hesse-Darmstadt, and Saxe-Hildburghausen, but they came to nothing, either because the troops, after having been promised, were found never to have been in existence, or because the reputation of the particular principality was such as to deter the English; or, in the case of Darmstadt, because the sovereign was so fond of seeing his soldiers on parade that he would not part with them.

Such are some of the features of the gloomy chapter of German history which our author has given to the world in the pages we have been citing. "Humiliating as is the reflection," he says to his German readers, "the story must be written; for the wounds then struck have left their scars upon the present generation. The crime here denounced, so far from being expiated, is repeated even at this day wherever a people are compelled to shed their blood and lavish their treasure in a cause which is not their own. The causes which produced it are still at work; the destruction of Germany into a heap of petty despotisms is as rife as ever. The grandfathers of our present princes sold the corpses of their subjects to the English King for fifty-one thalers and fifteen silver groschen a-piece; their sons, the heroes of the 'Rheinbund,' became kings by the grace of a Corsican attorney's son, and sold him the flower of the country's youth to fight his battles on the Moskwa and the Guadalquivir. The grandsons still occupy the same thrones, and alternately seek the protection of Austrian, French, or Russian bayonets as the bids rise and fall. The miseries of such a system must be renounced at any price."

As to Mr. Kapp's work itself, a further introduction is not needed. His "Life of Steuben," "Life of Kalb," and "History of Slavery in the United States," have made his name the all-sufficient passport with all who read for the purpose of increasing the range of their information. Mere amusement is not his aim. Instead of encumbering with valueless anecdotes the records of subjects already over-written, he loves to rescue from oblivion what would else be lost, to cast new light into dark places, to correct traditional opinions by facts newly discovered, or never yet brought into connection with them, and to bring the lessons of the past to bear upon the stern realities of the present. His readers are so much the less numerous, but the influence of his pen on the minds of men is the greater. Every one of his publications might well bear for its motto the remark of Goethe: "The man meant to do more than write a book."

BUCHANAN'S TESTAMENT.*

THE Administration of "the late President," as Mr. Buchanan chooses to style himself, had the misfortune to overlap two rebellions, identical in principle and significance, having a common fate, and differing only in magnitude. More properly, the Kansas struggle was to the grander one just concluded what a skirmish in reconnoissance is to the decisive battle between main forces. It was a portion of the same campaign, and while developing the irrepressible conflict and the hostile parties, also foreshadowed distinctly the victory. It is Mr. Buchanan's self-appointed task to inform his countrymen how, "whilst in the exercise of Executive functions he never violated any of the provisions of the Constitution," he yet contributed what he could to the overthrow of constitutional government as embodied in the legitimate rule of the majority; how one who is opposed to slavery in the abstract, and pronounces it a social evil and a political evil, played into the hands of a conspiracy for the forcible domination of the slave power over every acre of the national soil.

A survey of the antecedents of the rebellion, from the beginning of the anti-slavery agitation in 1832-33, is designed merely to introduce the circumstances in which Mr. Buchanan was called to the Presidency; and his defence begins with Kansas and Lecompton. Up to 1854, when the South and the Democratic party at the North united in the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, the slave States, in our author's judgment, had been the assailed, more sinned against than sinning. Wrongful as was this measure, its success, corroborated by the Dred Scott decision, silenced every scruple in the breast of the new President, and when he had reviewed the theatre of territorial strife, he at once resolved to support the pro-slavery pretensions of right, and to see in the civil warfare in Kansas only the attempt of a disloyal faction to defy the laws of the nation. To this decision, indeed, he clung and still clings as to a mast, not caring to endorse that portion of it which strips the negro of all human rights (yet not repudiating it), but affirming its correctness in regard to the protection of every sort of property in the common Territories of the United States. Never was policy more logical than that determined by these two guides—an infamous breach of political faith, and a decision as void of legality as it was of heart and conscience. The frauds and atrocities of border-ruffianism were backed up by the military resources of the Administration, and the victims of Missouri invasions coolly pilloried as being "unwilling to trust to the ballot-box—the certain American remedy for the redress of all grievances." Is it necessary to examine further the arguments of a man who thus belies the record—who looks at a flagrant, violent revolt against the ballot-box from one side, and immediately charges it upon the opposite—who receives the forged and throws out the honest suffrages—who has caresses for Lecompton and bayonets for Topeka?

The period between the two uprisings of the South was spent by Mr. Buchanan in a state of mingled apprehension and astonishment. The Kansas question had been settled; the President and the rebels were nominally victorious, the North actually. The Territory had been saved to freedom on an issue involving the public lands, but the principles of the Government concerning slave property in that and all other Territories had triumphed in the approval by Congress of the Lecompton Constitution. Mr. Buchanan was prepared to witness an end of agitation. He had been disappointed by the failure of the compromises of 1850 to allay the violence of fanaticism. He was absolutely amazed that the Dred Scott decision was oil equally wasted. His heart sank within him when John Brown went to Harper's Ferry; and when the Charleston Convention divided, he fell straightway to prophesying the opening of the sixth seal—he saw blood, and he began to make for peace. He did not hold the doctrine of the secessionists, nor did he believe that Congress had power to coerce a State; the individuals which compose it he thought might be constrained to obey the Federal statutes. The regular army was weak, and distributed where it was needed, along the Indian frontier. He made it weaker by proclaiming his fears in his message of December 3, 1860, and pointing out the helplessness of the Government. He was resolved to execute the laws, but equally resolved not to call for volunteers unless specially empowered by Congress. He implies that President Lincoln's action was extra, though perhaps not anti-constitutional, and justifiable only from the exigencies of the case. Despairing of regiments, he bethought him of compromise—an old weapon with which he and other statesmen had often sought, with bitter ill-success, to keep the peace; yet he would give it one more trial. He asked for amendments to the Constitution by which the Dred Scott decision, the Fugitive Slave Law, and an express recognition of the existence and sanctity of slavery in the States, should be incorporated in that instrument. It was a very trifling request; not more than that the late election should be annulled; not more than to surrender the gains of civilization over barbarism in the painful encounter of thirty years; not more than to annihilate the value and stability of all elections by placing them at the mercy of a bullying minority. The President had discharged his duty when he had opened to the North this way to peace; but he has never ceased wondering why his proposition was despised. Mr. Crittenden's resolution was the next and the last opportunity afforded for a general agreement, provided the North was willing to abate its prejudices. Mr. Buchanan is to this day profoundly mortified at the unaccountable perverseness of the free States in this particular also. He will probably die in the conviction that, had they consented to the resolution, there would have been no further dispute. So efficacious had been the several compromises in which he had shared!

He had now done his best to stimulate the activity of the conspirators by showing his personal readiness to toss them any sop which should shut their terrible jaws. A peacemaker all his life, except for one abnormal hour at Ostend, the little of a policy that was left him in the last days of his Administration was still to postpone the dread necessity of war. He complains that Congress deserted him, refusing to vote him supplies or troops; but he had previously deserted himself, following his courage, which had taken early flight. When Anderson had crossed from Moultrie to Sumter, he heard of it with chagrin, and would have ordered him back and restored the status quo if it had turned out that the major had been needlessly alarmed for the safety of his command! That would have been a merry Christmas gift to the nascent rebellion, which fortunately soon made clear the discretion of Major Anderson. From that moment up to the 4th of March, 1861, the President was like a loose sail flapping with every breath of conciliation and peace. He allowed himself to be bound by an unwarranted armistice which the South Carolinians obtained of the fortress, and then to be put off by the commission sent to make impossible demands of him in order to gain time for their political and military arrangements. He had planned to send the Brooklyn instead of the Star of the West to reinforce the garrison of Sumter, and attributes the consequent miscarriage of the expedition to Gen. Scott.

* "Mr. Buchanan's Administration on the Eve of the Rebellion." D. Appleton & Co., New York.

It is not our object to enter into the long discussion between "the late Lieutenant-General" and "the late President." We are disposed to allow that neither the latter nor the War Secretary, Mr. Holt, ever pledged the faith of the Government to abstain from executing the laws of the land, by force if necessary, in the seceded States. This would, indeed, have been to violate provisions of the Constitution. Grant that Mr. Buchanan is not culpable. The blot on the close of his Administration consists in the imbecility of which his book is an ingenuous autobiography. He has written an apology for weakness without a suspicion that a tool may be as mischievous as a tyrant, and, if unprincipled, as blameworthy. Mr. Buchanan may be called a venerable man, and it is likely that this is his last intrusion upon the public notice, but he has written for himself an epitaph under which few men of this generation would care to lie. His voice, he impresses upon us, in the protracted difference between North and South, has been consistently raised for tranquillity and peace. But what tranquillity and what a peace! No moral sacrifice was too great, no human right too sacred, no democratic principle too fundamental, to stand in the way of that delusive quiet for which he compromised them all. With the same pious suavity he urges the right of slaveholders to take their property wherever they please, and deplores the blasphemy of the John Brown song. For him there is no law superior to the Constitution; anything which looks beyond, above, is fanaticism; yet he would have amended it in the interest of cruelty and oppression, and his latest breath is a rebuke of his countrymen for having preferred the ordeal of battle to a corrupt submission to the encroachments of a giant iniquity.

It is bad enough when despotism writes its memoirs; the Old World manfully protests against it. But here is compromise in self-defence; and Atheism is worse than Cæsarism.

OUTCROPPINGS.*

We have read (somewhat to our own surprise, we confess) nearly all there is in this little book, which came to us so pleasantly printed, with such a quaint outside of German quarto, and with each poem in it so daintily set with en graver's caprices of flower and fruit that we could not help giving it a friendly attention, and should now be glad to have found it much worthier perusal than we did. There are four or five genuine poems in the volume, and the remaining selections are rhymes which might interest the observer of this age's fatal facility of making verses. A great and unerring genius has winnowed the poetical vocabulary of base diction, and has enriched it with such opulence of expression, that any contemporary lady or gentleman of ordinary education and warmth of feeling may sit down, after the perusal of Tennyson, and make much better verses than Doctor Johnson did, with all the lumber of antiquity at hand to supply him the material for his wooden effusions. If these facile geniuses lived long, we should find poetry worse than the plagues of Egypt, and the poets would infest all the dough-troughs (except their own empty ones) in the land. Happily, however, these myriad immortals are usually carried off by business, by marriage, and by subsidence of the spring-tide of youth, before they have time to pipe more than half-a-dozen songs, and then their immortality lies folded away in old newspapers till some one comes to make a collection of it.

As California has been peopled by the average culture and talent of the older States, and has yet had no time to develop a peculiar character of life and thought, there is no reason why the present collection of California verse should be different from a collection of Ohio verse or New England verse. At any rate, it is not; and these California poets rarely make mention of her climate and scenery; but sing, with an exile's fondness, of the seasons and landscapes known to us of the eastern shore of the continent. The fervor of California suns is palpable only in the erotic nature of some of the verse, which is often sweet and tender, and at times almost original. "Cupid Kissed Me" and "In the Pouts," by Ina D. Coolbrith, have a slight pathos and saucy charm quite their own; while "The Mother's Grief," by the same poet, is veritable and fine. One day the baby plays at the door, and tries to clutch the sunbeam on the threshold; and the next day the mother weeps as the sunbeam falls on the baby's bed:

"I weep to see its shining band
Reach, with a fond endeavor,
To where the little restless hands
Are crossed in rest for ever."

Miss Coolbrith is one of the real poets among the many poetic masqueraders in the volume; Emilie Lawson is another; and Mr. C. H. Webb is, say, half another. "Das Meermädchen" is a genuine ballad, and is marred by none of the prosaic lapses not to be noted without smiles and sadness in his other poems. "The Omen," by H. C. B., is also the fair expression of a true feeling. J. F. Bowman has three poems in the selection, one of which is a translation. The other two are both good; one, indeed, is so good that we must copy it:

THE WHOLE STORY.

When Jones was sixteen, he was bent
On one day being President.

At twenty-five, Jones thought that he Content as District Judge would be.

At thirty, he was much elated
When Mayor of Frogtown nominated.

But bootless all the nomination—
His rival Tompkins graced the station.

At forty-five, his dreams had fled;
Hope and Ambition both were dead.

When from his toils he found release,
He died—a Justice of the Peace.

O youthful heart, so high and bold,
Thus is thy brief, sad story told!

* "Outcroppings: Being Selections of California Verse." A. Roman & Co., San Francisco; W. J. Widdleton, New York.

MAGAZINES FOR DECEMBER.

The "Atlantic" opens with the first chapter of Charles Reade's new story, "Griffith Gaunt," in which the reader feels such a flush of pleasure as follows the rise of the curtain upon the beginning of a good play. There is already matter of vividest drama introduced, and in the characters of Kate Peyton, the proud, irresolute woman, with her delicious possibilities of coquetry; of Griffith Gaunt, the jealous, faithful, and unwise lover; and of George Neville, brilliant, audacious, and generous, the author has wrought a spell that will hold his readers to the end. Those who remember Mr. Reade's successful dealings with the past in "The Cloister and the Hearth" and in "Peg Woffington," will rejoice that his story is of people who lived at least a hundred years ago. George Neville's wooing is an admirable study of the gallant love-making of that gay time as you may find it in the pleasant, wicked comedies.—We find the translation of "The Parting of Hector and Andromache," which Mr. Bryant has made from Homer, so simply and gracefully done that we think it a pity the venerable poet should not do the whole epic into English. Longfellow will give us the Dante which shall supersede all other versions; why should not Mr. Bryant perform for literature the like office with "the Ionian father of the rest?"—"William Blackwood" is another of Mr. Neal's garrulous papers about the early part of his literary career.—Mrs. Stowe's "Chimney-Corner" discourse is this month devoted to discussion of the question why housekeeping forms no part of woman's education.—We like Mr. Taylor's poem, "The Sleeper," for its tranquil and lofty feeling, but it seems to us needlessly long and rather labored. Still, it is the best poem which the "Atlantic" has printed for some time; has fine thoughts and touches of delicate beauty.—As for the other two poems of the number, they have no fault except that of not being poems: "Beyond" is prose, and "Dios te de" is nothing whatever, and adds the offence of affecting to convey a moral.—Every one will read with sympathy Charles Dickens's tenderly sketched outline of the life and character of Adelaide Anne Procter.—The other articles are: "The Forge, II.;" "Clemency and Common Sense," by Charles Sumner; "Dr. Johns," by Donald G. Mitchell; "Books for our Children," by Samuel Osgood; and "King James the First," by Gail Hamilton. The last, we suppose, must have been written for Messrs. Ticknor & Fields's "Young Folks' Magazine," and made up into the "Atlantic" by one of those errors which are not the less mortifying because quite unavoidable, at times, in large establishments. After the blunder was committed there seems to have been an effort made to qualify the puerility of the paper by inserting some passages from Gail Hamilton's "Spasm of Sense," in which the spasmist rebukes sick people for begetting children, and longs for a time when such wickedness shall come, like theft and murder, to be considered "a sin against God, a crime against the state." We have not given the subject great thought, but the only way out of the trouble seems to be to expose all sickly infants at the birth, or to begin with the error of God himself, who gives sick persons much the same affections and desires which he bestows upon well ones.

The half-baked quality of much of our American performance is curiously illustrated in "The Eclectic Magazine" for the present month. This periodical is merely a judicious selection from the English monthlies and quarterlies, but it occasionally contains an original paper from the pen of the editor. The number before us has one of these papers, "A Sketch of the Kremlin of Moscow," it is called, and should have been entitled: "A Composition—subject, The Kremlin of Moscow." The way the editor came to visit Moscow was this: "'Have you seen Moscow?' said Prince Gortschakoff to us at St. Petersburg. 'Not yet, sir, Prince.' 'Oh, you must go and see Moscow! You do not see Russia unless you see Moscow,' he added with marked enthusiasm." So this friend of princes went to Moscow, and saw those wonders of the Kremlin which he describes, and among which was the famous golden and jewelled Bible. "We had previously enquired," says the editor in a fine philosophical spirit, "of one of the Moscow pastors how many New Testaments in modern Russ he would need to supply the destitute in that city; he answered fifty thousand copies. We thought," he adds, continuing his shrewd reflection, "how many such Testaments the gold and jewels of this one Bible would pay for!" In another part of the Kremlin he saw a palace built by the Emperor Nicholas. "In this palace he learned his sons the art of war in handling the musket," says our ill-taught traveller, but cannot stop to describe its splendors. Taking leave of the city, he relates how, when Napoleon's army first beheld it, "The loud exclamation, Moscow, Moscow! ran along the extended ranks. We could not avoid the same exclamation, Moscow, Moscow! from very admiration of the beautiful capital city of Russia." The climax is singularly thrilling, but the writer spoils it by adding something else, and concluding with a sentiment, as from Peter Parley, that it is worth a long journey to see Moscow. The editor of the "Eclectic" has lived a long time among the roses, no doubt, but he is not a rose, and will not be in a thousand years, probably. Men of his small literature would scarcely aspire to write in any other country but this, and we are sorry that it has so long been safe for them to do it here. The facts and ideas in his sketch of the Kremlin are no more ordered than apples in a barrel, and we doubt the right of a man to print it even in his own magazine. Some regard is due to the national literary reputation, even from the sovereign plenitude of editorial power.

The December number of "Our Young Folks" is, no doubt, very charming, though we find the reading of juvenile literature rather a heavy task, and have spared ourselves all but a glance through this little people's magazine. The quality of the publication seems to be good and wholesome, without noticeable cant or quackery, from which children's books are sometimes no freer than those meant for men and women.

The opening review in the "Christian Examiner" is cordial applause of Mr. Mill's recent criticism of the Hamiltonian philosophy. The reviewer regards the demolition of the Scotch metaphysician as so complete that he confesses to a feeling of something like mortification in having esteemed Sir William so great a philosopher, and owns to a present doubt whether he was a philosopher at all, in the noble sense of the word. The second article does not make a great deal of Palgrave's "Arabia," though the book is evidently one on which a charming article could have been written. The third review is of Dr. Newman's "Apologia," in which the writer sketches the great convert's spiritual history, as he finds it in his own relation, and concludes with the opinion that Dr. Newman was logical and conscientious in going to Rome, "if, as he took for granted, man is so constituted that he never can attain to any knowledge of the truth, and yet cannot be saved in any other way than by a knowledge of the truth." Of course, the reviewer himself does not hold these premises, but he declares that they are "exactly those which are accepted by the whole of Christendom, unless, as some believe, Christendom is large enough to take in Theists and Transcendentalists." Somebody has performed for Mr. Parkman's "Pioneers of France in the New World" the office already described as done for Palgrave's "Arabia"—though in both cases the poor result seems attributable rather to a feeling of haste and a sense of confinement to certain limits of space than to want of appreciation or ability. Besides these articles there is one on English colleges and schools, in review of the books by Mr. Everett and Mr. Atkinson. The "Review of Current Literature" is good and honest and attractive. We understand that the publication of the "Examiner" is to be removed from Boston to this city, with Dr. Bellows as local editor.

The editor of "Harper's Magazine" celebrates the commencement of its thirty-second volume with an interesting sketch of its history and its manufacture from month to month. It is quite worth while to know something about making a magazine of such importance to our literature, and Mr. Guernsey tells us a great deal without telling us too much. We have to praise his paper for treating the subject with clearness, and for enlivening to an unexpected degree its statistical features as well as its unavoidable descriptions of machinery, scarcely less tedious, intrinsically, than facts and figures The article is really a valuable contribution to useful knowledge, for, apart from its special historical merit, it acquaints the reader with all the modern inventions and processes of book-making adopted in our large printing and publishing houses, and no doubt brought to the greatest perfection in that of Harper & Bros.—We can scarcely judge of the worth of Mr. J. R. Hamilton's article on "The Natural Wealth of Virginia," but the subject is one of present interest, now that the South is to be partly repeopled from the industrious North and Northern enterprise is turning to the development of her resources.—"The Royal Portraits" is the title of a poem by W. D. Howells.—"First and Last: A Retrospect," is a just-as-was-to-be-expected story by Louise Chandler Moulton, and well enough written. —Mr. De Vere, in the "Names of Men," seizes a topic in which all men (except the Snookses, possibly) are interested, and treats it pleasantly and intelligently.—"Sally's Disappointment" is very flat, indeed.—The two poems, "Aspirations" and "Death," by Caroline Seymour, are, as we have understood, the work of a young girl who has not yet reached her sixteenth year, and they must be regarded rather in the light of promise than performance. Without, of course, teaching anything new, they seem to be the graceful expressions of a veritable poetic power.—"A Village in Massachusetts" is a very lively essay on Boston traits, with just that spice of injustice and that shadow of exaggeration which we love to have in talk about our neighbors. We imagine that Bostonians themselves will rather like it, for there is a tacit compliment in the fact (scarcely predicable of any other American city) that Boston traits are sufficiently marked for recognition and criticism; and then, the writer says nothing in dispute of the Bostonian supremacy in culture. Indeed, it would be scarcely worth while to dispute the fact that nearly all that is worth living in American literature has come from Boston; or that with the present generation Boston's intellectual primacy will pass from her for ever.

Cenni Storici sugli Stati Uniti d'America per S. Frenfanelli Cibo.—When the bibliography of the war for the Union is fully recorded, not the least curious and suggestive emanations of the press, inspired thereby, will be the contributions of foreign scholars, in comparatively out-of-the-way places, towards the enlightenment of their neighbors on the "American question." Not only have eminent publicists in France, like Laboulaye and Gasparin, and Englishmen of letters, like Goldwin Smith, exercised their pens in defence of truth and right, but less known persons in Italy and Germany, moved by affection for our country and interest in the cause of freedom, have written with intelligence and feeling of the prominent facts and tendencies of American history. Some of our readers doubtless remember with pleasure an accomplished young Italian who was quite a favorite in New York society just before the outbreak of the rebellion. Seraphino Frenfanelli Cibo was known also in literary circles for the graceful translations he made into his native tongue of several poems by American writers, among which we recall one by Bryant and one by Mrs. Howe. The brother of this gentleman having married a lady of this city, he became an habitué of many cultivated households, and acquired facility both in writing and speaking the English language. Frenfanello is a native of Foligno, in the Roman States. Travellers in Italy will recall this picturesque town, which is one of the halting-places between Florence and Rome. His father for many years was mayor of the little city; and the son, last autumn, became a candidate for the Italian Parliament from the same province. Cherishing a delightful remembrance of his sojourn in the United States, and finding his countrymen, in a great measure, ignorant of the antecedent facts and true significance of the great struggle, he prepared a brief but luminous summary of the principal events in our history, and described the real questions at issue and the vital interests at stake. This handsomely printed little volume, issued in October last, in that far-away and little-frequented town among the hills on the road to Rome, seems to us a most pleasing tribute—the spontaneous and intelligent offering of one who, during a brief sojourn, learned to love the institutions and appreciate the destiny of this country. Although containing little over one hundred pages, it concentrates the essential facts with lucid order and emphatic logic. In the appendix is a statistical table made up from the census, a geographical illustration of slavery as it existed before the war, and extracts from the Constitution and Washington's Farewell Address. No Italian of average intelligence can read this modest brochure without deriving therefrom a very authentic and distinct idea of the course, character, and issues of American history, from colonial times to the present year. With the exception of Prof. Botta's excellent letters to L'Opinione, of Turin, descriptive of our educational system and the events of the war, we know of no source of information in the Italian language more correct and seasonable than this book, which is dedicated by the author to one of his New York friends.

West Virginia: Its Farms and Forests, Mines and Oil-Wells, etc. By J. R. Dodge, of the United States Department of Agriculture. (J. B. Lippincott, Philadelphia.)—This hand-book professes to give but a partial and cursory idea of a State which, while forming part of the Old Dominion, was either neglected by the dominant eastern section, or remembered only to be subjected to unequal representation and taxation, and, consequently, figured little in industrial statistics and reports. The author has devoted his leisure moments to researches among documents and men, and derived a very exalted opinion of the resources of the new-born commonwealth. He finds her soil, climate, and scenery unsurpassed—the last almost unrivalled—in America. Agriculture in all its branches obtains a rich return. Stockraising and wool-growing are also highly profitable. Her mineral stores are incalculable. Iron and salt abound, with coal-fields as available as extensive, and petroleum wells notorious for their numbers and yield. The eleven closing chapters are devoted to a pretty thorough discussion of the last-mentioned product, including, besides a description of the oil districts, and the methods of boring, etc., a list of the companies actually in operation, as far as could be ascertained. A good map would greatly have enhanced the value of the book.

The brief historical sketch of the erection of West Virginia into a State gives no hint of the questionable constitutionality of that procedure. It says that, "on the 13th of May (1862), the Legislature of Virginia gave its consent to the formation of a new State within the jurisdiction of Virginia." Of course the "Virginia" Legislature referred to is the rump that met at Alexandria, and regarded Governor Peirpoint as the rightful magistrate, while Letcher played the usurper at Richmond. This fiction was not without its convenience in the case of West Virginia, but has entailed much political confusion upon us now that the rebellion is over.

Miscellanies from the Collected Writings of Edward Irving. (Alexander Strahan, London and New York. 1865.)—Considered absolutely, Edward Irving was a very different man from Theodore Parker, and yet relatively to their respective churches and positions the course of these two men was much the same. It would be difficult to say which was the greater heretic or which the stouter and more resolute defender of his thought, or which of them received the harder treatment in the name of Christ and Christianity. But this handsome volume symbolizes other qualities which they enjoyed in common. Its relation to Irving's genius is the same as that of Parker's "Lessons from the World of Matter and of Man" to his genius. It will surprise many persons that from the writings of these men a collection of thoughts has been made so universal in its character. From these collections it will appear that their negatives were the smallest part of them, that the wonder of them was their stalwart faith in God and every great reality. It would never be guessed from these miscellanies that Irving was fanatical in any of his views. And it is very strange that nowhere does his fanaticism leave a mark upon his style, which is always wonderfully pure and noble, much nobler and purer than was Parker's, in whose nature there was not a shred or sign of the fanatic. The Messrs. Strahan have given us another eminently religious book. It is this in spite of one part called theological, for the same spirit breathes through that also. It contains passages that we should like to print, because of their great strength, or tenderness, or beauty, and among them are these: Pharisaism (p. 81), The Four Offices of Friendship (p. 133), Prosperous Preachers (p. 140), Sunshine Christians (p. 324), Idolatry of the Bible (p. 358).

Songs of Praise and Poems of Devotion in the Christian Centuries. With an Introduction by Henry Coppée. (E. H. Butler & Co., Philadelphia.)—The nucleus of this collection is Neale's "Hymns of the Eastern Church," consisting of versions from the Greek and Latin fathers. To these the editor has added others, chiefly modern, and largely from the present century, including several of his own. A rigid taste—and, in criticizing devotional poetry, what taste can be too rigid?—would pronounce against the admission of much that Prof. Coppée has approved, and all the more because of the vastness of the field of choice. Surely there is no such dearth of lofty strains as to justify, even as "padding," the insertion of Tupper's "Hymn for All Nations," though it had the honor to be sung at the great exhibition in London, in 1851, and "translated into thirty languages in upwards of fifty versions." This, we admit, is the very worst instance of mistaken judgment that we can charge the compiler with, yet it is evident that the strength of his discrimination must be estimated by his weakest selection, and that the value of a work like the present consists rather in its freedom from defects—in its symmetry—than in the abundance of its excellences. The reader of "Songs of Praise" will not lack for noble nourishment, but he will occasionally meet with very indifferent fare. The same inequality is observable in the engravings, and forbids our complete endorsement of the very high estimate which the preface sets upon the holiday comeliness of the volume, which in other respects is honorable to the publishers.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

Ellen Vincent and the Blank Sheet. From the Religious Tract Society, London. Henry Hoyt, Boston.

Humorous Poems. By Oliver Wendell Holmes. [Companion Poets for the People.] Ticknor & Fields, Boston.

The Trip of the Steamer Oceanus to Fort Sumter and Charleston, S. C. By a Committee Appointed by the Passengers of the Oceanus. Brooklyn. 1865.

The Ordeal for Wives. By the Author of "The Morals of Mayfair." American News Company, New York.

A Summer in Skye. By Alexander Smith. Ticknor & Fields, Boston; B. H. Ticknor, New York.

De Vane. A Story of Plebeians and Patricians. By Hon. Henry W. Hilliard. Blelock & Co., New York.

Life and Military Career of Major-General Philip Henry Sheridan. By Rev. P. C. Headley.—Life and Naval Career of Vice-Admiral David Glascoe Farragut. By the same. William H. Appleton, New York.

Glimpses of History. By George M. Towle. William V. Spencer, Boston.

The Home of Washington and its Associations, Historical, Biographical, and Pictorial. By Benson J. Lossing. New Edition. W. A. Townsend, New York.

The Bushrangers. By William H. Thomas.—The Yankee Middy; or, The Adventures of a Naval Officer. By Oliver Optic.—Dotty Dimple. Fairy Book. [Little Prudy Series.] By Sophie May. Lee & Shepard, Boston.

The Spirit of Harper's Ferry. A Poem for the Times. By William W. H. Curdy. Bland, Meyers & Woodbury, Indianapolis

The Twenty-third Psalm.—Three Kings of the Orient. A Christmas Carol. By John H. Hopkins, Jr., M.A., Deacon.—Cinderella: Puss in Boots: Beauty and the Beast. With Original Illustrations by H. L. Stephens.—Hymns in Prose for Children. By Mrs. Barbauld. Illustrated.—The Water Lily. By Harriet Myrtle. With Twenty Illustrations by Hablot K. Browne.—Picciola. By X. B. Saintine.—On the Ferry-Boat. By Jennie Harrison.—The Cyclopædia of Biography. By Parke Godwin. New Edition. With a Supplement, brought down to the Present Time, by George Sheppard. Hurd & Houghton, New York.

Mitchell's New Reference Atlas. For the Use of Colleges, Libraries, Families, and Counting-Houses.—The American Angler's Book. By Thaddeus Norris. New Edition, with a Supplement. E. H. Butler & Co., Philadelphia; Sampson Low, Son & Co.; James Miller, New York.

Fine Arts.

THE EXHIBITION OF PICTURES BY EUROPEAN ARTISTS.

A collection of about a hundred and fifty pictures by French, Flemish, and English painters is now on exhibition at the "Studio Building," 15 Tenth Street. There was a small gathering of artists and friends of art at the gallery on Thursday evening last. The galleries were tolerably well lighted, and so few persons were present that the pictures could be easily looked at and all seen that gas-light will show. But it is well that the pictures are not to be shown by gas-light again. The usual "private view," to which ladies as well as gentlemen are invited, was held on Saturday last at the unusual hour of from one to five in the afternoon, instead of in the evening. The title-page of the catalogue announces that the exhibition will be open daily from nine in the morning until five in the afternoon. This is a new fashion for New York. The custom has been to have everything in the way of an art exhibition open in the evening—in the day-time also, if convenient, but, at all events, in the evening! Now it is simply absurd to look at a work of color by gas-light, for pleasure, for profit, or for judgment of its merits. If the object of an exhibition be to make money, and the public be ignorant of what pictures are, and desire to view them of an evening, let the public be gratified, by all means, and the treasury filled. But it ought to be well understood that pictures in full color are wholly invisible by gas-light. And so we are very grateful to the managers of this exhibition for promising to shut their doors every day at nightfall.

As the collection was shown on Thursday evening, it and the catalogue did not perfectly agree. According to the latter, there are one hundred and seventy-one pictures, by ninety-seven painters; but several of those enumerated were not to be found upon the walls. Want of room is the sufficient reason. But it is to be hoped that some room in the building can be secured to receive the outcasts, for one at least among them is of considerable importance.

We offer no analysis and no criticism of any picture here. The lessons to be learned from these pictures, or any of them, are matters for future careful consideration. It is possible that a few words might be written which would be useful to persons visiting the exhibition, and which would also serve to introduce it, as representative of European art, to those who will not see it but still care to hear about pictures. But, after all, we have not space to speak of every artist or of every noticeable picture, and must defer all detailed comment.

The committee in charge of this enterprise, and especially the more active members of it, whom we take to be Mr. Gambart and Mr. Knoedler, together with the secretary, Mr. Pilgeram, are entitled to the thanks of the community. The little peeps into the comparative daylight of Europe which we, in our darkness, get by the kindness of Mr. Knoedler and Mr. Avery, are of the greatest use to all of us, artists and laics together. This is a broader field of vision, and we are allowed a longer look at it. We are in the position of the traditional and perhaps mythical person whose business announcement has descended to our time, "The smallest favors thankfully received—and larger ones in proportion." We received very thankfully such favors as looks at Leys's "Wandering Minstrels," Tissot's "Margaret," Gérome's "Prayer in the Desert" and "Almée," the dozen or more delightful pictures by Edouard Frère, those by Williams and De Jonghe, and others. This last favor is certainly, by comparison, a large one, and we are grateful, we think, in proportion.

But we deem it right to call attention to the fact that this exhibition is no more truly representative of European art than are the single pictures or the accidental concurrences of two or three pictures which are often given us. In fact, a single first-rate picture is more nearly representative of the school or period of art to which it belongs than a collection of inferior ones can be. Now, it would be, perhaps, inaccurate to call this a collection of inferior pictures, although in so qualifying it we should use the word inferior in its proper relative sense; but it is true that there are no first-rate pictures in it, if we except the Gérome (No. 59, "Muezzin calling the Hour of Prayer—Evening, Cairo"), and it is true that some great painters are poorly represented, while some of the greatest painters are not represented at all. Per contra, some painters whom we hardly call great send us better work than has been seen of theirs before, so far as we know, in America; and some of the younger artists are now for the first time represented here. There is no doubt of the value of the exhibition which for the first time introduces to Americans such painters as Heilbuth, Köller, Alma-Tadema, and Dillens. And it is with no small pleasure that we greet so attractive a Willems as No. 170; so remarkable a Meissonier as No. 102; four pictures by Edouard Frère; two by Baron Leys (a third is catalogued, but not hung); and four by Plassau. But, we repeat, there are no first-rate pictures, unless the Gérome be such; some great painters, as Gérome, Leys, Millais, are but poorly represented, and some of the greatest painters, both French and English, are unrepresented.

We must, therefore, go to the galleries to learn what we can from single pictures, guarding ourselves carefully from the danger of too general conclusions about other art than our own, keeping ourselves from judging men or schools by too few and not uniformly well chosen examples of their practice. There is a great deal more good to be got out of the collection than we shall any of us get out of it; but we must be careful not to rate too highly its importance or its standard of excellence as regards modern art.

MUSIC.

"L'AFRICAINE."

A YEAR had passed after Meyerbeer's death when, after long preparation, "L'Africaine" was produced at Paris. Scribe, the author of the libretto, had died three years before. Few operas could arise from such a double grave. This, however, has won a triumph over death, thanks to the careful superintendence of M. Fétis, who left all his other duties to devote himself to the revisal of this master-piece of his friend. But if the author could have lived it would have been much more perfect; he only knew how to alter and revise. What he did in such cases we can tell when we remember that he wrote the celebrated duo in "Les Huguenots" during the rehearsals, and inserted it at the last moment.

"L'Africaine," though last completed, was not the last begun of Meyerbeer's works. It was first written as long ago as 1839. "Robert le Diable" appeared in 1831; "Les Huguenots" was given in 1836. The director of the opera at Paris was eager for another work. Meyerbeer had two in his hands, "Le Prophète" and "L'Africaine," but, though besieged for each alternately, refused to give them up. "Le Prophète" was finally represented in 1849. During the rehearsals of this opera, influenced by the criticism of a friend, he sent the libretto of "L'Africaine" back to Scribe, and it was entirely re-written. Originally, the story was only about some Fernando or other, loved by two women, a white and a black, ending in the death of the black under the upas tree, while seeing him sail off with her rival. To the passion of love was added in the new version the thirst for fame, and the authors connected it with the story of a famous man, Vasco di Gama, and with one of the greatest geographical discoveries, that of the Cape of Good Hope.

The revised libretto was returned to Meyerbeer in 1852, and the partition was finally finished in 1860. The old manuscripts, which are preserved, show that it was greatly improved.

In order to connect Vasco di Gama with the plot as first sketched out Scribe was obliged to sacrifice a little the truth of history, and make Vasco, whose life was one continued success, experience trials more like those of Columbus than of any one else. In fact, the character of Vasco, as drawn by Scribe and colored by Meyerbeer, is a tissue of contradictions. That an intense and absorbing eagerness in the pursuit of one object in life should so repeatedly give way to love is hardly probable, nor that the second love should so completely for a time eradicate the first. Musically the character is better; but that of Selika, the African queen, is much finer and is more harmoniously drawn. Nelusco, too, stands out a fine conception, while some of the minor personages, as the Grand Inquisitor and the High Priest of Brama, are musical types, never previously given, of great originality and power.

The plot is almost ridiculous. Scribe has not shown his usual skill in it. He and Meyerbeer were very well suited to one another, as their long collaboration shows. Scribe was not like Meyerbeer in character as he was like Auber; but he was a skilful worker, and could appreciate and make the most of the composer's ideas. His operas, all of them, are a mere groundwork of effective situations, which were filled up by the composer. This is more the case here than in any of Meyerbeer's other grand operas, of whose success Scribe is often considered the author. Here the play is a drag upon the music rather than an aid to it.

The partition is the opera here, and the hearing and reading of it show us that "L'Africaine" is one of the finest works of the composer, and instantly ranks on a level with his best. Time may put it at the head of them all, and make it the crowning glory of his life. The work commences with a fine introduction, worked up from two themes of the opera, one occurring in the romance of Inez in the first act—an air which recurs several times—and the other in the septuor at the end of the second act. Meyerbeer has never written a satisfactory overture, and this is a mere prelude, played principally by the wind instruments, which leads easily to the romance of Inez, a remembrance of the farewell of Vasco di Gama when he sailed on the expedition from which he has not yet returned. This is graceful and melodious, and contains a fragment of a waltz. A terzett follows, of an elevated and restrained style. We learn from these that Inez is in love with di Gama, but is forced by her father to marry Don Pedro, one of the king's council, who informs her of the death of her old lover. This is all at Lisbon, in the royal council chamber, which is speedily filled with the councillors, who come in to a march with a pointed rhythm, of a kind much liked by Meyerbeer, and of which his works offer many examples. The grand inquisitor and the other clergy invoke heaven in a hymn of great majesty and power, better suited to the occasion than if more devotional. This grand phrase is repeated several times in the finale, and each time with greater effect. The council is called to debate the question of sending a new expedition of discovery to the south, where the fleet of Diaz has just been lost. The discussion is hardly begun when Vasco di Gama is introduced, he being the only one of the fleet who had escaped alive. He tells, in a calm, dignified recitative, the story of the disaster, and asks for a new fleet, claiming, as his share of the expected returns, immortality alone. He introduces two slaves, Selika and Nelusco, to confirm his statements. They are haughtily reserved, and refuse to answer. The council consult, and reject the project of Vasco as mad. He is indignant, and insults them in return; for which he is condemned to perpetual imprisonment. This gives rise to a fine quatuor with a chorus, and to a splendid malediction, sung by the bishops in unison. This whole finale, with the enthusiastic declamation of Vasco, the bizarre music introducing the captives, the deliberations of the council, at first calm and grave, then excited and warm, the passions being only quieted by a repetition of the hymn, and the final burst of passion, all marked by continually varying rhythm and keys, is one of the finest pieces in all Meyerbeer's works. The celebrated fourth act of "Les Huguenots," with the benediction of the daggers, is the only thing that can be compared with it.

The second act lessens in musical as well as dramatic interest. Vasco is asleep in prison. Selika watches over him, and sings a delightful Indian melody accompanied with gentle tinklings of the triangle, producing a very pleasing effect. Nelusco, jealous of Vasco, in an air of classic turn, and perhaps too regular for a savage, declares his intention of killing him to save the honor of his queen, and is only prevented by Selika awakening Vasco. Then follows a duet of some beauty, but of doubtful character, the subject being the elucidation of a geographical question. Inez comes to liberate Vasco, and, in a septett, quite delicately accompanied, Vasco learns that he is deprived by Don Pedro at once of his bride and of his fame. He has his revenge, however, by Pedro's acceptance of Nelusco as his pilot. This finale is noticeable for the way in which the voices are allowed to die away without the usual crescendo accompaniment.

The third act finds us on board ship on the ocean. This ship is a fine specimen of stage carpentry, though the celebrated manœuvre is here almost nothing. The great objection to it is that it takes so long to prepare and remove it, with so little result either dramatically or musically. We could have wished that the mast were prolonged to its full height and that it did not stop short behind the sail. A chorus of women at the beginning of the act is cut out, as well as a duett and septett. The best part of it is the fine sailors' chorus, "Su, su, marinari," followed by the prayer, "O gran San Domenico," introduced by the tolling of the bell, and sung by a double chorus. The interest of the act centres on the few phrases without accompaniment with which Nelusco commands the course of the ship to be changed. The ballad of "Adamastor" is odd, with an accompaniment of violins played on with the wood of the bows, but is out of place, and shows a yielding in Meyerbeer to the demands of French taste, which requires a ballad in every opera. Vasco, who has followed in a ship of his own, boards the vessel, informs Don Pedro of Nelusco's treachery, but too late. The vessel grounds, and is attacked by savages, who, with strange incorrectness, are armed with tomahawks, and dance over the decks and murder the crew.

All operas have one great act. In both "The Prophet" and "The Huguenots" the fourth is the best. In this, too, the fourth is the best, but it is almost equalled by the first and the fifth. We have now reached the country of which Selika is queen, wherever it may be. In the original it was Madagascar, in this version it is Hindostan; at all events it is some mythical place sufficiently near Africa to give the name to the opera, and like enough India to have the religion of Brahma. The whole fourth act is a new revelation. It is as far from the first act in character as the religion of India is from that of the Inquisition. The music is strange, weird, and oriental. Dances of a novel character introduce it, and an Indian march, which is almost a dance, till reinforced by a brass band on the stage. Different groups enter, priests, warriors, dancing girls, Brahmins, and each is characterized by the music. It swells to a tremendous outburst at the approach of the queen. Selika is then crowned and recognized by her subjects. We regret the omission here of two very beautiful choruses. Vasco here approaches, enchanted by the beauty of the country. The andantino with which he comes in is a marvel of orchestration. A very delicate melody on the clarionet detaches itself from the murmur of flutes and violins, with occasional responses of the cymbals, but the remainder of the air is not equal to this movement. He is about to be slain when Selika saves him by declaring him her husband, a statement which she makes Nelusco reluctantly confirm in a passage of tender beauty. The grand Brahmin unites them according to the Indian rites, and they are left alone. Here follows a duet, in many respects equal to that between Raoul and Valentine, or Jean and Fides. It is love, this time the passionate love of a savage, and the momentary enthusiasm produced by a potion, which dies away when the voice of Inez, singing his farewell song, is heard in the distance.

Of the fifth act we have only two scenes, a duet betwen Selika and Inez, somewhat similar in character to that between Norma and Adalgisa, but far surpassing it in beauty, and remarkable particularly for one phrase: "E per tanto ei t'ama ancor." The impression produced by this deepens at every hearing. Selika gives up Vasco and sends him away with Inez, and resolves to die. For this purpose she goes under the upas-tree, takes her last look at the retreating vessel, and sinks into a stupor. Introducing this is one of the most remarkable passages of the whole work. It consists of only sixteen bars, but in unison. In unison absolutely, for no octaves are used, and the different sets of stringed instruments, supported by two bassoons, play the same air, ranging only over eleven notes. The melody is remarkable, the sound is loud but absolutely pure. The quality is very beautiful, being at times almost like the human voice. The effect is strange, and the audience are silent and affected.

We have no space to speak of the manner of the performance last Friday night, except to say that few operas have ever been given here with so great regard to scenic effect, and with so great propriety and correctness. The singing was at times weak, but that we hope will be cured in subsequent representations.

NOW READY.

GOLDEN-HAIRED GERTRUDE.

THEODORE TILTON'S STORY.

A NEW AND BEAUTIFUL MARRIAGE CERTIFICATE,

THE FINEST IN THE MARKET.

Price 20 Cents.

TIBBALS & WHITING,

37 Park Row, N. Y.

JOHN PENINGTON & SON,

BOOKSELLERS AND IMPORTERS,

127 South Seventh Street, Philadelphia.

(Established in 1841.)

Books imported to order by steamer and by sailing packet.

Catalogues received and bids transmitted for books sold by auction in England, France, and Germany.

Subscriptions effected and the publications received for American members of foreign societies.

Recently published, a "Catalogue of the Classical Writers of Greece and of Rome, with works relating to them;" also one of "Works connected with American History," which will be sent to the address of those who desire to receive them.

In preparation, a Catalogue of French Books, old and new.

THE GREAT ILLUSTRATED BOOK OF THE YEAR!

MESSRS. BUNCE & HUNTINGTON

HAVE NOW READY

THE FESTIVAL OF SONG:

A SERIES OF

EVENINGS WITH THE POETS.

PREPARED BY THE AUTHOR OF "SALAD FOR THE SOLITARY," "MOSAICS," ETC

SUPERBLY ILLUSTRATED

WITH SEVENTY-THREE ORIGINAL DRAWINGS

BY THE LEADING ARTISTS OF THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN, INCLUDING

Huntington,	Homer,	Fredericks,	Benson,
Gray,	James Hart,	Nehlig,	Hennessy,
Church,	Bierstadt,	Gignoux,	J. D. Smillie,
Kensett,	De Haas,	Wm. Hart,	G. H. Smillie,
Durand,	Eastman Johnson,	Bellows,	Parsons,
Shattuck,	Cropsey,	Suydam,	Waterman,
McEntee,	Darley,	Hows,	Dix,
Colman,	Gifford,	Brevoort,	Whittredge.

The Engravings executed on Wood, in the highest style of the Art, by Messrs. Bobbett and Hooper.

The illustrations in this work were exclusively contributed by the artists of the National Academy, including in the list the most distinguished names in American art.

It is believed that, for the exquisite finish and brilliancy of its numerous illustrations, and the perfection of all its art and mechanical features, it will be regarded by all lovers of elegant books as a great advance over the productions of its class that have yet appeared. It presents altogether a higher order and more brilliant array of artistic talent than has before been assembled in one publication.

The literary portion of the work is novel and attractive, comprising a concentration of the most perfect and brilliant passages of our great poets, English and American, from the age of Chaucer to the present time, interspersed with brief comments, anecdotes, and criticism—thereby affording a rich treasury of the poetic wealth of the language.

In one elegant quarto volume of 392 pages, printed on toned paper, and bound by Matthews in rich and elegant styles of morocco, etc.

Price in Levant morocco, gilt.....$20 00
" morocco antique..... 18 00
" cloth extra, full gilt sides and edges..... 15 00

Messrs. Bunce & Huntington have also just ready:

I.

MELODIES AND MADRIGALS;

MOSTLY FROM THE OLD POETS.

Edited by R. H. Stoddard.

With an illuminated title by Hows, and printed in Italic type and red border. A peculiarly unique and elegant volume. Square 16mo, 224 pp., cloth, extra gilt sides and edges. Price $2 75.

 "The object which I had in view, while collecting the materials of this volume, was to present the English poets in their most poetical moods, not as the makers of long, sustained poems, which most of them are not, but as the singers of short, sweet, unpremeditated lyrics."—Extract from Editor's Preface.

II.

THE KING'S BELL:

A MEDIÆVAL LEGEND.

By Richard Henry Stoddard.

Illustrated with eight full-page Drawings, of unusual spirit and graphic power, by Alfred Fredericks.

 This beautiful poem has been reprinted in England and Germany, and in both countries received the warm encomiums of the critics. The story in itself is highly dramatic, and, as related in the pure and beautiful verse of the poet, it rises to a profoundly pathetic, tender, and passionate human interest. The illustrations by Mr. Fredericks are a brilliant success. Elegantly printed, in a small quarto, on tinted paper Price $2 50.

III.

THE LATE ENGLISH POETS.

Containing copious selections from all the more recent of the English poets, including the best productions of Matthew Arnold, Charles Kingsley, Alex. Smith, Wm. Allingham, Robert Buchanan, Frederick Tennyson, Thackeray, Sydney Dobell, Gerald Massey, Adelaide Anne Procter, Jean Ingelow, Algernon Chas. Swinburne, Miss Muloch, and others.

Elegantly printed on tinted paper. Uniform in size and style with our "Golden Leaves" series. 16mo, 560 pp., bevelled boards, gilt top. Price $2 50.

BUNCE & HUNTINGTON, Publishers,
459 Broome St., New York.

THE BEST HOLIDAY GIFT

FOR

BOYS AND GIRLS

Is a Year's Subscription to

THE LITTLE CORPORAL.

Acknowledged by the leading papers to be the Best Children's Paper in America!

Published Monthly by

ALFRED L. SEWELL,

Chicago, Illinois.

PRICE ONE DOLLAR A YEAR, IN ADVANCE,

Including a

BEAUTIFUL STEEL ENGRAVING AS A PREMIUM TO EVERY SUBSCRIBER.

SAMPLE COPY, TEN CENTS.

CIRCULARS SENT FREE.

Every person who shall send six subscribers, and six dollars, will receive as a premium one extra copy for one year, and also a copy of the Engraving.

Other inducements for larger clubs.

All pages are electrotyped, and back numbers can always be furnished.

READ WHAT THE PAPERS SAY:

"It already excels every children's paper that we know of in this country."—Chicago Evening Journal.

THE LITTLE CORPORAL.—The Pittsburg Christian Advocate says: "The best paper for children published in this great country of ours, is The Little Corporal. It is a gem in the catalogue of monthlies."

Forney's Philadelphia Daily Press says of it: "The Little Corporal is destined to become the great children's paper of America."

"We cannot say too much in favor of this beautiful paper."—Bryan [O.] Press.

"The Little Corporal sparkles all over with vivacity and entertainment. It is, without doubt, the best and cheapest children's gazette published anywhere."—Marshall [Mich.] Statesman.

"THE LITTLE CORPORAL.—Though modestly calling itself by a subordinate title, it is really a very major-general among the children's magazines."—Chenango Telegraph [Norwich, N. Y.]

"The Little Corporal is the most interesting and instructive monthly in the Union."—Louisville Democrat.

"The Little Corporal is universally admitted to be the best juvenile paper now in existence."—Dubuque Daily Times.

"We like it better than ever."—N. W. C. Advocate.

"It strikes the right key, and is admirable—neither heavy nor silly, but simple, fresh, buoyant, and earnest."—Adams [N. Y.] Visitor.

"Its influence for good can never be estimated."—Grand Haven News.

"Indeed, there is no paper of the kind published that approaches it as a juvenile journal."—Poughkeepsie Daily Press.

"Of all the children's papers which are competitors for the patronage of the public, we know of no one which so nearly approximates to our standard of what such a paper should be. The terms are most liberal."—Batavia [N. Y.] Republican Advocate.

"The children will be better and happier from reading it."—Henry [Ill.] Courier.

"The Little Corporal really excels any child's paper we have seen. The premium picture is of itself worth a year's subscription."—Sandusky [O.] Reg.

"We consider it the best, decidedly the best, journal of the kind for children that we ever saw."—Star of the Valley [Newville, Pa.]

"We have the first two numbers of The Little Corporal, which are edited with unusual ability. They sparkle with originality, and are attractive on every page."—Worcester [Mass.] Palladium.

"The Little Corporal is the most readable and interesting and instructive paper for children we have ever perused."—Farmington [Maine] Chronicle.

"It is the cleverest thing of its kind yet realized in America."—Roxbury [Mass.] Journal.

"THE LITTLE CORPORAL.—Certainly, we have seen nothing in the shape of a child's paper which could compare with this, which comes to us from over the prairies."—Portland [Maine] Daily Press.

The above are only a tithe of the many beautiful notices our young soldier has received.

Address ALFRED L. SEWELL,

Care of Dunlop, Sewell & Spalding,

CHICAGO, ILL.

FOUR NEW WORKS,

JUST READY AND PUBLISHED BY

CHARLES SCRIBNER & COMPANY,

124 GRAND STREET, NEW YORK.

I.

REV. DR. BUSHNELL'S NEW WORK.

THE VICARIOUS SACRIFICE. Grounded on Principles of Universal Obligation. By HORACE BUSHNELL, D.D., Author of "Sermons for the New Life," "Nature and the Supernatural," etc. In 1 vol. octavo. $3.

II.

HISTORY OF RATIONALISM.

EMBRACING A SURVEY OF THE PRESENT STATE OF PROTESTANT THEOLOGY. By Rev. JNO. F. HURST, A.M. 1 vol. 8vo. $3 50.

The history of Rationalism is traced through all its stages of development down to the present time. The whole period passed over is about two centuries, and, in giving a history of Rationalism during this time, it has been an object of the author to describe indirectly the state of Protestant Theology at the present time. The object of the work is to counteract the scepticism which is now coming into this country, by showing the evils it has inflicted on other lands.

III.

ELEMENTS OF POLITICAL ECONOMY.

By ARTHUR LATHAM PERRY, Professor of History and Political Economy in Williams College. 1 vol. crown 8vo. Price $2 50.

This is a clear presentation of the facts and principles of Political Economy. It is believed to be equally adapted to the wants of teachers in their class-rooms and to the general public, which is now demanding, as never before, information and discussion on this important subject. The topics of Money and Foreign Trade, as being practical questions now in agitation throughout the country, have received a very full treatment; and the late as well as the earlier financial experiments of the United States are fully considered in the light of the principles illustrated by it. The book has already in manuscript received the cordial approval of several distinguished teachers of political science.

IV.

BY PROF. GEO. P. FISHER.

ESSAYS ON THE SUPERNATURAL ORIGIN OF CHRISTIANITY.

With special reference to the Theories of Renan, Strauss, and the Tübingen School. By Professor GEO. P. FISHER, of Yale College. 1 vol. 8vo, $3 50.

This work presents a critical examination of the principal theories proposed from the side of Naturalism in opposition to the truth of Gospel history. The historical speculations of the Tübingen School are fully discussed, and the genuineness and credibility of the New Testament Historical Books are vindicated against the assaults of Dr. Baur, and his fallacies. The book will also embrace a dissertation upon the Personality of God and the Followers of Pantheism. The work is not a refutation of obsolete errors, but a discussion of living questions and current forms of unbelief. It is adapted not only to meet the wants of ministers and theological students, but also of intelligent laymen.

ALSO JUST READY,

A New and Revised Edition, with a Supplement, of the CYCLOPÆDIA OF AMERICAN LITERATURE.

CYCLOPÆDIA OF AMERICAN LITERATURE. By E. A. and G. L. DUYCKINCK. Embracing Personal and Critical Notices of Authors, and selections from their Writings, from the Earliest Period to the Present Day. With 225 portraits, 425 autographs, and 75 views of colleges, libraries, and residences of authors, and elegant steel engravings of J. Fenimore Cooper and Benjamin Franklin. 2 vols. royal 8vo, cloth, $10; half calf, $16.

This new edition of the Cyclopædia of American Literature, which has been for some time out of print, will include a SUPPLEMENT, bringing the work down to the present year. Many new articles relating to Old and Recent Authors have been added, with numerous Obituaries of Authors already included, and much additional matter respecting living authors and their publications, previously noticed.

Also a new edition, in octavo size and elegantly printed at the University Press on extra finished paper, of NATURAL HISTORY AND ZOOLOGY.

By Prof. SANBORN TENNEY, A M., with over 500 Engravings, in 1 vol. 8vo, 540 pages, price $4 50.

In this book particular attention has been given to a full description of the Quadrupeds, Insects, Reptiles, Fishes, Shells, etc., of North America, and especially of those appertaining to our own country. "It is believed that this volume surpasses any yet published." The illustrations are on "a scale," and engraved in the very best style.

Copies sent by mail post-paid on receipt of price.

HURRAH! HURRAH!! HURRAH!!!

THREE TIMES THREE, BOYS!

FOR

Three New Books,

BY

OLIVER OPTIC.

I.

JUST ISSUED:

THE YANKEE MIDDY;

OR,

THE ADVENTURES OF A NAVAL OFFICER.

A sequel to the "Sailor Boy."

BY

OLIVER OPTIC.

1 vol. 16mo. Illustrated. Price $1 50.

Being the Fourth Volume of the popular and patriotic ARMY AND NAVY STORIES.

☞ A LIBRARY FOR YOUNG AND OLD.

II.

READY SATURDAY, DEC. 2, 1865:

WORK AND WIN;

OR, MIDDY NEWMAN ON A CRUISE.

BY

OLIVER OPTIC.

1 vol. 16mo. Illustrated. Price $1 25.

Being the Fourth Volume of the entertaining WOODVILLE STORIES.

III.

READY DECEMBER 10:

FIGHTING JOE;

OR,

THE FORTUNES OF A STAFF OFFICER.

A sequel to "The Soldier Boy" and "The Young Lieutenant."

BY

OLIVER OPTIC.

1 vol. 16mo. Illustrated. Price $1 50.

Being the Fifth Volume of ARMY AND NAVY STORIES.

☞ A LIBRARY FOR YOUNG AND OLD.

For sale by all Booksellers, and sent by mail on receipt of price.

LEE & SHEPARD, PUBLISHERS,

149 Washington Street, Boston.

ILLUSTRATED CHRISTMAS BOOKS.

LELAND'S LEGENDS OF THE BIRDS. With 12 lithographs, 4to, fancy boards, $1 50.

PEARLS FROM HEINE. With illustrations and vignettes, 4to, 75 cents.

MOTHER GOOSE FROM GERMANY. Profusely illustrated, 4to, fancy boards, 75c.

MOTHER PITCHER'S POEMS FOR LITTLE PEOPLE. 4to, fancy boards, 75c.

MOTHER MICHEL AND HER CAT. With illustrations and vignettes, 16mo, $1.

LA MERE L'OIE. Poésies, Enigmas, Chansons et Rondes Enfantines. Illustrated, 8vo, fancy boards, $1.

EIA POPEIA. Deutsche Kinderheimath in Wort und Sang und Bild. Illustrated, 8vo, fancy boards, 75c.

THE ROOT PRINCESS. A Christmas Tale. 4to, fancy boards, 75c.

GUSTAVE DORÉ'S ILLUSTRATIONS.

PHOTOGRAPHS.

THE LEGEND OF THE WANDERING JEW. $5.

ATALA ALBUM. Portfolio, $5.

SLEEPING BEAUTY IN THE WOOD. 4to, cloth gilt, $3.

DANTE ALBUM. Portfolio, complete, 76 photographs, 4to, $25.

MINIATURE DANTE ALBUM. In case, $12.

FAIRY ALBUM. In case, $6 50.

Any of the above sent, post-paid, on receipt of the price, by

F. LEYPOLDT, 646 BROADWAY.

ECLECTIC MAGAZINE.

LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

BEAUTIFUL EMBELLISHMENTS!

FINE STEEL ENGRAVINGS!

NEW VOLUME BEGINS JANUARY, 1866.

NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE.

THE ECLECTIC MAGAZINE is, as its name indicates, a selection from other magazines and periodicals. These selections are carefully made each month, from the entire range of foreign periodicals. In this respect it is entirely unlike other monthlies, and has no rival. The following are some of the works from which selections are made:

LONDON QUARTERLY,	REVUE DES DEUX MONDES,
BRITISH QUARTERLY,	LONDON SOCIETY,
NORTH BRITISH REVIEW,	BENTLEY'S MISCELLANY,
POPULAR SCIENCE REVIEW,	CORNHILL MAGAZINE,
SATURDAY REVIEW,	FRASER'S MAGAZINE,
LEISURE HOUR,	TEMPLE BAR,
WESTMINSTER REVIEW,	CHAMBERS'S JOURNAL,
DUBLIN UNIVERSITY,	EDINBURGH REVIEW,
ART JOURNAL,	LONDON NATIONAL REVIEW,
MACMILLAN,	ST. JAMES,
SUNDAY MAGAZINE,	GOOD WORDS,
SUNDAY AT HOME,	VICTORIA MAGAZINE,
READER,	FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW,
BLACKWOOD,	ATHENÆUM.

While our own literature is indispensable, yet a knowledge of the literature of other countries is equally essential to all who would keep pace with the progress of the human mind. The main features of the work will remain the same, but some changes will be made, adapted, it is believed, to the present wants of the public.

We have also arranged to secure choice selections from the FRENCH, GERMAN, AND OTHER CONTINENTAL PERIODICALS, translated especially for the ECLECTIC, and it is hoped this new feature will add greatly to the variety and value of the work.

EMBELLISHMENTS.

Each number is embellished with one or more FINE STEEL ENGRAVINGS—portraits of eminent men, or illustrative of important historical events.

With the extensive resources at his command, the Editor hopes to make the work a necessity to every intelligent reader, and no pains will be spared to accomplish this result.

Volumes commence in January and July of each year; subscriptions can commence with any month.

Terms.

$5 PER YEAR, SINGLE NUMBERS 50 CENTS.

The Trade, Clergymen, Teachers, and Clubs supplied on favorable terms. Address

W. H. BIDWELL,

5 BEEKMAN STREET, N. Y.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS OF PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.

501 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

In addition to our main business of PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS, we are Headquarters for the following, viz.:

STEREOSCOPES AND STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS.

Of these we have an immense assortment, including War Scenes, American and Foreign Cities and Landscapes, Groups, Statuary, etc., etc.; also, Revolving Stereoscopes, for public or private exhibition. Our Catalogue will be sent to any address on receipt of

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS.

We were the first to introduce these into the United States, and we manufacture immense quantities in great variety, ranging in price from 50 cents to $50 each. Our ALBUMS have the reputation of being superior in beauty and durability to any others They will be sent by mail, FREE, on receipt of price.

☞ FINE ALBUMS MADE TO ORDER. ☜

CARD PHOTOGRAPHS.

Our Catalogue now embraces over FIVE THOUSAND different subjects, to which additions are continually being made of Portraits of Eminent Americans—viz., about

100 Major-Generals,	100 Lieut.-Colonels,	550 Statesmen
200 Brig.-Generals,	250 Other Officers,	130 Divines,
275 Colonels,	75 Navy Officers,	125 Authors,
40 Artists,	125 Stage,	50 Prominent Women.

3,000 Copies of Works of Art,

including reproductions of the most celebrated Engravings, Paintings, Statues, etc. Catalogues sent on receipt of stamp. An order for One Dozen PICTURES from our Catalogue will be filled on the receipt of $1 80, and sent by mail FREE.

Photographers and others ordering goods C. O. D., will please remit twenty-five per cent. of the amount with their orders.

☞ Soldiers' Pocket Albums for 18 pictures, 75 cents.

☞ The price and quality of our goods cannot fail to satisfy.

"The great literary enterprise of the day."—Boston Post.

WE HAVE NEARLY READY FOR PUBLICATION

THE DECLINE OF THE MONARCHY, 1615–1787.

BY HENRI MARTIN.

(Being the second instalment of Martin's great "History of France.")

2 vols. royal 8vo., elegantly printed.

Last autumn we commenced the publication of this work by the issue in two 8vo volumes of which, with the volumes now to be published, presents a connected history of France from 1661 to 1787—the point at which THIERS takes up the narrative, and embracing a period of remarkable interest. The above two epochs, each complete in themselves, are sold separately, or as part of the whole work. Sold only by subscription. Address as below.

THE AGE OF LOUIS XIV.,

MISS MARTINEAU'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND, 1800-1854; of which 2 vols. (1800–1826) are now ready, and the remaining two (including the original portion prepared expressly for this edition, and a full index) will be published in a few weeks. 4 vols., complete, $10.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED:

THE LIFE OF HORACE MANN. By HORACE MANN. $3 00.
REASON IN RELIGION. By Rev. Dr. HEDGE. $2 00.
THE PRESIDENT'S WORDS. The best biography of President Lincoln. $1 25.
THE THINKING BAYONET. By the Author of "Color Guard." $1 75.

A new and cheap edition of HYMNS FOR MOTHERS AND CHILDREN. $1 25.

IN PRESS, FOR IMMEDIATE PUBLICATION:

ROME. A new volume of the favorite "Spectacle Series." $1 00.
YOUTH'S HISTORY OF THE REBELLION. Concluding volumes. $1 50 per vol.
HYMNS FOR MOTHERS AND CHILDREN. New series. Exquisitely illustrated. $2 50.
HISTORY OF THE FIRST MASS. REGIMENT. By the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CUDWORTH. $2 50.

WALKER, FULLER & CO., BOSTON

UNRIVALLED.

HURD & HOUGHTON,

401 Broadway, New York,

HAVE NOW READY

THE COMPLETE SERIES OF THOSE UNRIVALLED BOOKS,

ILLUSTRATED BY H. L. STEPHENS,

Consisting of
THE FIVE LITTLE PIGS,
THE FOX AND GEESE,
OLD MOTHER RUBBARD AND HER DOG,
THE HOUSE THAT JACK BUILT,
THE DEATH AND BURIAL OF POOR COCK ROBIN.

Each book contains sixteen lithographed illustrations from original designs by H. L. Stephens, handsomely printed with a tint on fine paper, and bound in boards with illuminated cover. Demy quarto, price $1 25 each.

Opinions of the Press.

"Mr. Stephens has lavished upon these story-books a degree of talent which makes them instructive to the least artistic perception. The designs are free, accurate, and spirited, as well as elaborately finished."—Boston Transcript.

"Mr. Stephens, in his illustrations, clothes his birds and frogs and animals in a style which fully equals anything the German or French artists have ever done."—Evening Post.

"These little volumes will amuse young and old, and appear to be generally appreciated."—Philadelphia Press.

☞ Sent free per mail on receipt of price.

STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS OF THE WAR,

obtained at great expense, and forming a

COMPLETE PHOTOGRAPHIC HISTORY

OF THE

GREAT UNION CONTEST.

Bull Run,	Dutch Gap,	Strawberry Plains,
Yorktown,	Pontoon Trains,	Deep Bottom,
Gettysburg,	Hanover Junction,	Belle Plain,
Fair Oaks,	Lookout Mountain,	Monitors,
Savage Station,	Chickahominy,	Chattanooga,
Fredericksburg,	City Point,	Fort Morgan,
Fairfax,	Nashville,	Atlanta,
Richmond,	Charleston,	Mobile,
Petersburg,	Etc., Etc.	Etc., Etc.

Everybody is interested in these memorable scenes.

Just published by

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
501 Broadway, New York.

☞ Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.

HURD & HOUGHTON,

401 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

WILL PUBLISH

ON TUESDAY, DECEMBER 5:

1. THE CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOGRAPHY.
A Record of the Lives of Eminent Persons. By PARKE GODWIN. A new edition, with a supplement brought down to the present time. By GEORGE SHEPPARD. 1 vol. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

2. ANDERSEN'S TALES FOR CHILDREN.
Translated by ALFRED WEHNERT, with one hundred and five illustrations by E. H. Wehnert, W. Thomas, and others. 1 vol. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

3. THE WATER LILY.
By HARRIET MYRTLE. With twenty illustrations by Hablot K. Browne. 1 vol. quarto, Cloth, 90 cents.

4. THE DUTCH PILGRIM FATHERS.
And other Poems, Humorous and not Humorous. By EDWARD HOPPER. 1 vol. 16mo, Cloth, $1 50.

5. THE FABLES OF ÆSOP.
(Riverside edition), with a Life of the Author and Croxall's Applications. Illustrated with one hundred and eleven engravings, from original designs, by H. W. Herrick. 1 vol. 16mo, Cloth, $2 00.

6. PICCIOLA.
(Riverside edition). By X. B. SAINTINE. A new translation from the author's last revised edition, with illustrations by Leopold Flameng, and ornamental head and tail pieces, from designs by Wills. 1 vol. 16mo, Cloth, $1 50.

7. ON THE FERRY BOAT.
By JEANNIE HARRISON, author of "The Right Way." 1 vol. 16mo, Cloth, 60 cents.

 Any of the above free per mail on receipt of price.

Choice Imported Books at Reasonable Prices.

J. W. BOUTON, having recently returned from Europe, begs to invite the attention of collectors and the public to his selections made while abroad, consisting of fine copies of STANDARD, MISCELLANEOUS, AND ILLUSTRATED WORKS.

Among which will be found desirable copies of the following: DIBDIN'S WORKS, 21 vols., boards, uncut; RETROSPECTIVE REVIEW, 16 vols. 8vo, calf, extra; PERCY SOCIETY PUBLICATIONS, 31 vols.; PAINTER'S PALACE OF PLEASURES; WALPOLE'S ROYAL AND NOBLE AUTHORS, 5 vols. 4to, large paper; RAPHAEL'S FRESCOES IN THE VATICAN; MACKLIN'S BIBLE, 7 vols. folio; ART JOURNAL, 25 vols.; CUNNINGHAM'S LIVES OF ILLUSTRIOUS ENGLISHMEN, 18 vols., 400 extra plates; NICHOLS'S HOGARTH, 3 vols. 4to; GROSS'S ANTIQUITIES, 12 vols. folio; LODGE'S PORTRAITS, 12 vols. royal 8vo; PITTI GALLERY, 4 vols. folio; FLORENCE GALLERY, 4 vols. folio; MUSEE FRANCAIS and MUSEE ROYAL, 6 vols. folio; BOYDELL'S SHAKESPEARE GALLERY; DUGDALE'S MONASTICON ANGLICANUM, 8 vols.; NICHOLS'S ANECDOTES, 17 vols.; GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE, 211 vols., complete. A choice collection of PICKERING'S and the CHISWICK PRESS PUBLICATIONS; ILLUMINATED MISSALS, etc., etc., all of which are now on view and for SALE by

J. W. BOUTON, 481 Broadway, New York.

 Priced Catalogues sent to any address on receipt of a stamp to pay postage.

FINANCIAL REVIEW.

NATION OFFICE, Monday Morning,
Dec. 4, 1865.

THE general trade of the port of New York for the week ending on Saturday was fairly active. The foreign imports were $5,143,629, of which $1,994,024 was dry goods; the aggregate import entries for the calendar year to date are $197,400,000, being a decrease from last year of $11,900,000. Our exports of produce and merchandise continue light; for the eleven months ending 30th November they are $46,000,000 behind those of the corresponding period of last year. The export of specie continues nominal. Our receipts of cotton continue large, say 22,000 bales a week, and the pric has given way about two cents per pound; but the stock is firmly held, owing to the confidence of speculators for the rise, and the ease with which money can be borrowed on cotton. Nothing definite has yet been received from the South with regard to the prospects of the crop of 1866; the ex-rebels predict that the negroes will not work, and that there will be no crop whatever, while the agents of the Freedmen's Bureau are hopeful of a yield at least as large as that of 1864 or 1865. From the West our receipts of breadstuffs have been increasing of late, but the falling-off from last year is too heavy to be overcome at this late period of the season. The falling-off was, on November 23, in flour, 286,000 barrels, 5,630,000 bushels wheat, 1,200,000 bushels oats, etc., etc.; while the receipts of corn at tide-water were 7,200,000 bushels in excess of those of the same period of last year, but 4,100,000 bushels behind those of 1863. As the wheat crop of 1865 was much larger than that of 1864, it may be inferred that large stocks are held back at the West in the hands of farmers and speculators. In the event of the adoption of vigorous measures of currency contraction, a panic in breadstuffs would thus be imminent at the food centres of the West. In general merchandise there is nothing worth particular mention, except the great advance in copper, occasioned by the war in Chili. The article has advanced £22 a ton in England, and sales were made here last week at 46 cents per lb. Should the war last, the consequences upon our Lake Superior interests would be very important. Chili is the largest producer of copper in the world; should the Spanish blockade of her ports be maintained for a few months, the development of our mines on Lake Superior—which has been arrested by the want of capital—will, probably, be prosecuted with vigor, and a large number of mines which are now half developed, and in the hands of companies that have expended all their means, will be placed on a paying basis. The expenditure of a few million dollars on Lake Superior would, probably, double the copper product of the United States, and, at anything like present prices, the outlay would be returned within three years.

The following table will show the course of prices in the stock, exchange, gold, and money markets during the week:

	Nov. 25.	Dec. 2.	Advance.	Decline.
United States Sixes of 1881	105⅞	106⅛	⅝	....
5-20 Bonds, old	101⅛	101¼	....	¾
5-20 Bonds of 1865	99⅛	99⅛	....	⅛
10-40 Bonds	91	90¾	....	¼
7-30 Notes, second series	97¼	96⅛	....	1¼
New York Central	97¼	97⅝	⅜	....
Erie Railway	93¼	92	....	1¼
Hudson River	110	108¾	....	1¼
Reading Railroad	116¼	115⅜	....	⅞
Michigan Southern	76¼	75¾	....	½
Cleveland and Pittsburg	92⅝	92¾	⅛	....
Chicago and North-Western	36¾	36	....	¾
" " " Preferred	65¾	64¾	....	1
Chicago and Rock Island	109⅛	107	....	2⅛
P., Fort Wayne and Chicago	105⅛	105¼	....	¼
Canton	45	46	1	....
Cumberland	44¾	43¾	....	1
Mariposa	14	16	2	....
American Gold	147	148¼	1¼	....
Bankers' Bills on London	109	109	....	....
Call Loans	7	7	....	....

As a general rule, the movement of prices has been downward, in view of the expected report of the Secretary of the Treasury in favor of contraction. Comment on the subject would be out of place, as the report itself will be in the hands of the people about as soon as these lines are read. It must suffice at present to note the facts. Government securities have declined, with the exception of the Sixes of 1881, of which the supply in market is small and inadequate to meet any unexpected demand. Five-Twenties and Ten-Forties are ⅜ a ½ lower; the foreign demand for these securities has ceased; they might be imported from Europe to pay a profit to the importers. Seven-Thirties, second series, are again down to 96½, at which figure the subscribers net a loss of over 3 per cent. The market is supplied with these securities by National Banks, which took them on speculation, or advanced the money to subscribers, and which are now anxious to realize, for fear of currency contraction. It is feared by many that before these securities find a final resting place they may decline to still lower figures. Parties who may be advised to sacrifice them should remember that the faith of the Government is pledged to their redemption at par in currency within three years from their date. The option of converting them into long bonds rests with the holder, not with Government.

The railway and miscellaneous shares are generally lower than they were a week ago. The exceptions are Mariposa, which is 2 per cent. higher, on the judgment discharging the receiver and handing over the property to the trustees; Canton, which is being gradually absorbed by parties in the management and their friends, on the theory that the company is at length going to prove profitable; and Cleveland and Pittsburg, which is manipulated by a clique, and is pushed up and let down alternately to suit their necessities. The books close next week, and after the closing no further conversions of bonds can take place till they re-open. During the closing it is surmised that an attempt may be made to "corner the shorts." A dividend of 4 per cent. was declared at Cleveland on the 30th of November, payable 10th January; it is just a year since the last dividend—5 per cent.—was paid out of money borrowed for the purpose by the new direction. It is estimated that the party which, under the auspices of the American National Bank of this city, obtained control of the Cleveland and Pittsburg Road in December, 1864, paid a million dollars in money for the luxury. The new election takes place this month. The heaviest decline during the week was in Rock Island and Hudson River. These stocks are understood to have been largely held by a prominent firm which enjoys intimate relations with a member of Congress, and the heavy fall is ascribed to sales by this firm, predicated on early intelligence of the extremely conservative tenor of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. Erie sold as high at one time last week as 93¾. It closed on Saturday 1¾ per cent. lower. It is still selling 3 or 4 per cent. higher here than in London, and the bears look for large receipts of the stock from abroad. Such expectations have seldom been realized. So long as foreign holders receive their interest and dividends regularly from this side, they are seldom influenced by the fluctuations of our markets. The receipts of all the railways continue large, and the prospect is that very few of them will be able to carry the freight which will be offered them this winter. The four trunk lines are sure of more business than they can do with their present equipment and single track.

Money was easy throughout the week at 7 per cent. on miscellaneous collaterals, with occasional exceptions at 6 on governments or choice railways. The Sub-Treasury began to pay off the "tadpole" notes on the 1st inst., and its disbursements were large on Friday and Saturday, which added considerably to the supply of money on the Street. Still, the balance is higher than it was a week ago; it amounted on Saturday evening to the extraordinary sum of $77,259,000; more than half of which is gold, and about $7,000,000 "tadpole" notes to be cancelled. The banks are gaining currency from the South and West, and will for the present continue to show an increase of legal-tender strength. The national bank currency now amounts to about $225,000,000, and it is understood that a further issue of $100,000,000, swelling the aggregate authority to $400,000,000, will be authorized by Congress.

Gold advanced at one time last week to 148¾, and closed yesterday at about 148¼, 1¼ per cent. higher than on Nov. 25. The advance was exclusively due to political rumors with regard to the relations between this country and France. Exchange did not participate in the advance, thus showing that it was independent of mercantile influences. There is but little speculation in gold at this time; the Gold Room is one of the quietest and coziest places in the city. But it may be noted that no considerable body of operators are willing to sell gold for the fall at any material reduction from the cash price. Six months ago, scores of individuals were willing to give two points for a sixty or even a thirty days' option in gold, so general was the belief that, with the final restoration of peace, the premium on specie would become merely nominal. Now it is impossible to buy gold on sellers' option at any material concession from the current market rate. It is generally understood in the Gold Room that the Secretary of the Treasury is going to recommend to Congress the reduction of the legal-tender currency by at least one hundred millions during the ensuing year, but the understanding does not tempt even the most inveterate bear to sell gold for the fall.

FISK & HATCH,

BANKERS,

AND DEALERS IN

GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,

AND

AGENTS FOR THE SALE OF

THE 7.30 POPULAR LOAN

5 NASSAU STREET,

(Continental Bank Building, near Wall Street).

DEPOSITS RECEIVED, COLLECTIONS MADE.

ALL KINDS OF UNITED STATES

AND OTHER POPULAR

FIRST CLASS SECURITIES

BOUGHT AND SOLD AT MARKET RATES.

E. W. CLARK & CO.,

BANKERS AND BROKERS,

35 SOUTH THIRD STREET, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS AND TREASURY NOTES, CERTIFICATES

OF INDEBTEDNESS, QUARTERMASTERS' VOUCHERS,

COMPOUND INTEREST NOTES.

STOCKS and BONDS of all kinds BOUGHT and SOLD on COMMISSION.

WHAT WISE MEN SAY OF
LIFE INSURANCE.

In my opinion, and judging from my own experience, annuities secured for a family are of important service to relieve the mind of the father of a helpless family from a corroding anxiety on their account. It has been for many years a comfort to me that my family will have the benefit of annuities at my decease; and though, on account of my protracted life, the fund will be a great gainer by me, yet I do not regret that, as the gain belongs to a benevolent institution.—Rev. Dr. Archibald Alexander.

Life Assurance may be employed advantageously for the benefit of families and of individuals of all classes of society, as well for those in affluence as for those in moderate circumstances. All may, by the exertion of a little forethought and a small outlay, protect their families from want, independently of any charitable aid.—Rt. Rev. Bishop Potter, of Pa.

The relief from anxiety afforded by Life Assurance very frequently contributes to prolong the life of the assured, while it materially augments the comfort and well-being of those dependent on him. It has also an obvious tendency to strengthen habits of accumulation.—M' Culloch's Commercial Dictionary.

A policy of Life Assurance is the cheapest and safest mode of making a certain provision for one's family. It is time our people understood and practiced more generally Life Assurance. Many a widow and orphan has had great reason to be grateful that the advantage of Life Assurance was understood and embraced by the husband and father.—Dr. Franklin, in 1769.

It is unquestionably the duty of every man to provide, while he yet lives, for his own. We would say that it is not less his duty to provide, as far as he can, against their being left penniless in the event of his death. Indeed, between these two duties there is no general distinction; for Life Assurance makes the one as much a matter of current expenditure as the other.—Chambers's Edinburgh Journal.

THE UNION MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

Has paid more than

ONE MILLION OF DOLLARS

To Widows and Orphans.

NEW YORK OFFICE, 151 BROADWAY.

J. W. & H. JUDD, GENERAL AGENTS.

HOME
INSURANCE COMPANY
OF NEW YORK,

OFFICE, 135 BROADWAY.

Cash Capital, - - - - - - -	$2,000,000 00
Assets, 1st Jan., 1865, - - - - -	3,765,503 42
Liabilities, - - - - - - - -	77,901 52

FIRE, MARINE, and INLAND

INSURANCE.

Agencies at all important points throughout the United States.

CHAS. J. MARTIN, PRESIDENT.

A. F. WILMARTH, VICE-PRESIDENT.

JOHN McGEE, Secretary.

J. H. WASHBURN, Assistant Secretary.

W. C. NICOLL, Superintendent Marine Department.

Marine and Fire Insurance.

METROPOLITAN INSURANCE COMPANY,

108 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Cash Capital, - - - - - - - - - - -	$1,000,000
Surplus, over - - - - - - - - - - -	400,000

This Company ensures at customary rates of premium against ALL MARINE AND INLAND NAVIGATION RISKS on CARGO or FREIGHT; also, against LOSS or DAMAGE by FIRE.

IF PREMIUMS ARE PAID IN GOLD, LOSSES WILL BE PAID IN GOLD.

The Assured receive 75 per cent. of the net profits without incurring any liability, or in lieu thereof, at their option, a liberal discount upon the premium.

All losses equitably adjusted and promptly paid.

SCRIP DIVIDEND, declared Jan. 10, 1865, FIFTY per cent.

JAMES LORIMER GRAHAM, President.
ROBERT M. C. GRAHAM, Vice-President.
JAMES LORIMER GRAHAM, JR., 2d Vice-President.
HENRY H. PORTER, Secretary.

COAL $8 50 PER TON.
GLOBE MUTUAL COAL COMPANY.

COAL AT ACTUAL COST TO SHAREHOLDERS,

Which is now being delivered at their residences from the yard of the Company, West Thirty-seventh Street.

Shares, $10.

Which entitles the party to ONE TON of Coal per year, at the actual cost, for every share subscribed.

See Prospectus of the Company.

OFFICES:

GLOBE BUILDINGS, 64 BROADWAY AND 19 NEW ST., NEAR WALL.

LET THE PEOPLE SAY WITH ONE VOICE, DOWN WITH THE PRICE OF COAL!

The following are among the many Stockholders who have received and are now using the coal supplied by the above Company at $8 50 per ton.

N. MENDLESON, 76 Nassau street, New York: HENRY KLINKER, 8 Pearl street, New York; J. F. SHULTHIES, 40 Stanton street, New York; E. GRAEF, 37 and 39 Bowery, New York; Mrs. C. WETHERBEE, 134 East Fourteenth street, New York; G. F. WYGANT, 495 Third Avenue, New York; D. BRINCKMAN, 81 Broad street, New York; D. A. WOODWORTH, 9 Beekman street, New York; HY. SIMMONS, 2 Front street, New York; HORATIO HOWARTH, 166 Washington street, New York; JOHN RENEFER, 44 Greenwich street, New York; W. J. F. PRELLE, 467 Greenwich street, New York; BRADLEY & REEVES, 10 State street, New York; CHR. ROES, 244 Cherry street, New York; JAMES COSTELLO, 510½ Pearl street, New York; MITCHELL BROS., 17 and 19 Fulton Market, New York; D. COMBS, 16 and 18 Fulton Market, New York; M. A. SCHROEDER, 79 Montgomery street, New York; WM. AUGUSTIN, 68 Greenwich street, New York; F. WOHLERS, 43 Whitehall street, New York; HENRY HEINS, corner 22d street and 11th avenue, New York; R. H. LOSHE, Columbia street, Brooklyn; T. B. SIDEBOTHAM, 433 Myrtle avenue, Brooklyn; JOS. SLOPER, 133 Marshall street, Brooklyn; M. MORROW, 273 Fulton street, Brooklyn; H. B. L. HERR, 546 Columbia street, Brooklyn; L. E. L. BRIGGS, 25 Hicks street, Brooklyn; J. W. BRODIE, 66 Sands street, Brooklyn.

Where I Can Ensure,

WHAT I CAN ENSURE AGAINST,

AND

WHAT IT WILL COST ME.

I CAN ENSURE IN THE

NATIONAL LIFE AND TRAVELLERS' INSURANCE CO.,

243 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

OPPOSITE CITY HALL PARK,

Authorized Capital, - - - Half a Million,

AGAINST EVERY DESCRIPTION OF ACCIDENTS that can happen to me on Sea or Land.

I can ensure my life on the purely Mutual Plan, either by an Endowment, or a Life Policy, or a Ten-year Non-forfeiture Policy.

$25 secures a General Accident Policy for $5,000, with a Weekly Compensation of $25.

$10 secures a Marine Policy for $10,000 for a voyage to any European port, covering loss of life at sea from accident.

$167 35 per annum secures an Endowment Policy for $5,000, with profits payable at the age of 50, or at death to a person 25 years of age.

$96 90 per annum secures a Life Policy for $5,000, with profits, to a person 25 years of age. A Loan of one-third of the Premium, or Life, or Endowment Policy will be given, if required, without note.

POLICIES ISSUED AT ONCE.

NO MEDICAL EXAMINATION REQUIRED for General Accident Policies.

HOFFMAN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.
Office, 161 Broadway, New York.

Cash Capital, - - - - - - - - - - - $200,000

WILLIAM B. DIXON, President.

JOSEPH W WILDEY, Secretary.

THE

MORRIS FIRE AND INLAND INSURANCE COMPANY

COLUMBIAN BUILDING, 1 NASSAU STREET.

JUNE 1, 1865.

AUTHORIZED CAPITAL, $5,000,000.

CASH CAPITAL, PAID IN, AND SURPLUS, $885,040 57.

POLICIES OF INSURANCE AGAINST LOSS OR DAMAGE BY FIRE

Issued on the most Favorable Terms.

B. C. MORRIS, President.

WM. M. WHITNEY, Secretary.

FIRST CLASS FIRE INSURANCE
ON THE PARTICIPATION PLAN.

MARKET FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY,
37 WALL STREET, CORNER OF JAUNCEY COURT.

CONDITION OF THE COMPANY.
ABSTRACT OF THE ANNUAL REPORT OF DEC. 31, 1864.

TOTAL ASSETS		$414,729 18
Viz.—Bonds and Mortgages	$134,672 00
Temporary Loans	92,630 00
Real Estate	10,000 00
100 Shares Mer. Ex. Bank	5,000 00
Government Sec., value	144,514 00
Cash on hand	18,042 34
Interest due	3,085 58
Premiums due	6,785 26
PRESENT LIABILITIES		$15,995 92
NET SURPLUS		198,733 26

This Company will continue, as heretofore, to insure respectable parties against DISASTER BY FIRE
At fair and remunerating rates; extending, according to the terms on its Policies, the advantage of the
PARTICIPATION PLAN OF THE COMPANY,
pursued by it for several years past, with such great success and popularity, and profit to its customers: whereby
(75) SEVENTY-FIVE PER CENT. (75)
of the Profits, instead of being withdrawn from the Company in Dividends to Stockholders, is invested as a "SCRIP FUND," and held for greater protection of its Policyholders; and Scrip, bearing interest, is issued to Customers therefor: thus, IN THIS COMPANY, those who furnish the business, AND PAY THE PREMIUMS, derive the largest share of advantages; and when the accumulations of the SCRIP FUND shall exceed FIVE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS,
the excess will be applied to PAY OFF the Scrip IN CASH in the order of its issue.
☞ The liberal and prompt adjustment of Claims for Loss, WHEN FAIR AND SQUARE, is a specialty with this Company.
NOTE.—This Company does not insure on the hazards of RIVER, LAKE, or INLAND NAVIGATION; confining itself strictly to a legitimate FIRE INSURANCE BUSINESS.
ASHER TAYLOR, President.
H. P. FREEMAN, Secretary.

BAIRD & BRADLEY,
CHICAGO
LOAN AND COLLECTION AGENCY.

Investments for a term of years made for Eastern Capitalists. Corporations and Estates amply secured by First Mortgage on Real Estate in Chicago and vicinity, with semi-annual interest payable at any point East.

Real Estate purchased, managed, and sold for Eastern parties.

Notes collected and avails promptly remitted.

Insurance Scrip.

WILLIAM C. GILMAN,
46 PINE STREET, NEW YORK,
BUYS AND SELLS INSURANCE SCRIP.

FOURTH NATIONAL BANK,
27 & 29 PINE ST., NEW YORK,

Has for sale U. S. 7 3-10 Notes, all sizes; also, One Year Certificates and all other Government Loans.
P. C. CALHOUN, President.
B. SEAMAN, Cashier.
ANTHONY LANE, Asst. Cashier.

NIAGARA FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY,
OFFICE, 12 WALL STREET.

CASH CAPITAL INCREASED TO	$1,000,000
SURPLUS, JAN. 1, 1865,	275,253

Losses equitably adjusted and promptly paid.
CHARTERED 1850.
Cash Dividends paid in fourteen years, 248 per cent.
P. NOTMAN, Secretary. JONATHAN D. STEELE, President.

PHENIX INSURANCE COMPANY,
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
OFFICES, 1 COURT STREET, BROOKLYN, N. Y.
" 139 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

CASH CAPITAL	$1,000,000 00
ASSETS	1,500,000 00

Insurance against Loss by Fire, Marine, Lake, Canal, and Inland Transportation.

STEPHEN CROWELL, President. EDGAR W. CROWELL, Vice-President.
PHILANDER SHAW, Secretary.

BROWN, BROTHERS & CO.,
56 WALL STREET,
Issue, in New York, Circular Credits for Travellers, available in any part of the world.

The Nation:

A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

THIS journal will not be the organ of any party, sect, of body. It will, on the contrary, make an earnest effort to bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit, and to wage war upon the vices of violence, exaggeration and misrepresentation by which so much of the political writing of the day is marred.

The criticism of books and works of art will form one of its most prominent features; and pains will be taken to have this task performed in every case by writers possessing special qualifications for it.

A special correspondent, who has been selected for his work with care, is pursuing a journey through the South. His letters appear every week, and he is charged with the duty of simply reporting what he sees and hears, leaving the public as far as possible to draw its own inferences.

TERMS:—Six Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Four Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, PUBLISHER,
130 Nassau street, N. Y.

ONE PRICE ONLY.

Writing Paper cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Envelopes cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Blank Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Memorandum Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street
Pens and Pencils cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Pocket-Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Portfolios cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Cash Boxes cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Stationers' Tinware cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Account Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Black, Blue, and Red Ink cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau St.
Arnold & Boss's Fluid cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau St.
Scrap Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.

EDWARDS'S WHITE SUGAR-CURED
WASHINGTON HAMS
are now ready for sale.
Name branded in full.
ALSO ALL KINDS OF SMOKED MEATS.
GEORGE W. EDWARDS,
227 and 229 Christie Street, N. Y.

WILLIAM SELLERS & CO.,
1,600 HAMILTON STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
MACHINISTS', FOUNDERS', SMITHS' and BOILER-MAKERS' TOOLS.
SHAFTING, with Ball and Socket Bearings and Double Cone Vice-Couplings, admitting of the easiest possible adjustment.
A complete assortment of PULLEY and WHEEL PATTERNS, from which Castings or finished work will be furnished.
RAILWAY EQUIPMENTS, TURNING and TRANSFER TABLES, and PIVOT BRIDGES.
Sole Manufacturers and Licensees of
GIFFARD'S INJECTOR,
For Feeding Boilers.
WILLIAM SELLERS. JOHN SELLERS, JR.

BOYNTON'S FURNACES.
Boynton's Brick and Portable Furnaces, Fire-place and Parlor Heaters, Kitcheners, Ranges, Parlor and Office Stoves, are warranted to give satisfaction. Send for circular.
RICHARDSON, BOYNTON & CO.,
234 Water Street, near Beekman, New York.

Economical Housekeepers Use
PYLE'S SALERATUS. PYLE'S O. K. SOAP.
PYLE'S CREAM TARTAR. PYLE'S BLUEING POWDER.
Articles designed for all who want the best goods, full weight. Sold by best Grocers everywhere. Each package bears the name of JAMES PYLE, Manufacturer, New York.

MAKE YOUR OWN SOAP WITH
B. T. BABBITT'S
Pure Concentrated Potash,
OR READY SOAP-MAKER.
Warranted double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other saponifier or lye in the market. Put up in cans of one pound, two pounds, three pounds, six pounds, and twelve pounds, with full directions in English and German for making Hard and Soft Soap. One pound will make fifteen gallons of Soft Soap. No lime is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest Potash in market.
B. T. BABBITT,
64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington st., N. Y.

AMERICAN WATCHES.
J. H. JOHNSTON & CO., 150 BOWERY, N. Y., sell at lowest rates
American Gold and Silver Watches,
English Lever Watches,
Fine Swiss Watches.
The handsomest Detached Lever Watch in the market for $25.
PURE GOLD WEDDING RINGS.
Fine Jewelry, diamonds, silver ware, and best quality silver-plated ware of our own manufacture.
Articles sent free of expense to all parts of the country, and satisfaction guaranteed.

WILLIAM KNABE & CO.'S

Celebrated Gold Medal

GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT

PIANOS.

These instruments have been for thirty years before the public, in competition with other instruments of first-class makers. They have, throughout that long period, maintained their reputation among the profession and the public as being unsurpassed in every quality found in a first-class Piano.

650 BROADWAY,

AND

CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE, CHICAGO, ILL

J. BAUER & CO., Agents.

SPECIAL GOLD MEDAL.

(From Watson's Weekly Art Journal.)

AWARDS TO MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—A Gold Medal was awarded, at the late Fair of the American Institute, to CARHART, NEEDHAM & CO., for the best Reed Instrument on exhibition—a most just testimonial.

"They are an exceedingly good substitute for an Organ, and I can speak of them in the highest terms."
GEO. W. MORGAN.

"I have found them to be the finest Instruments of the class I ever saw." GEO. F. BRISTOW.

"They are entitled to be ranked as the first and best among instruments of their class." WM. A. KING.

"The tone is incomparable, and they are far in advance of any other instrument of a similar kind."
CHARLES FRADEL.

THE PARLOR ORGAN,

with the recent improvements of Mr. J Carhart, is, without exception, far superior in QUALITY, POWER, SWEETNESS, VARIETY and EXPRESSION OF TONE. DURABILITY OF CONSTRUCTION, ELEGANCE OF CASE—POSSESSING IMPROVEMENTS APPLIED BY US ONLY.

A Descriptive Catalogue and Price List sent by mail.

CARHART, NEEDHAM & CO.,
97 East Twenty-third St., New York.

PIANOS.

RAVEN & BACON'S PIANO-FORTES.

(ESTABLISHED 1829.)

A full assortment of these Instruments, which have been well known in the New York market for more than thirty years, constantly on hand. We are continually adding improvements to our Pianos, and our facilities enable us to furnish them at terms and prices satisfactory to purchasers. Pictorial circulars sent by mail.

Wareroom, 135 Grand St., near Broadway, New York.

The Horace Waters

Grand, Square, and Upright PIANOS, MELODEONS, HARMONIUMS, and CABINET ORGANS. Wholesale and retail, at reduced prices. To let, and rent allowed if purchased. Monthly payments received for the same. Second-hand Pianos at bargains, prices $60, $75, $100, $125, $150, $175, $200, and $225. Factory and Warerooms, 481 Broadway. Cash paid for second-hand Pianos.

GROVER & BAKER'S
SEWING MACHINES

WERE AWARDED THE HIGHEST PREMIUMS
At the State Fairs of

New York,	Illinois,	Virginia,
New Jersey,	Michigan,	N. Carolina,
Vermont,	Wisconsin,	Tennessee,
Pennsylvania,	Iowa,	Alabama,
Ohio,	Kentucky,	Oregon,
Indiana,	Missouri,	California,

And at numerous Institute and County Fairs, including all the Fairs at which they were exhibited the past three years.

The GROVER & BAKER ELASTIC-STITCH SEWING MACHINE is superior to all others, for the following reasons:

1. The seam is stronger and more elastic than any other.
2. It is more easily managed, and is capable of doing a greater variety and range of work than any other.
3. It is capable of doing all the varieties of sewing done by other machines, and, in addition, executes beautiful embroidery and ornamental work.

GROVER & BAKER S. M. CO.,
495 Broadway, New York.

ESTABLISHED IN 1823.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT PIANOS.

At the Great Mechanics' Fair, held in Boston in October, 1865, Messrs. CHICKERING & SONS were awarded

THE FIRST GOLD MEDAL

For the BEST GRAND PIANOS.

The FIRST SILVER MEDAL
For the BEST SQUARE PIANOS.

The FIRST SILVER MEDAL
For the BEST UPRIGHT PIANOS.

This Fair called forth an UNUSUAL COMPETITION—35 Pianos being represented. The report of the judges is very thorough and very decided on the merits of the CHICKERING PIANO.

THE MICHIGAN STATE FAIR, of 1865, awards Chickering & Sons THREE FIRST PRIZES.

THE INDIANA STATE FAIR, of 1865, awards Chickering & Sons THREE FIRST PRIZES.

THE IOWA STATE FAIR, of 1865, awards Chickering & Sons TWO FIRST PRIZES.

THE WISCONSIN STATE FAIR, of 1865, awards Chickering & Sons TWO FIRST PRIZES.

FOURTEEN FIRST-CLASS GOLD AND SILVER MEDALS IN THE MONTHS OF SEPTEMBER AND OCTOBER, 1865.

Making a total of FIFTY-FIVE PRIZE MEDALS awarded to CHICKERING & SONS, as

FIRST PREMIUMS OVER ALL COMPETITION for the SUPERIORITY OF THEIR PIANOS.

OPINIONS OF EMINENT ARTISTS.

THALBERG.

"I consider Chickering & Sons' Pianos, beyond comparison, the best I have ever seen in America."

GOTTSCHALK.

"I consider Chickering & Sons' Pianos superior to any in the world."

WEHLI.

"I believe that, in every particular, your Pianos are superior to any I have ever seen in this country or in Europe."

SATTER.

"For volume and fine quality of tone, with nicety of articulation, the Chickering Pianos are unequalled."

BASSINI.

"I always use and always recommend your Pianos to my pupils and friends."

MUZIO.

"I consider your Pianos the finest I have ever played upon."

Watson's Art Journal, of November 11, in its criticism of Mme. Abel's concert, says: "Madame Abel performed on the new Chickering Grand, which took the Gold Medal at the Fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanics' Association, held at Boston last month.

"IT IS THE NOBLEST INSTRUMENT WE EVER HEARD IN A CONCERT-ROOM.

"Grand in power, without noise; capable of sustaining any amount of forcing, without losing the rich purity of its tones; clear, bright, and beautiful throughout the entire range, every tone is a pearl of sound, sympathetic and vocal as the finest human voice cultivated to the highest point of perfection."

AGRAFFE BRIDGE.

Pianos with or without the Agraffe Bridge, which we have constantly used for the past twelve years.

WAREROOMS.

652 BROADWAY, N. Y.
246 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.
914 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

Clothing for Fall and Winter.

OVERCOATS
OF
MOSCOW, CHINCHILLE, ESKIMO, and CASTOR BEAVERS.

BUSINESS AND WALKING SUITS FOR MEN.

DRESS AND SCHOOL SUITS FOR BOYS,
VERY SUPERIOR IN EVERY RESPECT,
and
LOW IN PRICE.

DEVLIN & CO.,
BROADWAY, COR. GRAND STREET,
BROADWAY, COR. WARREN STREET, N. Y.

THE BEST SEWING-MACHINES IN THE WORLD.

THE WEED MACHINES,

With all their valuable improvements, entirely overcome all imperfections. They are superior to all others for family and manufacturing purposes, simple in construction, durable in all their parts, and readily understood. They have certainty of stitch on all kinds of fabrics, and are adapted to a wide range of work without change or adjustment, using all kinds of thread. Will hem, fell, bind, gather, braid, tuck, quilt, cord, and, in fact, do all kinds of work required by families or manufacturers. We invite all persons in search of an instrument to execute any kind of sewing now done by machinery to inspect them, and recommend all parties engaging in the sale of sewing-machines to make sure they secure the best by examining the WEED before purchasing. They make the shuttle-stitch, which cannot be excelled for firmness, elasticity, durability, and elegance of finish. They have received the highest premiums in every instance where they have been exhibited in competition with other standard machines. The company being duly licensed, the machines are protected against infringements or litigation.

Reliable agents wanted, to whom we offer great inducements. Every explanation will be cheerfully given to all, whether they wish to purchase or not. Descriptive circulars, together with specimens of their work, will be furnished to all who desire them by mail or otherwise.

WEED SEWING-MACHINE CO.,
STORE, 506 BROADWAY, N. Y.

FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE CO.,

505 BROADWAY, N. Y.

THE BEST FAMILY MACHINE IN THE WORLD.

Wonderful REVERSIBLE FEED MOTION. SELF-ADJUSTING Tension. No Snarling and Breaking Threads. FOUR distinct Stitches.

WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES,

625 BROADWAY, N. Y.,
MAKE THE
LOCK-STITCH,

and rank highest on account of the elasticity, permanence, beauty, and general desirableness of the stitching, when done, and the wide range of its application.—Report of American Institute.

FINKLE & LYON'S

IMPROVED

LOCK-STITCH SEWING-MACHINE.

N. B.—Money refunded if the Machine is not preferred to any in market for family use.
AGENTS WANTED. 538 Broadway, N. Y.

Lock-Stitch Sewing Machines

FOR FAMILIES AND MANUFACTURERS.

THE HOWE MACHINE COMPANY,

ELIAS HOWE, Jr., Pres.,

629 BROADWAY.

Agents wanted.

SCHOOL FURNITURE!

Lecture-Room and Sabbath-School Settees
IN EVERY STYLE,
MANUFACTURED BY

ROBERT PATON,
24 GROVE STREET, NEW YORK.

Great Central Route
TO THE WEST AND NORTH-WEST.

MICHIGAN CENTRAL RAILROAD,

BETWEEN DETROIT AND CHICAGO, 284 MILES, is one of the connecting links in the direct and shortest line of rail communication between the Atlantic seaboard and the Mississippi and the North-west, and, with its connections, forming a through route unequalled for speed, safety, and comfort.

WESTERN CONNECTIONS.

At CHICAGO (at the GREAT CENTRAL DEPOT, with the advantages of transfer of passengers and baggage within the same building) with the ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD, to all Central and Southern Illinois, Cairo, and lower Mississippi River points.
With the CHICAGO, BURLINGTON & QUINCY RAILROAD, to Galesburg, Burlington, and Quincy, and thence by the Burlington and Missouri Road to Southern Iowa, Council Bluffs, and Omaha City; and with the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad to St. Joseph, Leavenworth, Lawrence, Kansas City, etc.
Also, convenient connection with the CHICAGO & NORTH-WESTERN, the CHICAGO & ROCK ISLAND, and the ST. LOUIS, ALTON & CHICAGO RAILROADS.

Luxurious Sleeping Cars accompany each Night Train.

RUTTAN'S PATENT VENTILATING AND ANTI-DUST ARRANGEMENT ON ALL DAY TRAINS.

OFFICERS:

J. W. BROOKS, President, Boston.
R. N. RICE, General Superintendent, Detroit.
C. H. HURD, Assistant Superintendent, Detroit.
H. E. SARGEANT, General Agent, Chicago.
THOS. FRAZER, General Ticket Agent, Detroit.
H. C. WENTWORTH, General Western Passenger Agent, Chicago.

☞ Freight Contracts, Bills of Lading, and information furnished at the offices of the Company in the following places:

NEW YORK—Office, 173 Broadway, C. E. Noble, Agent.
BOSTON—Office, 21 State Street, P. K. Randall, Agent.
BUFFALO—Office, Western, opposite Mansion House, J. D. Hayes, Agent.
ST. LOUIS—Office, 11 City Building, Commercial Street, James Smith, Agent.

JOHN V. FARWELL & CO.,

WHOLESALE

DRY GOODS AND NOTIONS,

42, 44 & 46 WABASH AVENUE,

CHICAGO,

AND NO. 5 COLLEGE PLACE, NEW YORK.

Improvements in Piano-fortes.

One of the simplest and most truly valuable improvements yet made in the Piano-forte is that invented and patented by

DECKER BROTHERS, 91 BLEECKER STREET,

in this city. By correcting the only imperfections arising from the use of the full iron-plate, and that, too, by not detracting in the slightest degree from its many positive advantages, the Messrs. DECKER have developed in their instruments a tone at once admirable for its purity, fulness, prolongation, and sweetness, and the high estimation in which their improvement is held is well shown in the rapidly increasing business of their firm.—Tribune.

FRANCIS & LOUTREL,

45 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK,

STATIONERS, STEAM PRINTERS,

AND

BLANK-BOOK MANUFACTURERS,

Supply everything in their line at lowest prices. Every kind of Writing Paper, Account Books, Fancy and Staple Stationery, Diaries for 1866, Expense Books, etc. Orders solicited.

PHELPS, DODGE & CO.,

Importers and Dealers in

TIN-PLATE, SHEET-IRON, COPPER, BLOCK-TIN,

WIRE, AND METALS GENERALLY;

Manufacturers of

COPPER, BRASS, and WIRE,

19 and 21 Cliff st., New York.

DEMULCENT SOAP,

FOR CHAPPED AND TENDER HANDS,

FOR TOILET AND BATH USE.

MANUFACTURED ONLY BY

J. C. HULL'S SON,

32 PARK ROW, N. Y.

Upwards of 100 styles of Toilet and Staple Soaps. For sale by all Dealers.

Pacific Mail Steamship Company's

THROUGH LINE

TO CALIFORNIA,

TOUCHING AT MEXICAN PORTS,

AND CARRYING THE U. S. MAIL,

Leave Pier No. 42 North River, foot of Canal Street, at 12 o'clock noon, on the 1st, 11th, and 21st of every month (except when those dates fall on Sunday, and then on the preceding SATURDAY), for ASPINWALL, connecting, via Panama Railroad, with one of the Company's steamships from Panama for SAN FRANCISCO, touching at ACAPULCO.

DECEMBER.

1st.—HENRY CHAUNCEY, Captain Gray, connecting with CONSTITUTION, Captain Farnsworth.

11th.—ATLANTIC, Captain Maury, connecting with GOLDEN CITY, Captain Bradbury.

21st.—NEW YORK, Captain Horner, connecting with COLORADO, Captain Watkins.

Departures of 1st and 21st connect at Panama with steamers for SOUTH PACIFIC PORTS. Those of 1st touch at MANZANILLO.

Through Passage Rates, in Currency.

	First Cabin,	Second Cabin,	Steerage,
On Steamers....	$325.	$225.	$100.

Panama Railroad ticket invariably $25 additional, in currency.

A discount of ONE-FIFTH from steamers' rates allowed to second-cabin and steerage passengers with families.

One Hundred Pounds Baggage allowed each adult. Baggage-masters accompany baggage through, and attend to ladies and children without male protectors. Baggage received on the dock the day before sailing, from steamboats, railroads, and passengers, who prefer to send down early.

An experienced Surgeon on Board. Medicines and attendance free.

A steamer will be placed on the line January 1, 1866, to run from NEW ORLEANS to ASPINWALL, via HAVANA.

For Passage tickets or further information apply at the Company's ticket office, on the wharf foot of Canal Street, North River.

F. W. G. BELLOWS, AGENT.

KEYS'

AMERICAN UNION WRITING FLUID,

AND COPYING INKS.

THE CHEAPEST AND THE BEST.

Always clean, and flowing freely from the pen, these inks are rapidly taking the place of all others, and merit the special attention of the penman.
On trial they will be found superior in every respect to the imported inks now in use.

REEVES & CO.,

(Successors to J. G. Keys,)
MANUFACTURERS AND SOLE PROPRIETORS,
303 Washington Street (near Reade), N. Y.

MARVIN'S

PATENT FIRE AND BURGLAR SAFE.

Superior to any others in the following particulars
They are more fire-proof.
They are more burglar-proof.
They are perfectly dry.
They do not lose their fire-proof qualities by age.
Manufactured only by

MARVIN & CO., 265 Broadway.
721 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.
Send for a descriptive Circular.

COOKING AND HEATING BY GAS.

EAGLE GAS COOKING STOVES AND RANGES,

GUARANTEED TO BAKE PERFECTLY.

HEATING STOVES, GUARANTEED TO HEAT ROOMS PERFECTLY.

Also,

KEROSENE OIL COOKING STOVES,

The best in market, have regular SIDE OVENS, and guaranteed to BAKE PERFECTLY, and not to Smoke or Smell.

EAGLE GAS STOVE MFG. CO.,
474 Broadway, N. Y.

☞ Illustrated Catalogues sent free.

DECKER & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS OF PIANO-FORTES,

419 BROOME STREET,

One Block East of Broadway, N. Y.

These Pianos stand unrivalled in regard to their singing quality; volume and purity of tone; sympathetic elastic, and even touch; and durability of construction, which enables them to remain in tune much longer than ordinary Pianos.

JESSUP & MOORE,

27 NORTH SIXTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
128 WILLIAM STREET, NEW YORK,

PAPER MANUFACTURERS,

Have on hand, or make to order at short notice, all qualities of Book and News Printing Papers at current market prices.

UNITED STATES STEEL PEN WORKS,

FACTORY, CAMDEN, N. J.

R. ESTERBROOK & CO.,

STEEL PEN MANUFACTURERS,

WAREHOUSES, { 403 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia. / 42 JOHN STREET, New York.

Samples and prices on application. Lots made to order of any pattern or stamp required.

CAUTION.

These Pens are of genuine American manufacture, and equal in finish, elasticity, and fineness of point to the best imported. They are, therefore, sure to gain the confidence of the American public. The fac-simile of our signature is sufficient security against foreign imitation.

R. ESTERBROOK & CO.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

OF THE OLD STANDARD QUALITY.

TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Warranted.

or Descriptive Name, and Designating Number.
New Series, Good and Cheap, from No. 700 to No. 761.

TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Birmingham. With Designating Numbers.

For sale by

JOSEPH GILLOTT & SONS,
91 John Street, New York.
HENRY OWEN, Sole Agent.

THE BEST PIANO-FORTE.

ONE THAT WILL LAST A LIFETIME.

Seven First Premiums in four weeks; two Gold and one Silver Medals; six State Fairs and the American Institute have decided that WM. B. BRADBURY'S New Scale Piano-Fortes are "THE BEST." They "Excel all others in the Essentials of a Perfect Piano-Forte," viz., in Touch, Tone, Power, and thorough Workmanship.

"They are the best square piano-fortes I have ever played upon."—HARRY SANDERSON.
"They are very superior instruments."—GOTTSCHALK.
"Their superior excellence fully proven."—W. BERGE.
"I admire them in the highest degree."—G. W. MORGAN.

Call or send for a Circular, with Illustrations and Testimonials of the most eminent artists and amateurs.

WM. B. BRADBURY,
425 AND 427 BROOME STREET, NEW YORK.

The Nation.

VOL. I.—NO. 24. THURSDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1865. { Six Dollars per Annum / Single Copies, 15 Cents

CONTENTS.

THE WEEK..... 737
MINOR TOPICS..... 740
Our Last Batch of State Papers..... 742
The Episcopal Church and the Freedmen..... 742
Exultant: Poetry..... 744
CORRESPONDENCE:
The Negro Dialect..... 744
The South as It Is..... 746
"Personal Items"..... 747
Paper and Printing..... 749
The Etiquette of Smoking..... 749
LITERATURE:
Literary Notes..... 750
Eugénie de Guérin..... 752
The Rev. Frederick W. Robertson... 753
Illustrated Holiday Books..... 754
Leigh Hunt's Seer..... 756
Literature for Children..... 757
FINE ARTS:
Music.—"L'Africaine"..... 758
FINANCIAL REVIEW..... 763

Six Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Four Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, PUBLISHER, 130 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

The Week.

CONGRESS is going vigorously to work. Mr. Sumner has introduced a batch of bills and resolutions intended to make the Constitutional Amendment a reality, and protect the rights of the colored population de facto as well as de jure. It is generally conceded that the Southern members have as yet no chance of admission to either Senate or House—a result which Governors Perry, Humphreys, and others must find, after all their confidence, the reverse of amusing.

ALL the reports of the departments except that of the Treasury have, necessarily, only a retrospective interest. But Mr. McCulloch's is all-important as regards the future, and is, perhaps, the ablest state paper that has issued from that quarter for many a year. He strongly urges the contraction of the currency as indispensable; does not believe in the reality of much of our apparent prosperity; and, although he announces a probable deficiency of $112,194,947 in the fiscal year ending June, 1866, he anticipates a surplus of about the same amount in the fiscal year ending June, 1867. At this rate, supposing no fresh political convulsions or foreign war to take place, the debt would be paid off in twenty-eight or thirty years. The probabilities are it may be done much sooner. Mr. McCulloch's calculations as to the future tax-paying power of the country are curious and interesting. They show that, supposing its wealth to increase in the future in the same ratio as in the past, the appropriation of about $200,000,000 a year to a sinking fund would begin at less than five per cent. of the revenue of the country, and end in 1900 at seven-tenths of one per cent. The Government charges in England began fifty years ago at 17 per cent. of the resources of the country; they are now only eleven per cent.; and yet her debt is one-third greater than ours, her expenses double, and her production of wealth not nearly so rapid.

GENERAL GRANT'S report makes sad havoc of General Butler's military reputation. There is positive cruelty in printing in full Butler's vainglorious report of the great things he had done, and of the greater things he was going to do at Bermuda Hundreds, and then following it with the cool announcement that, after this, Beauregard "corked him up as in a bottle." It appears, too, that General Butler went of his own accord to Fort Fisher, that he relied much on the powder boat, and that in coming back he disobeyed his orders. It is true the Congressional Committee whitewashed General Butler, but when Grant says one thing on a subject of this kind and a committee of Congress says another, we know which of the two the country will believe. The fact is, that Butler ought never have been made a general in active service, any more than Banks, and that many a valuable life would have been saved if neither of them had ever made his appearance on the field of glory.

THE New York mayoralty election passed over quietly on Tuesday, resulting in the choice of Recorder Hoffman, to whom nobody seems to have any stronger objection than that he is a Democrat. A charge of having paid his office-boy out of the city funds was strongly urged against him, and supported by an affidavit from that youth and his father, but apparently made no impression on the public mind. Mr. Hecker's old pro-slavery paper, the Churchman, combined with his farina and copperheadism, seem to have seriously damaged him. Marshall O. Roberts pressed Mr. Hoffman very closely, and poor Mayor Gunther, who ran on his own account, came in "nowhere," in spite of his own confidence. There is no doubt either of the honesty or ability of the Mayor elect, and the new Corporation Counsel, though afflicted with the usual weakness of patriotic Irishmen on the subject of the negro, is as upright a man as could be found for the place. But what difference will it make? Both are powerless before the Aldermen and Common Councilmen. The steady improvement visible in all officers elected by the whole city suggests strongly the abolition of electoral districts as the best means of bringing the best men to the front.

THANKSGIVING DAY was a dismal day in this city, as far as the weather was concerned, and the newspapers made the morrow dismal by reporting the sermons. Hardly one of them is ever reported in full, and the reporters are probably as unfit to condense as men can be. They generally pick out and retain the least valuable, because most sounding and pretentious, portion of the discourse, and cloud the remainder by misapprehension of the meaning. It is high time the practice of reporting them at all was given up.

MAYOR GUNTHER wrote a characteristic letter during the war, strongly discouraging European emigration to this country, which, owing to his official position, was said to have been used with some effect by our enemies abroad. Emigrants, however, continued to arrive in unprecedented numbers, but the American Emigrant Company has thought it necessary to ask him to recant. This he has done. He says his objections to European immigration are now removed, and, to use his own language, "he now says, Come." We may therefore prepare for a fearful rush to our shores as soon as it becomes thoroughly known abroad that Mr. Gunther has no further objections.

THERE is trouble amongst the Fenians. The "Senate" pronounces the late issue of sixty-eight thousand dollars' worth of bonds to be unauthorized and fraudulent, owing to the failure of the President to appoint an "agent of the Republic." It has, moreover, impeached and deposed him, and makes, in doing so, some curious disclosures as to "what comes of the money." At present it seems likely that a large portion of it will go to line the pockets of a parcel of greedy adventurers. The worst of all this is that the ridicule brought on "Irish grievances" in the eyes of the civilized world, by the performance of these worthies, paralyzes the exertions which are being made by honest and high-minded men in Ireland, such as Dr. Hancock and Judge Long, to procure a redressal by practical means of the wrongs which alone make English domination odious.

WE have received a printed copy of resolutions passed unanimously by the vestry of the Church of the Nativity, Philadelphia, on the 14th of last month, condemning the action of the recent General Episcopal Convention upon Mr. Binney's resolution. They remove explicitly the defence set up not long since by a distinguished correspondent, whose argument, admitting its premises, we examine on another page. The protest of distinguished clergymen and laymen who voted with Mr. Binney had already shown that the question of the convention's consistency of action was an open one even within the pale of the Episcopal Church itself. Unhappily, the real concern—which was the animus of that body, and, so far as the convention was fairly representative, of the Church—was not suffered to be debated. The spirit which prevailed was unfavorable, not to say hostile, to the great reformation which the war has wrought.

ANOTHER long list of the Confederate bondholders in England has appeared. Doubtless, most of those whose names appear on it were really creditors of the Confederacy, but the list is, nevertheless, plainly untrustworthy. It contains the names of such men as W. E. Baxter, the member for Bradford, and J. Caird, both of whom were warm friends of the North throughout the war. These are certainly used without the knowledge of the owners, and if so used, cannot have been found in any real books of accounts. The same thing may, doubtless, be said of many others, that of Mr. Gladstone for example. The agent of the Associated Press does not say where the books were found from which the list is taken; not certainly in Richmond, for it is in the office of the agent in England they would have been used; and we are driven to fear that some hungry rebel is perpetrating "sells" on some of our foreign ministers in order to raise the wind. The matter is of no great moment, except in so far as it affects the credit of the press here for accuracy. It is worthy of notice that "the address" of very large numbers of the bondholders is given as "London" simply, which is about as valuable and as business-like as "Europe" would be.

COUNT DE GASPARIN has addressed a very long letter to the President, instructing him in his duties during the present crisis. M. de Gasparin's opinions on American questions in the earlier part of the war were of considerable value, because they were expressions of sympathy at a period when we needed a great deal and got very little. But at present we doubt very much whether he can afford any aid in the solution of the problems now before the country. What he says, in the letter before us, has hardly sufficient novelty, or, in all cases, sufficient pertinence, to give it the weight to which the character and name of the author would otherwise entitle it, though excellent in itself and doing great credit to his heart.

SECRETARY WELLES says in his report that, so far from being unhealthy, as was feared, there was less sickness on board of the monitors than on the same number of wooden ships with an equal complement of men similarly exposed. The fact is, however, that the crews were regularly changed at frequent intervals, to avoid sickness; so that the statistics prove very little.

MISSISSIPPI wants to accept one-half the Constitutional Amendment and reject the other; that is, she is quite willing that the Constitution shall prohibit slavery, provided Congress shall not have power to enforce the prohibition "by appropriate legislation." From the very nature of our Government, the second section is superfluous, since Congress and Congress alone can give efficiency to the Constitution. But this very action on the part of Mississippi shows how important it is to leave no room for differences of construction, and to express in unmistakable terms the authority of the National Legislature to guard against the defeat of the national will in the matter of universal and absolute freedom throughout the country.

THE Kentucky prosecutors of Maj.-Gen. Palmer must appreciate the proverb about those who go a-shearing and come back shorn. Their indictment against him for aiding a slave to escape has been dismissed from the Jefferson Circuit Court by Judge Johnson, on the ground that the requisite number of States had previously adopted the Constitutional Amendment, "and, therefore, that all criminal and penal acts of the State Legislature relative to slavery were null and of no effect." The judge evidently holds the common-sense view that the loyal States are as abundantly competent to stand for the nation now as when forced to do so by the breaking out of the rebellion. Three-fourths of them have ratified the Amendment, but the Secretary of State still hesitates to announce that the Constitution has a thirteenth article. So far as Kentucky is concerned, however, Gen. Palmer has proclaimed the non-existence of slavery there, and advised the colored people to apply for redress to the courts if molested.

THE lady clerks at Washington are again making a desperate effort to secure an increase in their now miserable salaries. Why the Government should keep anybody in its service on starvation wages it is hard to say. If a woman takes the place of a man in a public office, why not pay her a man's salary? That they can be got for less is no argument at all; for plenty of men could be got for far less than any clerks in the Government offices are now paid.

GOVERNOR ORR'S inaugural address to the Legislature of South Carolina contains some very frank admissions about the real object of the late rebellion, and equally frank concessions as to the decision of the "God of battles." It has also a humane word for the freedmen, giving them credit for the constancy with which they abstained from any rising during the war, and for the possession of qualities "that invite our respect." He advises that they be treated kindly and receive such moral and intellectual elevation as will render them better laborers, neighbors, and men.

THE author of the discovery that a national debt is a national blessing, has, on other grounds, at least, deserved well of his country, and is unquestionably a very able broker. But he can hardly esteem himself so highly as not to blush on seeing in print the exquisite bathos of his pastor, on occasion of a recent address in Philadelphia. This worthy divine was remarking, as so many have done before him, that Providence generally matches grand emergencies with actors and characters as grand. Of course he drew his illustration from the late crisis of his native land, and beginning to enumerate the great men whom it had evoked, he mentioned Grant and Sherman, and concluded: "and I may add, Jay Cooke!"

THERE has been a very sharp triangular correspondence on the Rio Grande between the French naval commander, M. Cloue, and General Mejia at Matamoras and General Weitzel at Brownsville. Cloue and Mejia both complain of the same thing—American interference in the hostilities going on at Matamoras—and both are very angry, but Cloue is evidently the angrier. General Weitzel returned one of his letters as disrespectful, and to the second one replied that one commander on one subject was as much as he could correspond with at a time.

GOVERNOR EYRE, of Jamaica, has published an exceedingly lame defence of the conduct of the troops during the late "insurrection." Of the gravity of the rising, some idea may be formed from the fact that not a single casualty has befallen one of the soldiers or sailors, "and they are all in good health." There is not a single word in fact to justify the wholesale hanging and flogging of men against whom there was not a particle of proof of any participation in the outrages; and public indignation in England is rising rapidly.

THE correspondent of the Indépendance Belge announces from Paris that a publisher of that city is about to begin the publication of "Shakespeare," with illustrations by Gustave Doré.

THE art of advertising has been greatly cultivated in this country, but we have yet to equal the Parisians. L'Audience newspaper, of Paris, gravely announces, as an inducement to subscribe, that none of its subscribers have died of the cholera!

M. Dupin, the senator of France who wrote the pamphlet on "The Reckless Extravagance of Women" in the present day, is recently dead. He left his whole fortune to the Princes of Orleans, and for announcing this fact the Paris Figaro has been warned by the Minister of the Interior, because as a comic paper it has no business to publish news.

The late M. Proudhon left notes for a "Life of Cæsar," in which he endeavors to prove that Gaul, at the time of the Roman invasion, was not a barbarous country, and that primitive France, although inferior to Rome in military organization, enjoyed a certain degree of civilization.

The Dutch are very indignant because of the arrest of certain swindlers, by the Prussian police, at the theatre in Rotterdam. According to the treaty between Prussia and Holland, the rendition of criminals must be made diplomatically; but it is intimated that the Prussians were so much encouraged by their success in snubbing the small German States, that they ventured to dispense with the legal formality. The Dutch (who seem, by the way, to have done nothing to hinder the Prussians) will demand explanations.

It is said that the Grand Duke of Baden is deranged. Judging from the despotic folly of the little German princes in alienating the affections of their subjects, at a moment when Prussia is seeking to undermine the independent governments of the confederation, it would appear that all of them are "laboring under a permanent suspension of the mental faculties."

The discussions of the constitutional amendments continue in the Swiss Federal Council. It is proposed, among other things, to forbid, by the organic law, all games of chance in Switzerland, and to declare absolute equality of religion and perfect liberty of conscience in all the cantons. The excitement incident to these debates has been increased by the fact of the recent whipping of a Protestant printer in the Catholic canton of Uri, on account of his religious opinions. A meeting has been held at Berne to express indignation against the authorities of Uri and sympathy with their victim, and it was resolved to ask the Society of Swiss Riflemen to refuse the citizens of Uri the privilege of taking part in the next federal shooting-match unless reparation should be made to the printer for the outrage inflicted.

King Victor Emanuel has gone to Naples, where the cholera is raging, and it is believed that his presence there will somehow have a good effect upon the public health. This is brave of Victor Emanuel, but does not seem particularly useful. Chloride of lime and an occasional ablution would be much better for the Neapolitans.

The Spanish Government continues its attention to the subject of the slave trade, while the journals discuss the question of abolishing slavery in the colonies. The Epoca, of Madrid, says that emancipation in the United States has imposed grave duties upon Spain; slavery must soon disappear everywhere, and Spaniards must consider how far machinery can be substituted for the labor of slaves, and what other means there are for supplying the anticipated deficiency of laborers.

The Russian dramatist, Potiskhine, has lately written a comedy in which the invectives against the proprietors of serfs, and the reactionary party in general, are so bitter that its first representation produced a tumult in the theatre. The aristocratic spectators hissed and the democrats applauded. When the nobles sent a deputation to the Prince Dolgoroukow for the purpose of demanding a withdrawal of the play, the Prince refused to receive it. Plantation manners are at singular discount in the world, just now.

The Senate of Finland is considering a proposition to authorize the use of the Russian language in the Finnish courts and offices equally with the Swedish and Finnish tongues. The latter has only recently come into official use, the language of the tribunals having always been Swedish.

CONGRESS.

Washington, Dec. 9, 1865.

The predominant feeling in Congress is buoyant and hopeful. Whatever elements of division and controversy may be latent in the great Union party, which holds so heavy a majority of both Houses, no token of such division was manifested in the first week of the session. The striking unanimity with which Mr. Stevens's resolution, relegating the whole question of the admission of Southern members to the future, was adopted by the House, surprised all. The few Democratic representatives already speak of their puny numbers as present only for the sake of form, and seem to think it hardly worth while to go through the ceremony of voting nay. Upwards of one hundred working majority, in a house of 183 members, after making all allowances for the absent, the wavering, and the indisposed, represents a solid phalanx of power such as our politics have not witnessed since the halcyon days of Monroe's administration. As a mere question of present power, the Union party could afford to admit at once the 58 Southern representatives elect, or to be elected. But the feeling is strong against any such admission, in advance of any guaranty that the results of the war against secession are secured throughout the whole South.

The New England members are no more determined in this sentiment than are those from the great Middle and Western States. Those who are accustomed to rail at "Massachusetts radicalism" may come to entertain a wholesome respect for opinions which are even more tenaciously held by the representatives of Ohio, Illinois, and Iowa. Nor is this sentiment the mere bigotry of party. About half the representatives constituting the House (ninety out of one hundred and eighty-three members) are new to our legislative halls. They represent, not a well-drilled and thorough-paced party majority, but they represent the people. When Ohio sends seventeen out of nineteen of her members who will listen to no blandishments; when Iowa commissions her solid delegation of six members who are as strenuous as Massachusetts for the eternal rights of man; when even calculating Pennsylvania elects sixteen out of twenty-four who will not bow the knee to Baal, it is safe to reckon that a new era has dawned upon our politics.

The message of the President is praised most loudly by the most moderate among politicians. Its careful diplomacy wins admiration quite as much in what it avoids saying as in what it says. Some there are who have an intimate persuasion that the entire message is the composition of Secretary Seward. But those who are nearest to the matter aver that the Secretary of State is only responsible for the portion relating to foreign affairs, with an occasional retouching elsewhere of the expression, while President Johnson can claim full credit for the rest.

Mr. Senator Sumner's shower of resolutions, bills, and constitutional amendments, offered on the first day of the session, provokes much comment. The senator was never solicitous to avoid having many irons in the fire, however much some of them might be burned. It is surprising that a lawyer of such erudition should take so little pains to put his propositions into legal form as is evinced in his scheme to submit to a popular vote in the lately rebellious States five several conditions precedent to their restoration to the Union, the first of which reads as follows: "1. The complete re-establishment of loyalty, as shown by an honest recognition of the unity of the republic, and the duty of allegiance to it at all times, without mental reservation or equivocation of any kind."

The important recommendations of Secretary McCulloch's report meet with universal favor. Congress is not disposed to blink the necessity of taking care of the public credit, and the finance committees of both Houses will take early measures to mature bills embodying both the steady reduction of the public debt and the gradual contraction of the circulating medium.

The adoption in the House by an unanimous vote save one (the latter cast by a Kentucky copperhead) of Mr. Randall's resolution affirming the sacredness and inviolability of the public debt, and frowning upon all attempts, direct or indirect, to repudiate any part it, is the re-echo of a universal popular sentiment. Its championship by the Democracy is a cheering sign, and should they only prove sincere, it will give the death-blow to those dishonest and scheming politicians who have been looking forward to an alliance between the Southern rebels and the Northern copperheads to repudiate the national debt, while arresting or reversing the national regeneration.

DIARY.

Monday, December 4, 1865.—In Senate, Mr. Wade introduced a bill extending the right of suffrage to colored men in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Sumner offered resolutions that the Constitutional Amendment abolishing slavery, having been adopted by three-fourths of the States not in rebellion, is a part of the Constitution; and that no State lately in rebellion which refuses to ratify it be permitted to resume its relations with the Union. Also, resolutions declaring it the duty of Congress to insist upon the following conditions of re-admission in the case of all States seeking to return to the Union: 1. Loyalty. 2. Emancipation. 3. Repudiation of the rebel debt, and adoption of the national debt, in just proportion. 4. Education for all, without distinction of color. 5. Election of loyal officers only. Also, resolutions declaring that Congress can accept no State Government as republican where large masses of loyal citizens of the United States are excluded from the elective franchise. Also, bills prescribing a new oath to maintain a republican form of government in the rebel States; prescribing appropriate legislation to enforce the Constitutional Amendment; to enforce the guarantee of a republican form of government by Congress to the States; to endow the colored race in the District of Columbia with the right of suffrage; and to amend the Constitution so as to apportion representatives among the States according to the number of male citizens therein, of the age of twenty-one years. Mr. Wilson introduced a bill to maintain the freedom of the inhabitants in States lately in insurrection.

In the House of Representatives, an organization was effected by the re-election of Schuyler Colfax (Union) as Speaker, by 139 votes, over James Brooks (Democrat), who had 36 votes. Edward McPherson was also re-elected Clerk. The roll of members participating in the organization contained no names from any of the eleven States lately in rebellion. Immediately after the organization, Mr. Stevens offered a resolution for a joint committee of fifteen to "enquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called Confederate States of America, and report whether any of them are entitled to be represented in either House of Congress," and declaring that until such report should be made, no member should be received into either House from any such State. —Adopted: ayes, 133; noes, 36.

Dec. 5.—In Senate, the House resolution for a joint committee of fifteen members to report upon the propriety of admitting Southern members elect was called up, but, being objected to by Mr. Reverdy Johnson, was laid over under the rules. The credentials of Messrs. Sharkey and Alcorn as Senators from Mississippi, signed by Gov. Humphreys, were laid upon the table. Resolutions of the Legislature of Vermont, that the "moral power and legal authority of the Federal Government should be exerted to secure equal rights, including the elective franchise, to all citizens, without respect to color, in the reconstruction of the States lately in rebellion," were received. The President's annual message was received and read. In the House, Rev. C. B. Boynton was chosen chaplain. Mr. Randall (Dem.) offered a resolution that the public debt created during the rebellion is sacred, and that any attempt to repudiate or impair it should be rejected by Congress. Adopted: yeas, 162; nays, 1. Mr. Stevens offered, as an amendment to the Constitution, a prohibition upon the United States and every State in the Union to assume or pay any part of the rebel debt. Referred to the Judiciary Committee. Also, constitutional amendment apportioning representatives among the States according to their respective legal voters. Referred. Also, a constitutional amendment that "all national and State laws shall be equally applicable to every citizen, and no discrimination shall be made on account of race and color." Referred.

Dec. 6.—In Senate, Mr. Sumner offered a bill authorizing all railroads to carry freight and passengers from one State to another. Referred. Also, a resolution requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to inform the Senate what officers have been permitted to take office and receive pay from the U. S. without having taken the oath prescribed by Congress. Laid over. Adjourned to Dec. 11.

In the House, Mr. Thayer offered a bill declaring who shall act as President in case of the death or disability of both President and Vice-President of the United States. Referred. Mr. Bingham offered a constitutional amendment repealing the prohibition of a tax or duty upon exports. Also, another conferring upon Congress power to make all laws needful to secure to all persons equal rights of liberty and property. Referred. Mr. Washburne offered a resolution to revive the grade of general in the army of the United States. Adjourned to December 11.

THE FREEDMEN.

A YEAR ago there was formed in Baltimore an association for the moral and educational improvement of the colored people. It was composed of some of the most enlightened, prudent, and humane citizens there resident, but it encountered at the start, and has never ceased to encounter, the indifference or contempt of many and the open hostility of an indefinite number. Nevertheless, it has established in Baltimore sixteen schools, having nearly two thousand scholars, and in the various counties of the State eighteen schools, with about twelve hundred scholars. In accomplishing these highly creditable results the association has expended sixteen thousand dollars, of which the local share is set down at only thirty-nine hundred! We are told in a recent circular, issued from its office at 3 and 4 Bible House, that "The association challenges the experience of the citizens of the State to show more effective and competent teachers, or more orderly, studious, and attentive scholars, than the schools of the association contain, or to point out an enterprise which in so short a period has done more by its action to improve the minds, morals, and homes of any other class of people than it has done for the colored people of this State, where its influence has been allowed to be felt.

"Nothing has so cheered the hearts of the members of the association, aside from the extraordinary thirst for information which the scholars, both young and old, exhibit, than the effect which the school has upon the household and home. The cleanliness, order, higher hopes and aims, which succeed the attendance of the children at school are everywhere apparent."

The old pro-slavery malice is not to be appeased, but rather stirred afresh, by such an exhibition of capacity for improvement in those who were lately marketable chattels. Accordingly, the association reports that

"Its school-houses have been burned in five or six different places, its teachers warned to fly, or to suffer what we had fondly hoped by this time was impossible in free Maryland—the brutality of an ignorant mob.

"Its scholars have been beaten on the country roads, their books and clothing taken from them, and such dread inspired in the breasts of the colored people that few, where these things have been done, can be encouraged to attend school at all."

A teacher was employed to instruct the girls in sewing, but the law, in order to compel negro apprenticeship, makes the child dependent on the parents; and those thus bound to service find it for their interest to know as little that is useful as possible, in order to shorten their term in proportion to their unprofitableness. Oppressive as are the statutes, and notorious as is the opposition of the community to the benevolent efforts of the association, the churches have thus far failed to protest against either, even by so much as countenancing the movement. Not a single clergyman on the Bay Shore has pleaded for justice and kindness toward the persecuted blacks. One meeting-house was refused the association for holding its anniversary, simply because of the odium which clings to it. Two hundred and fifty private notes were addressed to the respective clergymen of the city requesting Christian co-operation, and produced but twenty-three answers, not one of which was a straightforward compliance. The clergymen of several denominations, who are members of the Board, and the congregations of the two Israelitish synagogues, are specially excepted.

In the face of these important facts, at once so honorable and so disgraceful to the State, the undismayed handful of men who are helping thus to redeem a State which needs redemption sadly, appeal to their fellow-citizens and to all generous and philanthropic persons in or out of Maryland for further and increased support. In this case moral agencies and instrumentalities can alone be employed, since the military arm of the Government has been withdrawn south of the Potomac. The nation can ill afford to let this circumstance accrue to the benefit of the still vital spirit of despotism. It concerns the general interest that Maryland should be made a free State as thoroughly and as rapidly as our means will permit. Wm. J. Albert, President, and John T. Graham, Actuary, of the association, will receive and wisely expend the funds that may be put into their hands for this purpose.

Minor Topics.

MR. BENJAMIN RHETT, of South Carolina, tells the editor of the Charleston News that a most seasonable article in that paper, under the signature "Planter," expresses without doubt the sentiments of the planting community of South Carolina—if not of the whole South. It is a question, however, says Mr. Rhett, whether red republicanism and philanthropy, of whatever color that may be, have not determined that labor shall not be re-organized at the South. The "inner light of New England's conscience," Mr. Rhett says, has not the smallest objection to the wholesale destruction of the negro race now going on, and for which the inner light is responsible, but cannot stomach easily the recuperation of Southern prosperity, unless for tax-paying purposes. Nevertheless, although so impressed with the conviction that his attempt is vain, the benevolent Mr. Rhett, unwilling that the inner light should shine so dimly, is determined to trim it a little with the snuffers of experience, and has happily devised a plan which, in these shifting times, is of the highest importance, to remove from the South the evils which liberty, forced upon her by mistaken philanthropy, is inducing, and to establish in their place a system which shall satisfy the prejudices of the Northern and the humanity of the Southern States. Searching the globe for some model of equitable legislation in a similar case, the eye of Mr. Rhett lights naturally upon French Guiana, for that South American country, like ours, contains freedmen and planters, and is governed by Louis Napoleon. The happy system put in operation by that bulwark of Christendom is this, which, Mr. Rhett says, renders the labor of the freedmen there as effective as when they were in that patriarchal state which united the practice of Christian to the form of Jewish life. Every freedman who has to labor for his daily bread is compelled by law to hire himself to some employer for the year. In most places, it takes two to make a bargain, but in French Guiana it takes three—the employer, the employee, and the state, who, in the person of a magistrate, comes in to see that all is right. If the employer and employee happen to differ, the former steps round the corner for the magistrate or policeman, who settles the difficulty if he can, and if he can't, which may perhaps be the case when the employer has given the servant thirty-nine lashes and then accuses him of impertinence, the master gives notice of intention to discharge, and the employee is taken to a house of industry, where he works for his support until engaged by some new party. This excellent law has proved effective, Mr. Rhett says, and we have not a doubt of it, in preventing vagabondage and pauperism among a race who it is so well known will not labor voluntarily; a fact conceded by all, Mr. Rhett says, who are not guided by inner lights and higher laws, but are willing to be governed by common-sense. It will be seen that the law proceeds upon a thorough recognition of the sanctity of labor.

The puzzle is now solved, Mr. Rhett says, and if we will imitate the Guiana system America may become as happy a country. We have only one alteration to propose: that the benefits of this law be extended to all contracts for labor, on both sides (for we have no idea that the laborer shall have all the advantage), throughout the United States. We would propose that Congress should pass an act somewhat of this nature:

AN ACT TO PROMOTE LABOR, IMITATE GUIANA, AND IMPROVE AMERICA.

Whereas, We have been much puzzled, and our difficulties have been solved by Mr. Benjamin Rhett, who refers us to the example of his Majesty the Emperor of France in French Guiana, and being desirous of extending the blessings of that happy country to our own,

Be it enacted by the Senate and Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled:

I. Freedom shall never hereafter exist in the United States, except as punishment for crime.

II. In all cases of labor contracts, there shall be three parties, the master, the servant, and the State of South Carolina. In case of any disagreement the master and servant shall give mutual notice of discontinuance, and shall be both incarcerated in a house of industry for the remainder of the term of their contract, where they will labor for their support at the treadmill.

III. This law will be enforced in each case by his Majesty the Emperor of the French in person.

Whether this or any other plan, Mr. Rhett says (speaking of the Napoleonic model), will exempt us from that pestilent, intermeddling philanthropy which, however excellent in theory, has proved so destructive to white and black in practice, is problematical. Mr. Rhett has his doubts whether even Louis' philanthropy and humanitarianism will prove acceptable to the spotless descendants of the Plymouth Rock Pilgrim Fathers, who have an absurd way, Mr. Rhett says, of going about in their clean clothes and pointing out the spots on their neighbors'. It is true, he adds, that this system is inferior to slavery, because it does not provide for the increase of the colored race.

The other day they had, on the New Jersey Central Railroad, one of those interesting accidents which have become fashionable of late. One car was thrust forward into another, by the force of a collision, like the slide of a cigar-holder into its case, shaving off the heads and arms of such passengers as sat next the aisle, and remaining enclosed in its novel receptacle for the gratification of the curious, who have since flocked to look at it. A similar accident, it will be remembered, occurred at Newark not long since, and, perhaps, thrusting one car inside another might be classified as the New Jersey casualty. It is quite time that the exact sciences began to take cognizance of occurrences which the law does not in any way notice, and that statisticians should begin to collect and arrange the facts of railroad assassination.

At present, when one sets out on a journey, although there is great probability that the train will meet with some mishap, there is no means of speculating, with any degree of certainty, as to the nature of the misfortune in store, whereas, if each passenger could be provided with a table of averages along with his ticket, he might predetermine with a fair degree of accuracy the character of the disaster. Or, if this table were kept for sale at the newsdealers' and at the hotels, people who have a prejudice for or against certain forms of maiming and murder could choose beforehand the kind of railroad slaughter at which they would like to assist, and take the train destined by the science of statistics and by the rule of order in disorder to accomplish their wishes.

A friend of ours tells us that he never takes the cars now-a-days without noting all his fellow-passengers, and wondering what death each will die before the journey ends, or with what frightful bruise or mutilation they shall eventually come off. He looks at the white-haired old man in the seat before him, and figures him with a broken neck; at the well-dressed, handsome, happy man beside him, who is to have both legs torn off above the knees directly; at the lovely young girl across the aisle, who shall shortly be burning to death in the flames of the blazing car; at the mother behind him, who will soon be stretched pale upon the grass, deaf to the shrieks of her babe impaled on a jagged splinter of the broken floor. As to what horror he forebodes for himself, he is too faint to tell of it.

Much of this sort of speculation might be spared to sensitive people if the information we already possess on the subject were systematized as we have suggested. It may, of course, be urged that since these railroad butcheries are absolutely necessary (the companies finding them much cheaper in the long run than the employment of sufficient numbers of good servants and the maintenance of their roads in perfect repair), it would be cruel to demoralize the travelling community by bringing their horrors so vividly before them. Some of the companies, we know, proceed upon this theory, and it is said that the public never hears of the small casualties involving a death or two on certain roads running into this city. But it seems to us that people suffer quite as much for want of the classified facts as they would from their presentation in a convenient and portable form. Besides, the battles in the late war were as unavoidable as the present railroad accidents, and yet their histories were immediately recounted in bloody detail by the newspapers, which the soldiers destined to fight the next battle saw and read.

It does not seem unreasonable to suppose that the variety of railroad crimes has been nearly exhausted in this country (although the smashing of a horse-car by a Harlem express car, and the killing of a passenger, in the Bowery the other day was certainly novel), and the present seems to be a good time to collect and digest the facts, for, of course, the tables can be altered from time to time according to the exigencies of incident. It would be interesting to know what numerical advantage one form of disaster has over another, and what are the chances of escape which they relatively afford. Is it better, on the whole, to run from a misplaced switch, and be hurled crushing from the track, or to go from a broken rail, and tumble over an embankment? There may be slight differences, which people would like to know, favoring those who plunge from a bridge into a swollen torrent where the passengers are drowned in the cars like rats in a trap, over those occupying a rear car run into by a locomotive, where the people are roasted and scalded to death. Which sort of collision is preferable, that with a freight train or an express? The trick of one car slid inside another seems now to be the mode, but is the succession of two accidents of this sort merely coincidence, or really fashion? Is any old accident, long disused, likely to be taken up again, such as the fatality of the drawbridge at Norwalk? A thousand such questions as these will present themselves to the minds of the ingenious statistician. Consider, also, with what interesting anecdote the whole can be relieved! A volume of the most entertaining literature for railroad travellers could be formed of these statistics properly philosophized, and interspersed with stories of horrible death and hair-breadth escape, and we commend its publication to the company which ensures passengers against accidents, and has already done so much to make travel cheerful by the pictures of collision and other disaster with which it decorates the depots.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of The Nation should be addressed to the Editor.

OUR LAST BATCH OF STATE PAPERS.

Whatever may be thought of President Johnson's policy, nobody can deny that he has expounded and defended it with force and ability. No one can read his message of last week, with the reports of the various departments, without becoming conscious that the war has in more senses than one inaugurated a new era. Those who remembered the mixture of twaddle, sophistry, and bombast to which Messrs. Pierce and Buchanan, and we might add some of their predecessors, treated the country once a year, hailed with no small sense of relief, and even of delight, the simple and manly English in which Mr. Lincoln said his say. His grammar might have sometimes been improved, and he now and then touched slightly on subjects which it was apparent he did not thoroughly understand; but taken for all in all, his state papers were amongst the ablest that any crisis in history has produced. No other statesman was ever called upon to deal with such a problem as he had presented to him, and the way in which he stated his views with regard to its various phases, will always remain one of the most splendid examples of naked, unadorned force to be found either in the English or any other tongue. As mere specimens of the literary results which native shrewdness, experience of everyday life, and natural perception, a clear head and pure heart, may enable a man to achieve, apart altogether from their political weight, they will always possess the highest interest.

President Johnson is evidently not an unworthy successor of Mr. Lincoln. His style is perhaps less quaint; it is less nervous, and perhaps not always so forcible; but it is certainly clearer, and it is certainly the style of an honest man, who knows what he means and means what he says. The Pierce-Buchanan rhetoric was unquestionably the rhetoric of a declining people, of a people from whom all moral strength—and moral strength is the only national strength—was rapidly departing. When we take up the messages of the last five years we are at once conscious of a change, not the less striking and impressive for being subtle and almost undefinable. We seem to find ourselves, as we read, face to face, not simply with a new order of ideas, but a new order of men, and to breathe a purer air.

Mr. Johnson's duty has been in some respects more difficult than Mr. Lincoln's. The principal business of the latter was, after all, as he himself tersely expressed it, "to keep pegging away;" as long as he did this successfully the reconciliation of parties at the North, and even the solution of the emancipation problem, were matters of secondary moment. But Mr. Johnson has to do what is in many respects harder than to achieve victory, and that is so to use victory that it may prove a blessing and not a curse.

We have criticized very freely the mode of reconstruction to which the President committed himself and the Government at the close of the war. We thought that whether the South was acting in good faith or not, there was undue haste exhibited in the measures which he took for the restoration of the State governments. Both whites and blacks would have been more than human if they had become in two or three months so reconciled to the new social order as to respect each other's rights without restraint from without. The first steps taken by the President to restore civil government were, however well intentioned, of a nature to deceive both the planters and the freedmen. The former were cheated into the belief that they would in a very short time get rid of the Federal troops and manage things as they pleased, short of restoring slavery; the blacks were, on the other hand, disturbed by doubts which tended to prevent them settling down to work. The result has been the state of things which everybody who visits the South agrees in describing as a state little short of anarchy. The President has been accordingly forced, as we predicted at the outset he would be, to go on increasing his demands for guarantees, and now, when they have all been complied with, he finds himself still compelled to maintain that military control of the South which he justly deprecates in his message, and to do away with which at the earliest possible moment has been the great object of his reconstruction policy. "If," as he says, "good faith requires the security of the freedmen in their liberty, their property, their rights to labor, and their rights to claim the just return for their labor," there is certainly no way of maintaining it except by the exercise over them of extra-constitutional protection on the part of the general Government; and this in the last analysis means, and can only mean, the reservation of the power of military interference. So that we reach, as far as we can see, very nearly the same point by the road which Mr. Johnson indicates, but declares he will not follow, as we reach by that traced out by the most radical of his critics.

The assurance, however, which the message solemnly conveys, that the freedmen will be protected, no matter through what process of political pacification the whites may pass, is all we can now seek from him. Even if Mr. Johnson had done what he seks to justify himself for not having done, bestowed the franchise on the blacks, they would still have to be protected in the exercise of it. In short, no matter from what point of view we look at Southern society, or what scheme of re-organization we may fix upon, we are still driven to the conclusion that the reservation of the power of irregular interference with the State governments by the President will, for some time to come, be absolutely necessary, and as long as he undertakes to use it, when required, we can readily listen to the arguments by which he proves that it is not to be thought of.

Taken for all in all, however, the message is one which any democrat as well as any American may well read with pride. We do not know where to look in any other part of the globe for a statesman whom we could fix upon as likely to seize the points of so great a question, and state them with so much clearness and breadth, as this Tennessean tailor, who was toiling for his daily bread in the humblest of employments when the chiefs of all other countries were reaping every advantage which school, college, and social position could furnish. Those who tremble over the future of democracy may well take heart again when men like Lincoln and Johnson can at any great crisis be drawn from the lowest ranks of society, and have the destinies of the nation placed in their hands with the full assurance that their very errors will be better and wiser than the skill and wisdom of kings and nobles. For if the President were to-morrow to commit every mistake or sin which his worst enemies have ever feared, his plan of reconstruction would still remain the brightest example of humanity, self-restraint, and sagacity ever witnessed—something to which the history of no other country offers any approach, and which it is safe to say none but a democratic society would be capable of carrying out. That passage, too, in which he deprecates the concentration of great patronage, either in his own hands or in those of any other man, and deprecates it with a sincerity proved by his acts, will, to European ears, seem strange and novel language to issue from the lips of a ruler. And that final burst of feeling—for such we may safely term it—in which he defines the position of the United States in the world, sketches the part they are to play in civilization, and the triumphs they are destined to achieve in the fields of peace, is, in our mind, something far better and far higher than a patriotic boast; it is a solemn and emphatic declaration that a State has at last been founded in which the promotion of human happiness is, in practice as well as in theory, the great end for which society and government exist, and in which the Christian idea of the equality of men for the first time in history receives a solemn and official recognition.

THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH AND THE FREEDMEN.

The Protestant Episcopal Church, at its recent convention in Philadelphia, earned for itself an unenviable fame all over the country. It was a city set conspicuously on a hill; it was a candle by no means hid under a bushel, but placed on a very high candlestick, so that its beams fell into every corner of the national house; but the city was not recognized as a "City of God," nor did the lofty candle shine in a way to reveal many "good works." Long and ardent discussions respecting the proper ordination of a bishop, protracted deliberations on points of ritual observance and etiquette, profound meditations on the text of the Prayer-Book, and the expediency of altering by a word or a point a few verses in the book of hymns, exhibited a painful nicety in the art of measuring mint, anise, and cummin, which would have done credit to certain unapplauded persons in the New Testament; while an apparent insensibility to the crying sorrows and evils of the time, a marked indifference to the issues that were distracting the nation, a strange unwillingness to enter on the discussion of any matter that practically interested their fellow-men, and a passionate refusal to admit that the extermination of the cause of the war, the abolition of slavery, was a blessing to be grateful for, proved how stubborn was the spirit that declined to give its attention to the weightier matters of the law, justice, mercy, and truth.

To say that the church in doing as it did was simply following the line of its traditional usage, that its convention was ecclesiastical purely, and could only by a violent departure from its ends touch the domain of social, political, or humane interests, instead of being a justification of its course, would seem to be the most emphatic condemnation of it. To excuse an act of unfaithfulness on the ground that it is but the last of a long and uninterrupted series of infidelities, is a strange procedure on the part of Christian men. To say that a church shall stand unrebuked for a conspicuous neglect of social duty because on all similar occasions, when the like opportunity was offered, it had been equally neglectful; to affirm that because a church had never engaged in matters of political or national reform, it should be allowed the privilege of never doing so; to give as a reason for silence at a great critical moment, when the very stones were crying out, that its rules and regulations forbade its speech, is certainly the most extraordinary kind of reasoning that was ever used in a bad cause.

For the Episcopal Church to have taken such a position was especially unfortunate for itself and for the community. Had the representatives of some small, obscure, impoverished, illiterate sect, destitute of power and prestige, and absorbed in its dogmatical peculiarity, met in a village vestry-room, and, in the intensity of their zeal, forgotten the world outside, the character of their proceeding would have been the same, but the consequences of it would have been insignificant. But here was a great church, commanding enormous wealth, enjoying immense social prestige, holding in its communion vast numbers of the intelligent, the educated, the cultivated, and the influential; completely organized, with a faith fixed beyond debate or question—a church relieved from the necessity of maintaining a constant battle for the preservation of its forms and the integrity of its dogma, and therefore able to throw the accumulated force of its influence into the warfare of humanity with an effect well-nigh sufficient to decide the conflict; and for such an establishment to remain neutral at a time when neutrality meant opposition—for such an establishment to withdraw from the field its vast supplies of material, intellectual, and moral aid at a moment when the simple withholding of aid was giving aid to the enemy, was one of the saddest—we must say, one of the most culpable—procedures we could be called on to recount.

But the Episcopal Church is about turning its attention to the freedmen. At a meeting of its Board of Missions, held at St. Luke's Church, Philadelphia, on the evening of October 5, it was resolved that so much of the report of the Domestic Committee as relates to the freedmen of the South be referred to a committee of seven. At a subsequent meeting of the board, held at the same place, on the evening of October 13, this committee presented the report which we have before us, wherein they recommend the establishment of a commission, to be called the "Protestant Episcopal Freedman's Commission," to whom shall be committed the religious and other instruction of the freedmen. It was decided that, until otherwise ordered, the commission should consist of twenty-eight gentlemen, sixteen of whom were clergy, among them four bishops and several eminent doctors of divinity. The first public meeting in behalf of the commission was held in Calvary Church, in this city, on the evening of December 3. A few statements in the report under our eye, giving briefly the reasons that are supposed to justify this ecclesiastical movement, deserve a passing word of comment. It is asserted, in the first place, that "the religious associations by which the negroes were formerly surrounded have been broken up;" that "religion has either ceased to be heard by them at all, or is heard in utterances the most fantastic and demoralizing;" that "among themselves religious institutions, in almost any stable and orthodox sense, have ceased to exist." This last declaration, unless it may be understood as applying to the institutions of the Episcopal Church, certainly cannot be sustained in anything like its full breadth. As far as our knowledge extends—and it covers large portions of the Southern States—the black churches are at least as well organized as the white, and in many places their condition is more flourishing. The negroes show in many ways that they value their religion more than the white people do. The last thing they will abandon is their church. Their pastors are devoted; their congregations are devout. So true is this, that the slaveholders have relied on the "piety" of the negroes as a means of keeping them in subserviency almost as potential as the sacred whip. They were always sure of the fidelity of the religious sense. To say that this religious sense is tinctured, nay, is saturated, with superstition, that its utterances are "fantastical," is simply to say that it is the religion of untaught, impulsive, sensuous, and fanciful people; not the most enlightened religion, to be sure, but quite as much so as its devotees—till they become more rational—can entertain. It is the religion that belongs to them; they are satisfied with it; and they must become a different people before they will be satisfied with any other. We may say that in one sense it has been "demoralizing," for it has encouraged an inertness of their moral nature which was extremely prejudicial to their personal independence and their social emancipation; but "demoralizing" in the ordinary sense it certainly is not, unless all intense spiritual excitement be pronounced so.

We fear that the zeal for the negro's spiritual welfare is merely a sectarian zeal. Indeed, this is frankly avowed. For the gentlemen proceed to say that in forming the "Episcopal Commission" they are but following the example of other sects, meaning, we presume, the Baptists and the Old School Presbyterians. But does my neighbor's narrow policy justify mine? It should rather rebuke mine. Will the great Episcopal Church, which has haughtily stood aloof from all dissenters and carefully avoided their ways, take a hint from them precisely when their ways are most perverse? Because two out of the numerous Protestant sects choose to descend into the arena, and, taking advantage of the black man's helplessness, chaffer and struggle together for the possession of his bewildered soul, is it a noble thing for the dignified church to dash in for its share of the spoils? We should judge it to be rather the time for it to manifest a calm conservatism which should chide these hot partisans and make them desist.

If the example of the sectaries furnishes no excuse for the establishment of another commission, still less does the example of the anti-sectaries of the Unionists furnish one. "The only general society," says the report, "which claims public support in this connection, comprises Unitarians, Universalists, and Humanitarians among its leading men. In such a society, men holding that in the Gospel alone is salvation cannot unite." Had the gentlemen told the whole truth they would have added, supposing them to refer to the "National Freedmen's Relief Association," that among its leading men were also Baptists, Methodists, and Episcopalians; and, had they been entirely honest, they would have remarked further that all these gentlemen counselled and worked together with entire unanimity; that no sectarian dispute ever arose among them; that they made it their business to give secular education, with domestic instruction in the arts of practical living, and nothing more; that they chose their agents and teachers with a single eye to their capacity and fitness for that work, asking no questions about creed or church connection, but accepting character under whatever form of religious discipline matured. Is the good churchman forbidden to join an association like that? Then he is forbidden to join any association which is formed with the purely humane purpose of civilizing and enlightening his fellow-man.

The movement just inaugurated is especially untimely at this moment, when the bitter spirit of division which has so long obstructed the great work of educating the freedmen is beginning to yield before the pressure of public opinion, which demands unity and combination. Last summer the several Eastern societies working for the freedmen effected a union among themselves for the better conduct of their enterprise. The Western associations did the same thing among themselves. In the early autumn these two great branches—East and West—combined in one central organization, having its secretary at Washington. The object was to present to the public one noble and powerful commission, unecclesiastical, unsectarian, Christian in the earnest, human sense—an association noble enough to command the respect of the country, comprehensive enough to secure general sympathy, and strong enough to wield all the resources that might be devoted to the work it undertook. It was a scheme worthy of all praise; the execution of it demanded thought, effort, sacrifice. They were freely given. The plan did gain approval, sympathy, support. A new spirit began to stir and spread. There is a purpose now, we understand, to take the American Union Commission into the general organization.

Unity is the word. Concentrated action for common human ends is the desire. It is the only desire that all can cherish with the same intensity and can express in the same manner. If the work is to be well done, it must be done with a hearty and unanimous will, and such a will can only be directed to the comprehensive improvement of the black man's temporal condition. The deadliest foe of such union is sectarian prejudice. The party which thrusts this forward now, under pretext of doing "higher" work, labors, according to its efficiency, to frustrate the worthiest philanthropic enterprise of the generation.

EXULTANT.

My lover fell: at dead of night
I woke in dreams of wild affright;
The trumpet's notes I seemed to hear,
The clash of arms smote on mine ear.
Morn broke, and with it tidings came;
They quivered through my heart of flame;
These were the words, I know them well:
"At the Blue Ridge he fighting fell."

No sad dove mourning for its mate,
Disheartened and disconsolate;
Like a wild lyre intense, and fine,
And jubilant, this heart of mine.
Beyond the battle's baleful breath,
And dread, unnumbered shapes of death,
Beyond this narrow reeking space,
To yon eternal resting-place,
He led; I follow to the goal,
Till the last heavy drum shall roll,
And the last battle finished be,
With trumpet notes of victory. S. D. C.

Correspondence.

THE NEGRO DIALECT.

To the Editor of The Nation:

During a residence of some months upon one of the Sea Island plantations of Port Royal I gave considerable attention to the analysis of the negro dialect, and made some observations which I think possess interest and even philological value. I have hoped that some person with a wider experience than myself—for instance, Col. Higginson, who I know was interested in this subject—would treat it with more fulness than I can do. Fearing, however, that in the progress of civilization among these people these curious features will vanish, I wish to put them on record before they fade from my own memory.

Ordinary negro-talk, such as we find in books, has very little resemblance to that of the negroes of Port Royal, who were so isolated that they seem to have formed a dialect of their own. Indeed, the different plantations have their own peculiarities, and adepts profess to be able to determine by the speech of a negro what part of an island he belongs to, or even, in some cases, his plantation. My observations were confined to a few plantations at the northern end of St. Helena Island.

With these people the process of "Phonetic Decay" appears to have gone as far, perhaps, as is possible, and with it the extremest simplification of etymology and syntax. The usual softening of th and v into d and b is observed among them; likewise a frequent interchange of v and w: as veeds and vell for weeds and well; "De wile' sinner may return" (for vilest). This last illustrates also the habit of clipping syllables, which they do constantly: as lee' for little; plänt'shun for plantation. The lengthening of short vowels is illustrated in both these words—a, for instance, never has our short sound, but always the European sound. The following hymn illustrates these points:

"Meet, O Lord, on de milk-white horse,
An' de nineteen wile [viol] in his han',
Drop on, drop on de crown on my head,
An' rolly in my Jesus' arm.
E'en [in] dat mornin' all day,
When Jesus de Chris' bin born."

The same hymn, particularly the second verse,

"Moon went into de poplar tree,
An star went into blood."

(the figures evidently taken from the book of Revelations), is a fair specimen of the turn which Scriptural ideas and phraseology receive in their untutored minds. It should be observed, by the way, that the songs do not show the full extent of the debasement of the language. Being generally taken, in phrases, from Scripture, or from the hymns which they have heard sung by the whites, they retain words and grammatical forms which one rarely hears in conversation. The common speech, in its strange words and pronunciation, abbreviations, and rhythmical modulation, sounds to a stranger like a foreign language.

These strange words are, however, less numerous than one would imagine. There is yedde for hear, as in that sweetest of their songs:

"O my sin is forgiben and my soul set free,
An' I yedde from heaben to-day."

There is sh' um, a corruption of see 'em, applied to all genders and both numbers. There is "huddy" (how-do?), pronounced "how-dy" by the purists among them. It is not irreverence, but affectionate devotion, that is expressed in the simple song:

"In de mornin' when I rise,
Tell my Jesus huddy O,
Wash my han' in de mornin' glory," etc.

Studdy (steady) is used to denote any continued or customary action. "He studdy 'buse an' cuss me," complained one of the school-children of another. This word cuss, by the way, is used by them with great latitude, to denote any offensive language. "He cuss me, 'git out,'" was the charge of one adult against another. "Ahvy [Abby: in this case the b had become v] do cuss me," was the serious-sounding but trifling accusation made by one little girl against her seat-mate. Both they seldom use; generally "all-two," or emphatically, "all-two boff togedder." One for alone. "Me one an' God," was the answer of an old man in Charleston when I asked him whether he escaped alone from his plantation. "Heaben 'nuff for me one" [i. e., I suppose, "for my part"], says one of their songs. Talk is one of their most common words, where we should use speak or mean. "Talk me, sir?" asks a boy who is not sure whether you mean him or his comrade. "Talk lick, sir! nuffin but lick," was the answer to the question whether a particular master used to whip his slaves.

The letters n and y are often thrown in euphonically. I can only remember at this moment n before a long u as n'Europe, n'United States, no n'use; but I think it is used with other vowels. Of y also I can only recall one instance, which I will give presently. The most curious, however, of all their linguistic peculiarities is, I think, the following: It is well known that the negroes all through the South speak of their elders as "uncle" and "aunt;" from a feeling of politeness, I do not doubt—it seemed disrespectful to use the bare name, and from Mr. and Mrs. they were debarred. On the Sea Islands similar feeling has led to the use of cousin towards their equals. Abbreviating this after their fashion, they get co'n or co' (the vowel sound ŭ of cousin) as the common title when they speak of one another. C' Abram, Co' Robin, Co'n Emma, C' Isaac, Co' Bob, are specimens of what one hears every day. I have heard Bro' (brother) used in the same way, but seldom; as in the song,

"Bro' Bill, you ought to know my name,
My name is written in de book ob life."

I come now to the subject of grammar, upon which I might almost be entitled to repeat a very old joke, and say that there is no grammar; for there probably is no speech that has less inflection than that of these negroes. There is no distinction of case, number, tense, or voice—hardly of gender. Perhaps I am wrong in saying that there is no number, for this distinction is made in pronouns, and some of the most intelligent will, perhaps, occasionally make it in nouns. But "Sandy hat" would generally mean indifferently Sandy's hat or hats; "dem cow" is plural, "dat cow" singular; "nigger house" means the collection of negro houses, and is, I suppose, really plural. As to cases, I do not know that I ever heard a regular possessive, but they have begun to develop one of their own, which is a very curious illustration of the way inflectional forms have probably grown up in other languages. If they wish to make the fact of possession at all emphatic or distinct, they use the whole word "own." Thus, they will say "Mosey house;" but if asked whose house that is, the answer is "Mosey own." "Co' Molsy y'own," was the odd reply made by a little girl to the question whose child she was carrying; Co' is title; y euphonic.

Nearly all the pronouns exist. Perhaps us does not, we being generally in its place. She and her being rare, him is the usual pronoun of the third person singular, for all genders and cases. "Him lick we" was the complaint of some small children against a large girl. Um is still more common, as objective case, for all genders and numbers; as Sh 'um (see 'em).

It is too much to say that the verbs have no inflections; but it is true that these have nearly disappeared. Ask a boy where he is going, and the answer is "gwine crick for ketch crab,"—"going into the creek to catch crabs" (for being generally used instead of to, to denote purpose); ask another where the missing boy is, and the answer is the same, with gone instead of gwine. Present time is made definite by the auxiliary do or da, as in the refrains "Bell da ring," "Jericho da worry me." Past time is expressed by done, as in other parts of the South. The passive is rarely, if ever, indicated. "Ole man call John," is the answer when you ask who is such and such a person. "Him mix wid him own fät," was the description given of a paste made of bruised groundnuts—the oil of the nut furnishing moisture.

I have not by any means exhausted the subject, but have given the chief part of what I remember, and hope this may stimulate others to make a note of what I overlooked or have forgotten.

Many of my illustrations are taken from the songs of the colored people, and perhaps a few words upon this very interesting topic may not be out of place. The people of the Sea Islands have hardly any secular music. I heard, to be sure, one day, a verse beginning "Dog-flea da bite me"—profane enough one would say, but I think very likely it brought in the Jordan before the end. Even their boat music is chiefly religious; almost all the rowing tunes I recognized as having heard in the praise-meetings and "shouts." The only song that I am acquainted with which is purely a boat song, is the fine lyric:

"Michael, row the boat ashore—Hallelujah," and here I have no doubt that it is the archangel Michael that is alluded to.

For the rest, the songs may be divided into hymns and shouts; or, as they class them themselves, sperituals and running sperituals. The first class contains many sweet and touching tunes, and many which bear strongly the impress of their peculiar religious ideas. For instance, to "fin' dat ting" means to find religion; and I suppose this is referred to in the favorite song, some of the verses of which are:

"O where d' ye tink I fin' 'em?
I fin' 'em, Lord, in de grave-yard.
I fin' 'em in de boggy mire."

(For a verse is often only a single line, repeated with the refrain.) This last verse alludes also to their custom, when under religious excitement, of wandering through the woods and marshes, like the ancient Bacchantes. The following song, to a very beautiful tune, alludes to this still more distinctly:

"I wait upon the Lord my God,
Who took away the sins of the world.
You want to be a Christian,—Go in the wilderness,
To wait upon the Lord.
Oh, come back, come back, etc.,
Oh, half-done Christian," etc.

The following will, perhaps, give as good a notion as any of the character of these hymns. It is often sung in the church on St. Helena Island:

"De talles' tree in Paradise
De Christian call de tree ob life.
An' I hope dis trumpet blow me home
To de new Jerusalem.
Blow your trumpet, Gabriel,
Blow your trumpet, louder!
An' I hope, etc.

"Paul an' Silas bound in jail
Sing God's praise both night and day,
An' I hope," etc.

The greatest peculiarities are, however, found in the "shouting tunes," as, indeed, the "shout" is the most peculiar institution of these people. It is a kind of shuffling dance, accompanied by a measured movement of the arms and clapping of the hands, and a sort of ducking motion of the body at the turns of the tune, performed by a line of persons moving about in a circle. I am told that they sometimes move backward, but I do not think I ever saw this. The singing is usually done by a sort of choir of bystanders. One leading singer carries on the song, stringing verse after verse of the most absurd stuff, which he often makes up as he goes along. The others "base" him, as it is called; that is, sing the chorus or refrain. The "base" almost always overlaps the tune, striking in before the line is finished, when the singer at once stops without completing the line, taking up his part again in his time before the base is quite through. The whole is accompanied by clapping of hands. The tune is often preceded by an introduction, in chanting style, during which the "shouters" (that is, the dancers, not the singers) move quickly round in the circle, not beginning the "shout" proper until the turn in the tune. The following is a great favorite for "shouting," and is used also for rowing:

"I know member, know Lord,
I know I yedde [hear] de bell da ring.
[Repeated several times.]
I want to go to meetin'—[Base] Bell da ring.
I want to go to 'ciety (lecter),
De heaven-bell a-heaven-bell,
De road so stormy (boggy),
Brudder, hain't you a member?"

And so on to any extent. Every verse is repeated, and the refrain, "Bell da ring," repeated each time. The refrain in the "shouts" is usually some short phrase like the above, e. g., "Hallelujah," "O Lord," "Yes, my Lord," "My army cross over," "Join the angel band." Sometimes it is a little longer, as "Turn, sinner, turn O!" (the most beautiful and dramatic of all the shouts), "O Lord, de rock o' jubilee," and "Archangel open de door." Sometimes the whole tune is more elaborate, as in the following, perhaps the finest of all:

"I can't stay behind my Lord,
I can't stay behind.
There 's room enough—[Base] Room enough,
Room enough in heaven for you (repeated),
I can't stay behind.
I binny all aroun'—I binny all aroun',
My fader call—An' I mus' go.
O stoback member—stoback member."

"Stoback" is "shout backwards."

Most of the music of these people has a quite civilized sound, and much of it might no doubt be traced to tunes which they have heard from the whites, and transformed for their own use. They have so much native musical capacity that it is a real obstacle to their learning tunes by heart—as soon as they have one partly learned, they begin to sing it and soon change it into something quite different. At any rate, there is no doubt that their music as a whole has been influenced by their civilization, and is rather European than African in its character. It is probable, however, that the "shout" is the direct descendant of some African dance, as the Romaika is of the Pyrrhic; and I have thought that in a few tunes I observed a peculiar character that might point to an African origin. For instance, there is a strange, wild, minor "shout:"

"Jesus die—shall I die?
Die on de cross.
Jesus da comin',
Run for to meet him," etc.

Comparatively few of the tunes, however, are minor; some of them are even merry, and the prevailing character is that of sweetness and cheerfulness.

I append two of the most peculiar and characteristic of their "shouts:"

"Pray a little longer—[Base] O Lord—Yes, my Lord.
Pray, true believer.
Jericho da worry me,
Jericho—Jericho.
Went to de meetin',
Met brudder Haclers [Hercules].
Wha' d' ye tink 'e tell me?
Tell me for to turn back.
Patrol around me.
Tank God he no ketch me."

The two last lines point to the days of slavery. The other song has an incomprehensible introduction, followed by a very distinct allusion to the most prevalent form of illness—"pain in head an' feber:"

"Way my brudder, better true belieb,
Better true be long time get ober crosses;
Way my sister, better true belieb,
An' 'e get up to heaben at las'.
My body rock 'long feber [Base] O, wid a pain in 'e head.
I wish I bin to de kingdom,
To set along side o' my Lord."

MARCEL.

THE SOUTH AS IT IS.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

XX.

PORT ROYAL ISLAND, Nov. 17, 1865.

WHILE staying on the plantation mentioned in my last letter, I visited a school kept by two young ladies resident there, and attended by about a hundred children from the immediate neighborhood. A portable school-house sent out from Philadelphia last winter was partly destroyed by Sherman's men before it could be erected, and for the present the school-room is the large barn-loft of a cotton house. Its uses in the past are shown by the broken bits of machinery fixed to the posts, and the dusty, worn-out gins pushed away into a far corner to make room for the blackboards and benches of to-day. The school has been in operation almost six months. The teachers, like those of nearly every school in the Sea Islands not supported by the munificence of some planter, are paid by some of the Northern charitable associations, and instruction is given gratuitously. Usually, after the children are dismissed, a few of the laborers on the plantation receive a lesson in reading, and at the regular school session I saw three or four adults present; but most of the scholars are between six and sixteen years old. Some of them were very neatly dressed and all were tolerably clean. Their behavior, as a rule, was quite orderly, and in all cases it was obedient and respectful. There was more noise in the room than most teachers of a Northern school would allow, but this was because the lessons are learned out of school hours, and because of the lack of proper school furniture. Nothing could be better than the close attention given to the book and the teacher by each class actually engaged in recitation. There is seldom any need of resorting to whipping or other punishment. The grown people, I was told, are slow to learn, even though they apply themselves faithfully and laboriously; but the children do quite as well as white children in Pennsylvania, for they are willing and eager to be taught, and are very constant in their attendance. The morning of my visit was rainy, but there were eighty pupils assembled, and some of them had walked a distance of two or three miles. After looking at the copy-books, which were singularly clean and contained some very fair specimens of running hand, an opportunity was afforded me to judge of the proficiency of the most advanced class. They had begun their studies in March last, at which time some of them knew the alphabet, and have had a long vacation of three months in the hot weather, so that they have only been five or six months under instruction. First they answered general questions on the map of North America. The relative positions of the various countries were given and cities and chief towns were named with commendable correctness. The worst blunder made was that of a boy who was asked "What large city is on the Pacific coast?" "New York," he said, and the teacher rebuked him: "William has been in New York himself, and he says it is on the Pacific Ocean. He does n't deserve to go there." When the day's lesson was finished, the class gave definitions of terms in physical geography. Then came a reading lesson and the spelling of words which had occurred in it, some of them being of three or four syllables and each pupil defining the word he spelled. This was very well done. In written arithmetic the class were able to perform long sums in addition with great promptness, and came out easily successful from the attempt to enumerate large numbers made up of significant figures at the beginning and end and ciphers only in the middle. In mental arithmetic the performance was in multiplication, and was equally satisfactory. All this time the primary department was in full operation at the other end of the room, and those on the benches divided their attention between the alphabet cards on their left hand and the globe and the long rows of figures on their right. After a short recess, several patriotic songs were sung and the "shout" chant, "Hold your light," which is religious in its character and hortatory, one and another Christian brother and sister being addressed by name and urged to hold their light "on Canaan's sho'." In respect to pronunciation, by the way, it is noticeable that in the singing and other school exercises, the peculiar negro dialect is to a considerable extent discarded; in their ordinary talk, as might be expected, they again lapse into it, and the transition is sometimes amusingly sudden.

During the week just past I have visited several plantations on St. Helena Island, and had opportunity to converse with many gentlemen who for the last three or four years have been engaged in raising cotton. They are all Northern men, and some of them are persons who were sent out from Boston by the Freedmen's Aid Society, in the spring of 1862, as superintendents of plantations. Afterwards, when lands in the Sea Islands were sold for the non-payment of direct taxes, they either purchased plantations for themselves or became managers for other purchasers.

The planter with whom I first talked was of this latter class. He had in his charge several plantations, containing in the aggregate eleven hundred acres of land, and cultivated by about one hundred laborers of both sexes. This year he planted two hundred and thirty-five acres of cotton, and an equal number of acres was planted in corn and miscellaneous crops by the people for themselves, so that the total quantity of land cultivated by each laborer was 3.7 acres. For their manual labor on the cotton crop, up to the time of laying by, the people were paid fifteen dollars an acre, and for the picking they received two and a half cents a pound. Mr. R. finds that these wages are sufficiently high to stimulate the people to work, and, as a general rule, to work well. The former owner of one of these plantations paid a visit to it in the course of the past summer, and gave it as his opinion that the land was as well and faithfully tilled now as in old times under the old system. Mr. R. speaks of one exception to the general rule. The collection of marsh-grass and marsh-mud for manure is a branch of farm-work comparatively disagreeable, and the negroes will not undertake it except at a price which is altogether exorbitant.

This year's crop was injured by the drought, and very much diminished by the caterpillar, so that the whole amount of ginned cotton produced will not exceed 11,000 pounds. The same number of acres in 1863, the most favorable and the most successful season since free labor has been employed, would have yielded 21,150 pounds, and under the system of slave labor, as the average yield per acre was 130 pounds, the product of 235 acres would have been 30,550 pounds. This difference in production is owing to several causes, but mainly to the fact that formerly the land was much more thoroughly manured than at present, and this will account, also, for an admitted deterioration in the length and fineness of the staple.

As to the profits of planting at the present time, Mr. R. informs me that, exclusive of the value of the land occupied by the laborer, and of the fuel and house-rent which is given him, each pound of cotton that he can raise in an ordinarily favorable year costs him fifty cents. The business may be made remunerative, therefore, while the present high prices are maintained. It is known that for some years previously to emancipation the cultivation of long-staple cotton in South Carolina was not a lucrative occupation, the capital invested seldom returning in the way of profit a higher rate of interest than four or five per cent. The plough, Mr. R. thinks, may hereafter take the place of the hoe to a very great extent, and by means of it he expects to lessen the expenses the coming season. Mr. R. says that he has found the negroes on his plantations neither improvident nor idle; that, except in the matter of getting marsh-grass and mud, their labor is quite as much under his control as he considers desirable. They cultivate less land now than in old times, when each hand was required to work about six acres; but this is because while the soldiers were here in great numbers the people have been able to obtain money more easily by the sale of fish and poultry and vegetables than by plantation work. Doubtless their experience in that respect has injured their character as hired laborers, but now that the army is withdrawn, he looked for an immediate improvement, if one chose to call it improvement; the money was honestly earned in either way. He had never observed that there was any disinclination to work in the cotton-field; some of the men who owned land of their own proposed to plant cotton for him next year. It would not be easy to substitute the system of day-labor for the task system now in use, for the people preferred the latter; yet it could be done, and the negroes could become efficient and profitable day-laborers. They would need instruction first, and example; the farmer should take off his coat and work with them.

Each of the plantations, he said, which he was superintending had been divided by the owner, and one-half the land he was now selling in small lots to such families as were living on it at the time of the Government sales in 1863. Five dollars an acre was the price demanded, and the negroes were very glad to purchase. By the general adoption of some such plan he thought the troublesome question of settling upon a labor system would receive an easy solution.

The possession by every head of a family of such a quantity of land would preserve the negro from being wholly dependent on the employer, and would not diminish the supply of labor while it improved its quality. The men who were buying these small homesteads still wished to be hired by him, and some were unwilling to purchase until they had been assured that they could continue to get employment on his plantation.

Within the last four years the domestic condition of the people had considerably improved. He could now sell many little articles of household furniture, such as knives and forks, plates, tinware of all kinds, and other similar conveniences, of which their cabins were then entirely destitute; and they all dressed themselves much better now than formerly. There were few families of his acquaintance, he thought, that had not a little hoard of money. He knew some great liars and thieves, but had no reason to doubt that more than nine-tenths of his people were reasonably honest and truthful. They were very much like white men.

The negroes who hold land, he said, are not managing it so well as the white planters. At the present time, perhaps, no land in the Sea Islands is cultivated as it should be. Theirs, as a general rule, for want of capital and skill, is rather worse cultivated than any other.

Stopping on my way from this hospitable plantation to another, some eight or nine miles distant, I passed a pleasant hour in the largest of the St. Helena schools. It is divided into three departments: a primary, an intermediate, and a higher, each of which is in charge of its own teacher, and occupies a separate room. The branches of study pursued in all the rooms are reading and spelling, writing, geography, and arithmetic; the degree of advancement attained by the pupils constituting the only difference between the departments. The oldest scholar that I saw was a young man, and he was in the primary school-room. The children flock in so numerously that the school accommodations have grown too small—the seats designed for a hundred and twenty scholars being filled full and crowded by the hundred and eighty who are admitted, and not a few are altogether shut out. The exercises were, of course, similar to those already described, and were even better performed, for the school has been longer established; and, as it seemed to me, the length of time during which the pupils have been engaged in intellectual pursuits had not only brought about an improvement in their manners and general appearance, but had worked a visible change in the expression of their faces. One of the teachers apologized for the dress of her scholars, saying that at this season of the year most of them were obliged to work in the morning, harvesting the sweet potatoes, and, as tardiness was not permitted, came from the field in their working-clothes. For most of them, however, no apology was necessary. The school building was a gift from friends in Philadelphia, and is a neat little house, standing surrounded by some magnificent green and grey live-oaks, whose shade was grateful even in November.

The second plantation which I visited is quite large, containing 1,500 acres and supporting a colored population of two hundred and forty persons of all ages. One hundred and forty of these, who are over sixteen years of age, may be called workers, and, during the past season, have cultivated one hundred and ninety-four acres of cotton. As on the other plantations of which I have any knowledge, an equal extent of ground has been cultivated by the people for their own use. Upon their corn land they pay a tax of one bushel to the acre, and they are also expected to supply all the sweet potatoes that may be needed by the white family. The caterpillar and the drought carried off three-eighths of the cotton crop, so that less than 12,000 lbs. of clean cotton will be produced. The cost of production has reached $7,776, an amount which does not include the expenses of the shipment and sale of the cotton, the diminution in the value of the stock and implements, the interest on the money invested, nor the sum of $587 expended for the support of a free school in which more than a hundred children have received instruction.

The gentleman who carried on this plantation was of opinion that before cotton-raising in the Sea Islands could become either a profitable or pleasant occupation it would be necessary to make a complete change in the system of labor. The fault of the present plan lay in the fact that the employer had no control whatever over his laborers. They worked when they pleased, and at what they pleased, and only so long as they pleased. It was a fault that made the system almost unendurable. He agreed with his friend, Mr. J., to live in this country and try to carry on a plantation was a constant tax on a man's self-respect. He could not secure the obedience of the men whom he hired; was under the necessity of coaxing them to do the work they were paid for, and often he coaxed in vain. For example, Mr. H. said, he had a good blow of cotton in the field once, and was very desirous of getting it picked; so he told the people to go out and pick it. They were busy at the time ginning the cotton already gathered, and at the end of a week he found that not one person had been into the field. He was determined to get the cotton picked, so he locked the gin-house door. That exactly suited them, however; it was just time then to dig the slip potatoes, and till the slips were dug the cotton was not touched.

Such cases, Mr. S. said, were of weekly occurrence on his plantation. It so happened that he had found no difficulty in getting marsh-grass cut, but some planters had found it almost an impossibility, and every planter was subject to the caprice of his people.

Mr. H. said that under the present system the laborer worked for his employer rather less than three months in the year; he seldom labored more than five hours in the day, and half of that time was spent in cultivating his own crop of corn or potatoes or groundnuts, so that his employer had the use of his services about one-fourth of each working day. But it was not wonderful that they had become bad laborers. The only wonder was how so much good came to be left in them after all the efforts of their enemies and their injudicious friends. He would like to see all the working people of the Sea Islands hiring themselves out to a set of tight-fisted Yankee farmers, who would be just towards them, taking nothing and giving nothing for nothing, and without a spark of sentiment in them. It would be for the best interests of the people that such a thing should come to them, and come as soon as possible. The present system of things was unbusiness-like and ought to end. He had no objection to the negroes doing as they pleased; but he had a right to live here as well as they, and they ought to do as they pleased on their own ground. Though, for that matter, the plan of allowing them to take up so much of the plantation for their own exclusive use, and the fact that it had been almost impossible in the past to discharge any laborer, no matter how idle he might be and how ill-behaved, had made them about as independent of the land-owner as if the land were owned by themselves.

I asked these gentlemen what opinion they had formed of the general character of the negroes in Port Royal. The longer he lived with them, Mr. H. said, the less confidence he had in their truth and honesty. Mr. S. said that it would be necessary to admit the negroes to the witness box, but he was afraid that very little reliance could be placed upon their word. The taking of an oath would make them not a whit more worthy of belief. They seemed to disregard perjury. There were several cases which had been brought before plantation commissions on St. Helena that still remained unsettled, because, in the confusion of lies and perjuries that must have been uttered by the opposing witnesses, the members of the commission were entirely at a loss. Lawyers would untangle such skeins, he supposed. He had serious doubts if the testimony of one respectable white man ought not to outweigh that of ten negroes. Stealing is very common; cotton is pilfered on all sides, and sold to unprincipled dealers at Beaufort, who buy and ask no questions. But one great reason for that is because stealing can be done with impunity, there being no settled law now in operation. In respect to chastity, there seemed to be some improvement, though the ties of marriage were yet too easily taken on and thrown off. They were improving, too, in their desire for home comforts, though less rapidly than one would expect.

And many of their faults, Mr. S. thought, had been encouraged and confirmed, rather than discouraged and removed, during the past four years. He felt convinced that a system of labor which should leave the employer and the negroes perfectly free would show that the latter were careful, industrious, and profitable servants. Only give him the power over his laborers which a Northern farmer has over his hired hands, and he would ensure as large a crop of cotton as was ever produced in old times.

At the house where I passed the night, that of a Quaker from Delaware, who has been in the Sea Islands a little more than three years, but who never planted cotton till this spring, I had an hour's conversation on the same topics. He, too, had carried on cotton raising at a loss, although he had escaped the ravages of the caterpillar. If he gathers all the cotton that he now expects to gather, it will have cost him when ginned a dollar a pound. His condemnation of the present system of labor was unqualified. For every acre that his people planted for him for wages they planted precisely two acres for themselves, and it was hard to induce them to take up more cotton ground than would supply them with spending money. Their living they expected to make off their own land. As a friend of the colored people, he would say that he would not wish a final judgment of them to be deduced from their present condition in the Sea Islands.

These same opinions, which I found to be held by a majority of the gentlemen with whom I conversed, would be expressed, perhaps, in less temperate language by a majority of the Northern planters in Port Royal. On Thursday next they are to meet in the Baptist Church on St. Helena Island, for the purpose of taking into consideration the system of labor now in use and devising means for its improvement. Whether or not any of the negroes are to be present at this conference I do not know.

"PERSONAL ITEMS."

M. Auguste Laugel, in his recent book, "Les Etats-Unis pendant la Guerre," notices the inappeasable appetite of the Americans either to tell or to hear some new thing about some new man, and turns it to the kindest account for us in one of the best studies of the national character which we have ever seen. The Americans, he says, exceed all others in an insatiable curiosity to know men's hearts:

"Art, abstract ideas, nature, philosophy, are matters of indifferent or inferior interest. His memory seems capable of embracing all names, all genealogies, all anecdotes, all dates. If he studies a doctrine, the sectarian interests him as much as the sect. He loves the poet equally with the poem. Longfellow, Bryant, and Lowell are the personal friends of every American. They sit at every fireside; everything belongs to them; they are the true kings of this democracy which people call vulgar and rapacious, and depict on its knees before the dollar."

"The American," continues M. Laugel, "is eminently sociable; but his sociability is not that commonplace complaisance which plays with vain formalities; it is more exacting. It says to the new-comer, to the unknown, Who are you? what do you bring me? what can you teach me? are you a man? do you excel in something? do you know how to cut down a tree or translate 'Homer?' He drops his plummet into all consciences, and despises, above all, a useless existence, indolence, sluggishness, inertness of spirit."

The picture is in some things so just and true that we are loth to say in what we think our lively Gallic friend flatters us. It is true that every sort of manhood is valued and honored among us; but it must be confessed that if we give our great men reverence, we take it out of them, on the other hand, by the most vexatious enquiry into all their personal affairs. Yes, the poets sit down at our firesides, but we oblige them to answer innumerable questions about things we have little right to know; and sometimes the nation goes and sits down at their firesides and bores them frightfully. It wants to know what has become of their first loves, and how they came to marry their present wives, and whether they are happy with them. It is eager to learn what they have for dinner, and whether they beat their children or employ moral suasion; also, whether the poets themselves smoke, or eat opium, or drink strong waters, or use profane language. It is by no means content with knowing on what works they are engaged, or what poems they have said they would like to write if they had time.

All this, however, would not be so bad if the public curiosity were fed only upon people of note and proper public interest. But, as we hinted,

"The little life of bank and brier" is not more secure from us

"Than he who warbles long and loud"

in the hearing of the whole world. Indeed, we are afraid that the demands of the average American enquirer are not those dignified questions framed for him by M. Laugel. If we could guess their nature from the sort of response constantly made him in the newspaper gossip, they are something more like these: What is your middle name, Jones? What was Smith taking over to Brooklyn in his overcoat-pocket? Is Robinson an Irishman by descent? How is Brown's sore thumb? Does Thompson, who is translating Télémaque, know anything about French?

As the little people far outnumber the great people in this world, it necessarily results that the personal intelligence must be chiefly of that factitious interest which belongs to tittle-tattle about persons for whom nobody actually cares. Curiosity concerning the affairs of distinguished men is vicious enough, but it seems to us that the gnawing desire to know whether Daubs has got back from the Adirondacks, or Chisel has set up his group of Whitman Tapping on a Drum, or Scribble has corrected the proofs of his new poem, is something that must at last reduce the whole reading public to the moral and intellectual level of idle old women at a village tea-party.

The power which the newspapers have in stimulating this kind of curiosity is very remarkable. If one of the morning papers were to take it into its head to chronicle for a few weeks or months the movements of Brown or Smith, by saying, for instance, that he is "amongst the guests at Lovejoy's Hotel," or that he may be seen walking down Broadway on such a morning "with his usual smiling look," he would soon become an object of the deepest interest to the public, although he is in all respects a very commonplace person. If, however, he supports his newspaper notoriety by some literary or artistic exploit, the eagerness to know all about him grows in geometrical ratio, and he must be a wary and secretive man if he can conceal from the knowledge of the "item" mongers even such private peculiarities as the possession of one of those moles by which long-lost daughters and sons are recognized and recovered in the "blood-and-thunder" novels. Nothing but an absolute repudiation of all literary or artistic pretensions can secure his privacy. Because if he has even once read a "poem" before a Phi Beta Kappa Society, or sketched a Sunset in a Cabbage-garden, the presumption lingers long in the public mind that he is engaged in the secret recesses of his apartment in the production of another great work of the same sort, and the noses of the "personal-men" are constantly protruded under his door snuffing for signs of his progress.

The great purveyors of this sort of intelligence are, as we have said, the New York correspondents of the country papers. If anybody wants to know how many great littérateurs and artists there are in New York, of whom he has never heard before, he has only to peruse regularly the "spicy" correspondence say of "Fiddlesticks" in that "live paper," the "Nineveh Dawn." "Fiddlesticks's" qualifications are probably a good pair of legs, an insatiable curiosity, a rich supply of slangy English, and what is called "the run of the newspaper offices." When there is an absolute dearth of the other materials of his trade, he supplies "personal items" about the editors, reporters, and proprietors of these establishments, the rows they have had, the jokes they have been making, tells who compiles the deaths and marriages, and who the shipping news. Sometimes he turns his piercing eye on his brother correspondents, and tears aside the flimsy veil under which they conceal themselves from an inquisitive public. He lets you know, for instance, that "'Possum," "the well-known correspondent" of the "Baalbec Gong," is John Smith, and you have hardly got over your astonishment when you learn from the next paragraph that "'Coon," of the "Palmyra Earthquake," is none other than John Robinson; and so on through a list of twenty or thirty. Probably you never heard of either Smith or Robinson before, and have never lighted upon their brilliant contributions in either the "Gong" or the "Earthquake," but far from supposing that you have lost nothing thereby, if you are an ordinary man you heave a sigh over the intense absorption in business which prevents you devoting more attention to "light literature."

The eagerness for "personal items" about literary men and artists is, however, due in a great degree to the prevalence amongst the public of a vague belief that men who write or paint or make statues form a sort of caste, the members of which are distinguished from the rest of the community by certain deep-seated mental and moral peculiarities. The interest displayed in their lives and actions has little or nothing to do with the merits of their works. It may be that Daubs is working up the sketches he brought back from the Adirondacks into an execrable picture, or that the new "poem" on which Scribble is engaged is simply vile prose, or that his forthcoming article is simply drivel. Yet the item-monger chronicles the progress he is making, and mentions which leg he puts down first when he is getting out of bed, at just as great length as if the story were told of Church or Lowell, and the public reads it with almost as much gusto. In fact, the impression seems to be not uncommon that all intellectual efforts are respectable because they are intellectual efforts, no matter what amount of success may attend them, and that anybody whose business it is to make them becomes de facto an object of mysterious interest, and even of veneration.

In truth, however, artists and authors are very much like other men. There are uncommonly few geniuses amongst them, the popular presumption to the contrary notwithstanding. A man's taking to literature or art as a calling is, in nine cases out of ten, nay, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, the result of accident, or of personal taste, or of pressure of circumstances. He may write very passable books, or paint fair pictures, by mere force of industry, or aided by a little talent, which is a very different thing from genius. A livelihood may be earned in these as in other occupations by very commonplace persons, and the industrious collection of "personal items" about them, therefore, without reference to the quality of their work, is just as absurd as the collection of "items" about lawyers, or doctors, or, for that matter, of wholesale grocers, would be. If the public only saw things as they are there would be nothing more interesting in Daubs making a trip to Lake George, or Scribble to the oil regions, or in his getting a new pair of boots, or in his fondness for oyster stews, than in the visit of Counsellor Scroggs to Saratoga, or his appearance on Broadway with a bundle of papers under his arm. We judge him by the quality of his speeches, and if he makes very poor ones we leave him in obscurity; but every time Daubs takes hold of a brush, or Scribble of a pen, the item-monger calls on the nation to pause and behold, and it is apt to respond.

In so far as authors and artists differ, or have differed in times past, from other people, it has been due in a great measure, if not wholly, to the greater precariousness of their calling, the uncertainty of the market for their wares. This always begets recklessness and improvidence, as is seen in the case of soldiers and sailors and all other men whose fortune is unusually doubtful. So that the very name of writer or painter was at one time, and with many people is still, a synonym for poverty and shiftlessness. But under the large and steady demand for pictures and books and articles of all kinds, good, bad, and indifferent, which has grown up with the progress of democracy in this and other countries, the profession of an artist or author is getting to be almost as reliable as any other, and the habits of the members of it are accordingly greatly changed. Artists in England and France are now amongst the most posés, respectable, and thrifty persons in the community, accumulate large fortunes, give good dinners, and go to church on Sundays, and change their linen once a day. There is nothing peculiar about them as men, either there or here. Not one in a thousand is a genius, or anything else but a decent citizen, who supports himself or his family by the steady, plodding pursuit of a very pleasant calling.

As to authors, one of the most opular novelists of the day maintains that a boy can be brought up to romance writing as he can to any other profession, and declares that he means to put one of his own sons into it. This is doubtless an exaggeration, but it has a large basis of truth. Before "personal items" of either writers or painters can have any real value, we have to go behind the profession, and find out what manner of man he is we are scrutinizing. If he has done great things with either pen or pencil, of course it is but human to desire to know whether he paints with his legs crossed, or writes standing up or sitting down; but if he has not, and is, after all, merely a "good husband, good father, exemplary in all the relations of life," like so many defunct aldermen, firemen, and other members of public bodies, earning an honorable livelihood by middling pictures or indifferent books, we think it would be as well to let him alone.

PAPER AND PRINTING.

VERY soon after the present Secretary of the Interior Department entered upon his important duties, he caused a radical change to be made in the manner of working up, for publication, the returns of the Census Office; and the first tangible result is a quarto volume of 750 pages on the "Manufactures of the United States in 1860." The press has not yet been supplied with copies of this work, as it undoubtedly will be, but from a friend in Washington we have obtained the subjoined synopsis of facts, taken therefrom, on the subject of paper and printing:

The total number of paper manufactories in the United States was 555, of which 204 were in New England, 273 in the Middle States, 53 in the Western States, and 24 in the South. Connecticut with 55 mills took the lead in New England, and New York with 126 mills was far in advance of any other State. The total value of this product in 1860 was $21,216,802, since which time, notwithstanding the closing of the Southern mills, there has been a very large increase; and, when compared with the statistics of France and England, we find that the annual production in the United States is greater than that in either of those countries. Some of the largest mills in this country have turned out paper at the rate of seven tons per diem; and the articles which have entered into its composition have not only been cotton and linen rags, but the waste of cotton, flax, and hemp mills, and of rope and cordage factories, and such things as coir, jute, straw, hay, stable-refuse, various kinds of wood, corn-husks, mulberry leaves and bark, and various canes and reeds.

The first paper-mill erected within the present limits of the United States was built by an ancestor of David Rittenhouse, at Roxborough, Pennsylvania, in 1693; the second mill was built at Elizabethtown, New Jersey, in 1728, during which year the first mill in Massachusetts was built in Boston; another was built at Olneysville, Rhode Island, in 1765; and at Hempstead, Long Island, another mill was erected in 1768, which is still in operation. The first mill established west of the Alleghany Mountains was built at Fayetteville, Pennsylvania; and a mill erected in Dalton, Berkshire County, Massachusetts, in 1802, has ever since been the centre of a very extensive paper business.

The book, job, and newspaper establishments returned from thirty-six States in 1860 numbered no less than 1,666; the aggregate capital employed by them amounted to $19,622,318; the number of persons employed in printing was 20,159; the cost of carrying them on was $7,588,096; the cost of material employed was $12,844,288; and the total value of the product from this source was $31,063,898.

Printing was first executed in the American colonies at Cambridge, Massachusetts, by a printer named Daye, who, in 1639, printed the "Freeman's Oath" on a press brought over from England during the preceding year. His first regular book was the "Bay Psalm-Book," which was printed in 1640; it was an octavo of 300 pages, and a second edition was printed in 1647. It was in Daye's building that the materials were set up for printing "Eliot's Indian Bible," and it was there that all the printing was executed for the Colonies for forty years.

In 1672, according to the Census Office, the first privilege in the nature of copyright was granted to John Usher, one of the earliest booksellers of Boston, for a revised edition of the laws of the colony. In 1674 the first press was established in Boston by John Foster; the first in Philadelphia was set up by William Bradford, in 1686; and it is singular that, in this connection, there is no mention made by the census editor of the first press established in New York. The first press established in Connecticut was at New London, in 1710; the first in Maryland, at Annapolis, in 1726; the first in Virginia, at Williamsburg, in 1729; the first in South Carolina, at Charleston, in 1730; the first in Rhode Island, at Newport, by a brother of Benjamin Franklin, in 1732; and the first west of the mountains, in Kentucky, in 1786. The first patent for a printing-press was taken out in 1796 by Dr. Apollos Kinsley, of Connecticut, which was an improvement on a press invented by one Nicholson; and the number of printing-press manufactories now in the Union is fourteen, mostly located in the three leading Atlantic cities.

THE ETIQUETTE OF SMOKING.

IT is not our intention to enter into any discussion of the utilities or the inutilities, the pleasures or the mischiefs, of tobacco. We accept its use as a fixed fact, something which may, possibly, be improved away by the time we have abolished all our custom-houses, cleaned the streets of New York, and the relations of labor and capital are satisfactorily settled, but to the present existence of which we can neither shut our eyes nor our noses. We propose to concern ourselves merely with its bounds and regulations.

The great difference between smoking and various practices about the morality or propriety of which men differ is its continual and unavoidable obtrusion upon non-smokers. If Deacon Coldstream has forsworn fermented beverages, nothing in the world obliges him to set foot in the fashionable dining-room, the country bar-room, or any other place where what lecturers delight to miscall the "wine-cup" is wont to circulate. If Brother Mawworm regards all actors and actresses as necessarily children of the evil one, he has no possible reason or excuse for venturing inside a play-house, and if he does not go to see the players, he may be pretty sure they will not come to see him. The Puritan who anathematizes the memory of St. Vitus need never hear a fiddle or see a caper; and if the vegetarian is sometimes exposed to the smell of roast beef, at least the savor does not sicken him. But the ordinary course of his business or pleasure is continually bringing Tom, who does not smoke, into contact with Dick and Harry, who do. Smith, whose cigar is more necessary to him than his dinner, and whose every garment reminds you of the tobacconist, meets habitually not only Jones and Brown, but Mesdames Jones and Brown, to whom the odor of the weed is positively nauseating. Drinking and dancing and many dear delights may be carried on with a certain amount of secrecy and seclusion; but a man cannot smoke a cigar under a bushel or under a bed.

The mere police of the thing, the saying by law that men shall not smoke in this or that public building or place or conveyance, is comparatively easy, though even here there are some inconsistencies and difficulties. How absurd, for instance, that a man may carry his pipe through Central Park, and a lady may not carry her nosegay! London regulations allow you to buy a cigar in an arcade (answering to the French "passage"), but not to smoke it there.

But the great trouble is when you come to the extra-legal relations of the subject. Between the smokers and the non-smokers there must be a continual self-sacrifice on one or the other side. There is a pleasant club, large or small. As men go, probably three-fourths of the members smoke, half the other fourth don't mind it, and the remaining eighth are not merely annoyed by the customary cloud, but actually unable to sit in it for any length of time. This eighth may comprise some of the very best men in the club, but as they cannot give the law to the majority, the practical result is that they are banished from the fullest and pleasantest meetings. A gentleman and lady are walking or travelling together; he suspects that a cigar would annoy her, she more than suspects that the want of one annoys him, and thus the pleasure of their intercourse is considerably impaired, and so on in fifty cases of everyday occurrence. Under these circumstances a review of the unwritten usages of society in different countries, with regard to this habit, may not prove altogether uninteresting or uninstructive.

To begin with the Old World, we find that European custom in this, as in many other social matters, may be broadly divided into two codes, the English and the Continental. The English rules in theory, and, to a great extent, in practice, are very strict. Smoking is presumed to be a vice, and regarded much as wine-drinking is, by public opinion, in most parts of New England. Youths of eighteen or nineteen, whom we should call young men, and the English call boys, are forbidden to smoke at the public schools, under pain of corporal punishment, at the military academies (some of them, at least) under pain of expulsion. For a gentleman to be seen in a fashionable street of London, by day, with a cigar, is almost as compromising as if he were to be seen there intoxicated, and no professional man would dare to sport his "weed" in Regent Street. No respectable hotel will allow a guest to smoke in his own parlor; and at very few hotels (those frequented by foreigners form the chief exception) is there any accommodation for smokers. The dining-room of a private house is a temple never to be profaned by the odor of tobacco, even should there be no ladies within a quarter of a mile. At some country-seats it is a regulation, actually printed and stuck up, hotel-fashion, that no smoking is allowed anywhere in the house; consequently, most of the gentlemen betake themselves after breakfast to the stables—about the last place, for obvious reasons, where smoking should be carried on. In short, your English gentleman, or business man of the old school, regards a cigar or pipe in much the same light as some other indulgences abstractly vicious, but which, nevertheless, a great many will have.

Such is John Bull's etiquette of smoking, a queer social fiction, and a striking example of the peculiar kind of hypocrisy which pervades English society. Perhaps we ought rather to speak of it in the past tense, for the cloud-compelling propensities of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales may have modified it within a few years. Shortly after Queen Victoria's accession, when her love of riding had given an additional impulse to the already well-developed equestrian taste of her fair subjects, an enthusiastic cigar-merchant exclaimed: "Oh, if Her Majesty would only take to smoking, like the Queen of Spain, what a lift it would give our trade!" If that vender of weeds is still alive, how he must bless the Prince!

On crossing over to the Continent we find a great change. In the first place, it is nearly a matter of course that, as a general rule (some exceptions will come up a little further on), no man objects to smoking where only men are present, even when he has the law on his side, as in the compartment of a railway-carriage. His consent will be asked out of courtesy, but it is taken for granted that he will not refuse it. Not only does no gentleman hesitate to smoke in the street, but in public dining-rooms the practice is generally allowed, except for an hour or two before dinner, and cigars are frequently lighted before dessert is finished or the ladies have left the table. As to the rule with ladies and families of your acquaintance, the hat and the cigar stand about on the same footing; and the former is a pretty good measure of the latter. Thus, you would not enter a house or apartment with your hat on unless you were on very familiar terms, indeed, with its inmates; neither would you with your cigar. You lift your hat on stopping to address a lady in a public promenade, you also throw away your cigar (à fortiori if you are going to be introduced to her), and so on. The same correspondence of hat and cigar holds good in relation to personages of superior rank, and to entering offices for the transaction of business, public or private.

Lax as these rules are in theory, the Continental practice continually tends to loosen them. The infamous desire to appear to have more or less réussi avec every desirable woman of his acquaintance, will often tempt a Frenchman to violate his own code of manners purposely; and in some other countries the use of tobacco is so nearly universal as to overcome all ordinary rules of ceremony. A German prince or general may, by some extraordinary dispensation of Providence not smoke himself, but his friends and officers will smoke under his very nose. True, he might stop them by a word, but it would be at the cost of such unpopularity as even a German potentate does not like to encounter. Besides, wherever the ladies have, in any appreciable number, adopted the practice, the men are, of course, relieved from most of their scruples in that direction. Now female smoking (to the extent of cigarettes) is very general in Russian society, tolerably so in Italian, and we suspect more common in French and German than most French and German ladies would allow before strangers.

Recrossing the ocean in a southerly direction, we come upon, to use a pet newspaper phrase, the carnival of tobacco, at its original headquarters. All the Spanish-American nations smoke, literally without distinction of age or sex, and, the churches only excepted, without distinction of place. The first gentlemen of Havana light up between the acts at their opera. The first ladies of Mexico and Peru join their guests in a cigar (not a cigarette) after dinner.

Our own practice in this as in many other things is a compromise between the insular and continental European, with rather more tendency to the latter. Our public etiquette is nearly that of the Continent, though much laxer in regard to business offices, and much stricter as concerns public dining-rooms. Where ladies are more especially concerned, the English element of our civilization is apt to predominate, and so it does in this particular. A general impression of fastness, joined to the popular delusion that drinking and smoking go together, makes us regard a lady smoker with something very like abhorrence. Seriously, and without wishing to advance a paradox, we think a very good case might be made out for ladies who smoke; but to develop the argument would be foreign to our present purpose. We are only dealing with facts, and must accept as our theory, because it is mainly true in fact, that North American ladies do not smoke, and that the smell of tobacco is more or less disagreeable to the majority of them. And this admission involves more than is apparent on the face of it. The old maxim that the effect ceases with the cause does not apply to tobacco, the after odor of which is often more disagreeable to non-smokers than the immediate result of its consumption. Hence a gentleman should purify himself thoroughly after smoking before venturing into ladies' society, and a room where gentlemen are accustomed to smoke should be carefully ventilated and pastilled before it is used by ladies.

Literature.

LITERARY NOTES.

AMERICAN biographical literature will shortly be enriched by two new works commemorative of deceased worthies, each among the most eminent in his several spheres. We allude to the memoir of Prof. Benjamin F. Silliman, by Prof. Geo. P. Fisher, of New Haven, and of Chancellor Kent, by Hon. C. P. Daly, judge of the Court of Common Pleas. The materials left by Prof. Silliman available for biographical purposes are unusually abundant. They consist of diaries and journals of travel at home and abroad, extending over considerably more than half a century, and of correspondence with nearly every scientific man of the day in Europe and America. Prof. Silliman, in fact, was considered abroad a representative of the whole physical science of America in a manner that can scarcely fall to the lot of any succeeding person. This position was naturally awarded to him by the length of time that his name had been before the world as a cultivator of the various branches of natural philosophy, the importance of his investigations in chemistry, and the high reputation attained by the scientific journal known by his name and current throughout both continents. With praiseworthy good taste, Prof. Fisher (a connection of the family) allows the venerable philosopher to be the historian of his own career, furnishing merely the necessary connecting links for the narrative. This work is now in the press, and will shortly be published by Messrs. C. Scribner & Co., forming two volumes post 8vo, with a fine engraved portrait, etc. Judge Daly's life of the great legal luminary, Chancellor Kent, is also advancing to a conclusion, though we believe the details of its publication are not finally settled. The author has had full access to the materials of all kinds in the possession of the family, and is enabled naturally to command all the resources that the memory of the living contemporaries of the chancellor can afford. The work will, in some sense, be a history of the New York Bar during the most important period of the legal history of the State, at a time when its system of jurisprudence, heretofore vague and unsettled, was taking scientific shape and consistency under the influence of the eminent lawyers and advocates, sketches of whom will be included in the memoirs of one who stood confessedly at the head of his fellows and first commanded the respect of Europe for the legal lore of America.

—The sudden decease of Mrs. Gaskell is a loss to the world of letters that all can feel because all have participated in the pleasure derived from her labors. She exemplifies in no ordinary degree the fertility of modern novelists, considering that her death took place at the early age of forty-three and that her first book was published no longer ago than 1848. This was "Mary Barton," a story of life in the manufacturing districts around Manchester, such as it presented itself to her daily observation as the wife of a Unitarian minister in that outwardly unpicturesque neighborhood. The power and fidelity of that work were immediately recognized, and at once gave the authoress a rank among female writers that her succeeding works have scarcely heightened, though they have well sustained it. The titles of her novels are so well known that it is useless to repeat them. Latterly she had adopted the serial style of publication for her stories; one of them, now near completion in the "Cornhill Magazine," develops powers of conferring interest on scenes of ordinary life and characters of everyday mould at least equal to the talent displayed in the same walk of fiction by Miss Jane Austen, that commanded the astonishment of Sir Walter Scott as a miracle of art, compared to which his own "drum-and-trumpet style" was unworthy to be named. The "Life of Charlotte Brontë" is the only acknowledged work of Mrs. Gaskell not belonging to fiction. Her story of "Cranford" is said to represent faithfully the small town in Cheshire where her youth was passed, under circumstances of great seclusion, previous to her marriage. Her death was sudden, and occurred soon after her return from a holiday visit to Italy.

—Mr. John Payne Collier announces that his reprint of the rare miscellany of old English poetry, "The Paradise of Dainty Devices," from the unique copy of the edition of 1578, is just completed, and furnished to the forty-five gentlemen who subscribe the cost, twenty shillings each, while he contributes the editorial labor for the sake of perpetuating the book, and guaranteeing its preservation from the chances of destruction that a single copy is always exposed to. He says, in a communication to the Athenæum, "At the moment of writing I have before me three letters from the United States, requesting me to forward five copies for New York, Boston, and Philadelphia. Of course I am unable to comply, as my fifty copies have been distributed." Mr. Collier has furnished corrections, etc., for the republication of his "Bibliographical and Critical Catalogue of the Rarest English Books," undertaken by Mr. David G. Francis, of 506 Broadway, and is much gratified by the appreciation shown in this country for his literary labors. The edition is now proceeding at the Riverside Press of Houghton & Co. with all the speed consistent with the accuracy demanded by the nature of the work. In typographical execution it promises to excel greatly the English original. The large-paper copies—strictly limited to seventy-five copies—are already eagerly sought for, and will undoubtedly command a handsome premium before the work is issued.

—It is a feature of good omen for the future of Mexico that, since its independence was won, the history and antiquities of the country have met with patient and acute investigators among her learned men, who have pursued their researches even through the periods of anarchy that apparently, to us at a distance, threatened the very existence of society itself. The most learned and exhaustive work on the native languages of America is said, by competent judges, to have been produced by Don Francisco Pimentel, Conde de Heras, whose "Cuadro Descriptivo y Comparativo de las Linguas Indigenas de Mexico" was commenced, in 1862, by the appearance of Volume I., in a handsome royal 8vo, from a Mexican press. It contains monographs or comparative grammars of twelve of the languages or idioms native to Mexico, as the Aztec, the Othomi, etc. Five of these are entirely new to philology, and have never before been made known to scholars. The general introduction contains a survey of the modern science of languages and its bearing upon American philology, written with an evident familiarity with the best modern sources of information. From the difficulty of collecting materials, the author was unable to specify a definite time for the continuation of the work, but it is now understood that the second volume is in press and will shortly appear.—Of equal importance to the historian is the "Colecion de Documentos para la Historia de Mexico," by Don Joaquin Garcia Icazbalceta, commenced in 1859, and continued in a new volume just published. The collection comprises much valuable unedited matter, including a letter by Hernan Cortez, which was wanting in the series that he sent to the King of Spain descriptive of his successes, and was supposed to have perished; a fac-simile edition of this "Carta Inedita," confined to 70 copies (14 pp.), is being printed in Mexico.—A third volume, comprising the famous "Historia Ecclesiastica Indiana" of Father Gennerio de Mendieto, long regarded as lost, is also in press and will shortly appear.

—John Ruskin has prefixed to the second edition of "Sesame and Lilies" a preface primarily intended to explain his remarks on the English furore for Alpine adventure in connection with the late unfortunate catastrophe on the Matterhorn, but diverging, as is his wont, to a variety of other topics. It contains several eloquent passages in what artists might call his best manner. In words of encouragement for pedestrians of feeble powers, he explains how the true beauty of mountain scenery is most to be enjoyed from below, and is inconsistent with a violation of the sanctities of nature. With a singular disregard of the sanitary conditions now all powerful, he calls the proposed plan for replacing the walls of Florence by boulevards and public walks "an accursed project," and says that one compensation for the disagreeables of advancing life is, that he saw the cities and streams of Switzerland before the former were desecrated by vandal destruction of ancient monuments, and the latter blue as the heavens previous to the defilement of manufactures that now pollute them. The announcement of his new book will be a puzzle to those most familiar with his writings not likely to be unravelled on the appearance of the work itself. It is entitled "Ethics of Dust: Being Ten Lectures to Little Housewives, by John Ruskin, M.A.," and is to be published during the present month.

—Mr. Winwood Reade, the African traveller, whose work was reprinted by Messrs. Harper, gives some curious particulars of the impression made by Dr. Livingstone on the natives and Portuguese settlers, in a notice of his new book, showing how speedily events acquire a mythical coloring among a rude people. He says: "When, some years afterwards, we travelled in that country we heard much of the Englishman who, mounted on an ox, went from sea to sea. We were shown relics of him which had been religiously preserved. He was spoken of by these mulatto planters and officials always with respect, and sometimes with veneration. The name of Livingstone, which they cannot pronounce, will there go down mangled to posterity."

—An agency for the publications of the great French house of MM. Didot et Cie has been opened in New York by F. C. Christern, of 763 Broadway, and F. Leypoldt, 646 Broadway. They keep on hand the elegant editions of French classics and modern authors that have made the names of the publishers current wherever French literature is known, and also supply, on favorable terms, the larger works of MM. Didot, whose catalogue comprises more expensive, valuable, and important books than are produced by any other single establishment in Europe. Many of their enterprises, as the "Bibliotheca Græca" (of which some sixty volumes are already published in royal octavo); "L'Univers Pittoresque," in sixty-five volumes; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale," forty-five volumes; the new edition of Ducange's "Glossary" and of Stephens's "Greek Thesaurus," and others, are more like public than private undertakings, from their magnitude and the expense involved in their production. The house, however, which numbers among its late and present members several persons of the family distinguished in literature, conducts, itself, every branch of industry connected with the manufacture of a book, including paper-making, type-founding, printing, and bookselling, and has become celebrated by its achievements in each department. It has been established more than an hundred years, and offers a specimen of intelligence, enterprise, and capital engaged in "building up" a hereditary business that can take the lead in literary projects of public utility rather than of immediate profit, and with higher aims than those of merely making a fortune, such as the commercial experience of our country has hardly yet seen. M. A. F. Didot, the head of the firm, is a distinguished book collector, and the owner of what is now considered to be the most valuable and costly private library in France. He has shown that he knows how to make use of his books by two small works on the early history of printing and wood engraving that are the best résumés of the subjects ever written, and by the valuable memoirs of the early typographers contributed by him to the "Nouvelle Biographie Générale" published by his house.

—Among the few "large-paper" books produced during the present fantastic passion for copies of that description that are likely to maintain their original price, must be named the large-paper impression of the "Works of Charles Dickens" printed at the Riverside Press, Cambridge. The typographical beauty of the edition is recognized to exceed in a high degree anything that his native country has yielded in honor of its most popular living author; and the illustrations by Darley and Gilbert are of undoubted merit. Still, however, to readers of Dickens who remember how much their ideal conception of Mr. Pickwick, Squeers, Micawber, etc., was assisted by the graphic sketches accompanying the original issue, something seemed wanting, and the refinements of good drawing and steel engraving scarcely replaced the rougher etchings that were associated with the stories in their earliest form. In the large-paper copies above mentioned this want is amply met, for in addition to proof impressions of the plates executed for the edition, they contain a full set of the English etchings by "Phiz," Seymour, Cruikshank, etc., exhibiting the "old familiar faces" of the illustrious Pickwick and his companions, and the long list of characters whose personal acquaintance we owe to the magic of the novelist. The number of these copies is limited to one hundred, at the subscription price of five dollars per volume. It is this edition of Dickens that figured in the law courts of New York last week, owing to an application by Messrs. Sheldon & Co. for redress in a question of literary property connected therewith. It was commenced by Mr. Houghton, of the Riverside Press, on his own account, with other parties whose interests have since merged in his; and not being then engaged in bookselling, a contract was made with Messrs. Sheldon & Co. of Broadway for the sale of the work. When the publishing firm of Hurd & Houghton was formed it became desirable for the original undertakers to resume the control of the work, and on the expiration of the agreement notice was given to Messrs. Sheldon that its provisions would cease. They, however, resist the action of Messrs. Hurd & Houghton, and claim that the agreement was of such a nature that it conferred on them an equitable interest in the publication, in return for the labor, capital, etc., expended in making it known and extending its circulation, and now, as part owners, they ask for a receiver to be appointed and the property to be held subject to their claim for a half share of the profits of the work, which they estimate at thirty thousand dollars. These representations are not admitted by Messrs. Hurd & Houghton, who assert their right to the entire ownership of the series of volumes.

—The edition of Miss Martineau's recent "History of England" undertaken by Messrs. Walker, Fuller & Co., of Boston, will be completed in a few weeks by the publication of Volumes III. and IV. The period covered by them—the last thirty years, 1826–1854—is virtually without a record in any of the standard works prepared for our libraries, and is the portion of history that the best-informed persons will usually be found most deficient in the knowledge of. The latter portion is entirely original, being prepared by Miss Martineau expressly for this edition, and forming a continuation of the main work first published, in connection with Charles Knight, as "The History of the Thirty Years' Peace." In a letter to the publishers, Miss Martineau states positively that this will be her last literary work, as owing to advanced age and failing health she will not engage in any other undertaking. She expresses herself highly gratified with the sympathy her labors have excited in this country, and earnestly desires to see the completion of this history in print while yet she is able to enjoy its appearance. The other historical work published by Messrs. Walker, Fuller & Co., Henri Martin's "History of France," translated by Miss Booth, is also proceeding favorably—two new volumes will speedily be issued of it.

—The Historical Society of Long Island, an institution of recent formation, but already firmly planted, and munificently endowed by the liberality of its members, has in view, besides the collection of a library and museum which already rank among the first collections in the State, the preparation of a History of Long Island, on a scale commensurate with the importance of the district and the richness of materials, arising from its early occupation by European settlers. It is remarkable that every book heretofore published relating to the civil, ecclesiastical, political, or natural history of the island, amounting, probably, to more than one hundred distinct publications, is "out of print," and few of them can be procured at any price. Some of the rarest tracts of the kind are being reproduced—in limited numbers—in elegant style, by a private printing association—"The Furman Club"—so named from the late Gabriel Furman, whose "Notes on Brooklyn" was one of the earliest topographical essays connected with the island. A sub-section of the Historical Publishing Committee is charged with the natural history of the region, and great progress has been made in the preparations of monographs on each division, as zoology, botany, and geology, by gentlemen each most competent by previous study to do justice to their special departments. The contemplated complete exhibition of the fauna and flora, mineral productions, etc., of the island, will form a branch of the museum such as few or no States can boast of. It testifies to the increased interest in the study of nature that advancing cultivation and refinement are exciting in all parts of the United States.

—Undeterred by the alarming increase in the cost of manufacture and the pressure of taxation, our publishers find the rewards of business generally proportioned to the outlay expended, and thus oftentimes large and expensive works, requiring a series of years and the employment of various collaborateurs for their completion, are beginning to be found more remunerative than the same amount employed in works of a more ephemeral character. A generous confidence in the public is very apt to meet a due return, particularly in a community like this, where the performance of the coming year is almost certain to exceed the promise of the past and present ones. Messrs. Harper Brothers have long had in preparation a work that must be based upon some such considerations, as more than fifty thousand dollars will be laid out on it before any return is realized. It is an Encyclopædia of Biblical Knowledge, Theology, Ecclesiastical History, and Biography, and the kindred sciences, included under one alphabetical arrangement, wider in its scope than any previous work, and equally thorough in its treatment. The whole of Smith's "Dictionary of the Bible," or at least such parts as are regarded as not susceptible of improvement, will be incorporated in it. This work, indeed, and Kitto's "Biblical Cyclopædia," as improved in the recent edition by Dr. Lindsay Alexander, will form the basis of the Biblical portion of the work. In the division of ecclesiastical history, antiquities, biography, etc., there is no work in the English language that affords similar help to those just mentioned, and a greater degree of originality is required. The work is proceeding under the joint co-operation of two editors, Dr. Strong and Dr. J. M'Clintock, both of the Methodist Church, who have devoted many years to the execution of the plan. It was originally intended to be comprised in one volume, but such is the natural growth of a subject proportioned to the attention bestowed upon it, that probably four large and closely printed imperial octavos will be found necessary. A considerable portion of the work is stereotyped, and the remainder is rapidly proceeding to completion.

—American history owes much to the labors of the late Col. W. L. Stone, whose "Life of Brant," "Biography of Sir William Johnson" (completed and published by his son), etc., first showed our State how rich a mine of historical materials lay at its doors. His "Life of Red Jacket," being printed originally in only a small edition, has become very scarce. Proposals for the republication of a limited edition have been issued by J. Munsell, of Albany, who will issue it in superior style, with a fine portrait of the author after Page. Twenty-five copies will be printed in 4to.

EUGÉNIE DE GUÉRIN.*

If Mademoiselle de Guérin, transcribing from the fulness of her affection and her piety her daily record of one of the quietest lives that ever was led by one who had not formally renounced the world, could have foreseen that within a few years after her death, her love, her piety, her character, her daily habits, her household cares, her inmost and freest thoughts, were to be weighed and measured by half the literary critics of Europe and America, she would, doubtless, have found in this fact a miracle more wonderful than any of those to which, in the lives of her favorite saints, she accorded so gracious a belief. The history of a man or woman of genius prolongs itself after death; and one of the most pleasing facts with regard to that of Mlle. de Guérin is that it was her fate to know nothing of her fame. One of the most unselfish of women, she was spared the experience of that publicity which was the inevitable result of her talents. Genius is not a private fact; sooner or later, in the nature of things, it becomes common property. Mlle. de Guérin pays from her present eminence the penalty of her admirable faculties. If there be in the seclusion, the modesty, the cheerful obscurity and humility of her life, an essential incongruity with the broad light of actual criticism, we may console ourselves with the reflection that, in so far as it might, fortune has dealt with her in her own spirit. It has respected her noble unconsciousness. Her life and her fame stand apart. Between her own enjoyment of the work and the world's enjoyment of it intervenes that fact of her death which completes the one and excuses the other.

Our own excuse for speaking of Mlle. de Guérin at this somewhat late day lies in the recent issue of an English translation of her journal. This translation is apparently as good as it was likely to be. In the matter of style, it is our opinion that Mlle. de Guérin loses as much by translation as her great countrywoman, Mme. de Sévigné; and as it is for her style especially that we personally value Mlle. de Guérin, we cannot but think that an English version of her feelings would fail, in a very important particular, to represent her—her journal being, indeed, nothing more than a tissue of feelings, woven as simply, as easily, as closely, as rapidly, with the same interrupted continuity, as a piece of fireside knitting-work. It is probable, nevertheless, that the book will prove acceptable from its character of piety; and for those who are not acquainted with the original, it may even, through the translator's faithful sympathy, possess a certain literary charm.

Mlle. de Guérin's journal begins in 1834, when she was twenty-nine years of age, and ceases in 1840. It was strictly a series of daily letters addressed to her brother Maurice, and consigned to a number of blank-books, which he read when each was filled. It may be divided into two parts: the first, covering less than five years, extending to the death of Maurice de Guérin; and the second, covering a year and a half, extending from this event to what we may almost call the real death of Mlle. de Guérin herself—that is, the cessation of that practice of daily communion with her brother which had so long absorbed her most lively energies. She actually survived her brother nine years, a period of which she has left us only that beginning of a record formed by those few pages of her journal which she has inscribed to his departed soul. Her admirers will hardly regret the absence of a more extended chronicle of these weary years. Mlle. de Guérin's thoughts had always been half for heaven and half for Maurice. When Maurice died they reverted, by a pious compromise, to heaven alone, and assumed an almost painful monotony.

The chief figure in Mlle. de Guérin's life, accordingly, is not her own, but that of her brother. He, too, has become famous; he, too, had his genius. The sisterly devotion expressed and implied in every line of Mlle. de Guérin's writing needs, indeed, no such fact as this to explain it. She was nothing of a critic; and for the readers of the journal alone, the simple presumption that Maurice de Guérin was a lovable man is sufficient to account for his supremacy in the life of a woman who lived exclusively in her natural affections. For her, then, he was simply the dearest of her brothers; for us, if we had the space, he would be a most interesting object of study. But we can spare him but a few words. He was by several years Eugénie's junior. Sent to school at a distance at an early age, and compelled subsequently to earn his living in Paris by teaching and writing, his life was passed in comparative solitude, and his relations with his family maintained by letters. His first plan had been to enter the church, and with this view he had attached himself to a small community of theological students organized and governed by Lamennais. The dispersion of this community, however, arrested and diverted his ecclesiastical aspirations; and if he never thoroughly abandoned himself to the world as it stands opposed to the church, his habitual seclusion and temperance are marked by a strictly secular tone. After several years of Paris drudgery, he contracted a marriage with a young girl of some fortune. He died at the age of twenty-eight. To ourselves, Maurice de Guérin is a more interesting person than his sister. We cannot, indeed, help regarding the collection recently made of his letters and literary remains as a most valuable contribution to our knowledge of the human mind. What he would have accomplished if time had been more generous towards him, it is difficult to say; but as it is, little can be claimed for him on the ground of his positive achievements. To say that he is chiefly interesting as a phenomenon seems but a cold way of looking at one who, in all that we know of his character, inspires us with the most tender affection; and yet so it is that we are tempted to speak of Maurice de Guérin. So it is that we are led to look at every man who is deficient in will. This was the case with Guérin. His letters, his diary, his verses, are one long record of moral impotency. He was one of the saddest of men. That he had genius, we think his little prose-poem, entitled "The Centaur," conclusively proves; not a splendid, a far-reaching genius, but nevertheless a source of inspiration which was all his own. His sensibility, his perceptions, were of the deepest. He put imagination into everything that he said or wrote. He has left descriptions of nature which have probably never been excelled, because, probably, nature has never been more delicately perceived. And yet we may be sure that for posterity he will live rather in his sister than in himself. For he is essentially an imperfect figure; and what the present asks of the past is before all things completeness. A man is only remembered beyond his own generation by his results; and the most that Guérin has left us is a heritage of processes. If he had lived and grown great, we should assuredly be delighted to peruse the record of his moral and religious tâtonnements. But as his whole life was but a fragment, his fragmentary efforts lack that character of unity which is essential to whomsoever, in morals or in letters, is destined to become anything of a classic. Maurice de Guérin's only unity is in his sister.

* "The Journal of Eugénie de Guérin." By G. S. Trébutien. London: Simpkin & Marshall. 1865.

The singular unity of her own genius, indeed, is such as almost to qualify her for this distinction. As her brother was all complexity, she was all simplicity. As he was all doubt, she was all faith. It seems to us that we shall place Mlle. de Guérin on her proper footing, and obviate much possible misconception, if we say that hers was an essentially finite nature. We just now mentioned Mme. de Sévigné. The great charm of Mme. de Sévigné's style is her perfect ability to say whatever she pleases. But as she was chiefly an observer of fashionable society, she was not often tempted to utter very composite truths. Now, Mlle. de Guérin, perpetually engaged in the contemplation of the Divine goodness, finds the right word and the right phrase with the same delightful ease as her great predecessor. With her, as with Mme. de Sévigné, style was a natural gift. Many of the causes of this perfection are doubtless identical in both cases. Both Mme. de Sévigné and Mlle. de Guérin were women of taste and of tact, who, under these conditions, wrote from the heart. They wrote freely and familiarly, without any pre-occupation whatever. They were both women of birth, both ladies, as we say now-a-days. To both of them there clings an air of purely natural distinction, of implicit subordination to the fact of race, a silent sense of responsibility to the past, which goes far to explain the positive character of their style. When we add to this that in both of them the imaginative faculty was singularly limited, we shall have indicated those features which they possessed in common, and shall have helped to confirm our assertion of the finite quality of Mlle. de Guérin's mind. It was not that she was without imagination; on the contrary, she unmistakably possessed it; but she possessed it in very small measure. Religion without imagination is piety; and such is Mlle. de Guérin's religion. Her journal, taken as a whole, seems to us to express a profound contentment. She was, indeed, in a certain sense, impatient of life, but with no stronger impatience than such as the church was able to allay. She had, of course, her moments of discouragement; but, on the whole, she found it easy to believe, and she was too implicit a believer to be unhappy. Her peculiar merit is that, without exaltation, enthusiasm, or ecstacy, quietly, steadily, and naturally, she entertained the idea of the Divine goodness. The truth is that she was strong. She was a woman of character. Thoroughly dependent on the church, she was independent of everything else.

THE REV. FREDERICK W. ROBERTSON.*

No book has been more eagerly anticipated, during the last two years, by that large public which has digested his sermons and been quickened and inspired by his teaching, than the "Life and Letters of Robertson." There is always an intense desire, not a morbid curiosity, but the thirst of sympathy, to know the very pith and marrow of the lives of those who have been leaders in any department of thought, and Robertson's position as a representative man in the English Church is such that this desire to know if the reality of his life corresponded with the ideal he has raised in our own minds has only burned more intensely as the sermons made us better acquainted with the man. It can be said with entire truth, that the book confirms this ideal; it even exalts it; for Robertson's very weaknesses do not impair our reverence for the man. The biography at once takes rank with Stanley's Life of Arnold (whom Robertson resembled in many points, in his daring, his religious experience and position, his power of analysis, his intuitive grasp), as perhaps the best exposition of the inward and outward life of one in whom all the complex religious and social questions which vex this age were matters of personal experiences which has yet been given to the world; and could Robertson himself now read the wonderfully lucid sketch which Mr. Brooke has given, we believe he would not be displeased, since it contains those very elements which he so much admired in the life of Arnold. The biographer's labors are happily lightened, as in the case of Arnold, by the abundant materials which Robertson left, but these have been so carefully used, that the light and shade of every period of his life are always given, and we can recall no page which contains anything which the most ardent friend of Robertson could wish unsaid. Mr. Brooke magnifies his subject with the hand of a master, by faithfully and accurately setting it before you; while he admires Robertson, he can see his faults, and he only obtrudes his own comments when they are indispensably necessary to the order of the narrative.

What gives special and fascinating interest to these volumes is their intimate relation to the most vital religious and social questions of the day. Robertson, with his singular gifts of a sensitive imagination and brilliant, incisive reason, would have been a marked man in any age; such men always flash sunshine; but it was given to him, in common with Sterling and Tennyson and Kingsley and Carlyle, to work his own way through the questions of modern doubt; and because he did this, and came out into the clear, bold sunshine of an intelligent faith, which gave him power to interpret every subject from the point of view he had won, he found himself specially en rapport with the younger minds of his day, and his writings have constantly exercised a healing influence since his death. Here his position is representative; here is the strength of his rapidly growing power. It is not too much to say that in this country he has moulded the young divines of this generation. His sermons have opened new veins of thought and feeling; his method has been widely adopted; and the fresh intellectual inspiration of his extemporaneous efforts in Trinity Chapel, Brighton, has flowed into the hearts of thousands. His individuality, which was a gradual development, has turned all eyes to him. As Mr. Brooke remarks (Vol. II., p. 249): "He has shown that a well-marked individuality is possible in the English Church." And this individuality, the longing for which Mr. Brooke aptly calls "one of the strongest impulses which have given rise to the present theological struggle," Robertson used with just that wise conservatism and truthfulness to self which make his example so beautifully attractive and stimulating. Seeing, as we d now, into the very core of his opinions, and how they were shaped by outward events, his independence and loneliness amid struggle and his silent victory in death are thrilling beyond expression. He was among the first of the English clergy to apply boldly his Christianity to the social and religious condition of England's working-men; and, though his schemes ultimately failed, he may be called the parent of those movements which are now so numerous in England and in this country to bring the living forces and traditions of the Episcopal Church into vital sympathy with the masses. In the twenty years since he identified himself—first at Oxford, and next and last at Brighton—with social questions, no body of Christians has so rapidly applied Christianity to their solution and the regeneration of society; and we know from our own observation that his lectures and addresses have done much to inspire this movement here.

His other work was theological; and this may be best presented by such a slight sketch as we can give of his life. He was born in London, February 3, 1816. He owed much in his earlier years to the careful education and watchfulness of his parents, but, being much above his growth, was silent and imaginative. In boyhood, he describes himself as "iron in strength, broad and stout." He excelled in athletic games, but had great fondness for reading. He was never known to tell a lie, and was sensitively alive to propriety. He early displayed a practical turn of mind, which preserved him from the vices of a too excitable imagination, and his earliest passion was to engage at a suitable age in the profession of his father, a military life. This was opposed to the wishes of his parents, who desired to have him prepare for holy orders. To this he reluctantly yielded in 1837, and was matriculated at Brazenose College, Oxford. He entered the university holding strongly what were then called Evangelical views, but at a time when the Tractarian party was rising rapidly into notice. He at once felt deeply the influence of Dr. Newman, and the story of his struggle to escape from the vortex of Puseyism is as fascinating as Newman's "Apologia." This he did escape, but his strong interest in the varieties of religious opinion centred there, and the many-sided activity of his imagination drew him beyond the proper studies of the place. His mind was vexed with religious questions, and his discipline, save as gained in conquering doubt, was largely thrown away. Plato fascinated him, and Shelley and Coleridge first, and later, Wordsworth, captivated his imagination. In these studies and thoughts he passed, like De Quincey, a silent, self-contained, progressive life. Of himself he wrote, in 1846, when a great change passed over him, as "a man who had read theological and philosophical controversy, long before, with painful interest; a man who, at different times, has lived in the atmosphere of thought in which Jonathan Edwards, Plato, Lucretius, Thomas Brown, Carlyle, Emerson, and Fichte lived; who has steeped his soul and memory in Byron's strong feelings; who has walked with Newman years ago to the brink of an awful precipice, and chosen rather to look upon it calmly, and know the worst of the secrets of the darkness, than recoil, with Newman, in fear and tenderness, back to the infallibility of Rome."

* "Life and Letters of Frederick W. Robertson, M.A. Edited by Stopford A. Brooke." In two volumes 12mo, pp. 352, 359. Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1865.

This passage is the key to his life at this period, but in this very gestation of religious opinion were forged the weapons of his success in dealing with the perplexed doubts peculiar to our time. He first explored the whole ground in the stillness of his own mind and heart. But when first ordained, he concealed this hot-bed of religious feeling beneath the evangelical views in which he had been brought up; and these views bound him so closely that little of his later individuality was then seen. He was, however, a marked man in the pulpit from the first. A weakly religious sentimentalism now possessed him, and his letters abound in the hollow echoes of pietism. He tried to live after the rule of Thomas à Kempis. He was harassed by the idea that his sermons were not intelligible to the educated. He was oppressed by his ideal of excellence, as set forth in the success of his friends, and his morbid piety added to the keenness of his pain. But his reading was rapidly carrying him clear of this state. "I have gained good and energy from that book," he says, in speaking of Carlyle's "Past and Present." Tennyson was at this time constantly in his hands, and Dante he read daily. He now began the plan of reading carefully on the questions of the day, and this was his constant practice ever after; and at this stage in his development his thoughts were turned, as always indeed, but now specially, to methods for relieving the poor. In 1843 he wrote, "I stand nearly alone, a theological Ishmael. The Tractarians despise me, and the Evangelicals somewhat loudly express their doubts of me." In intervals he was now reading German metaphysics. His mind was growing rapidly. He was nearing the turning-point of his life. That individuality which was the spring of his genius demanded recognition. "An outward blow"—says his biographer—"the sudden ruin of a friendship which he had wrought, as he imagined, for ever, into his being—a blow from which he never afterwards wholly recovered—accelerated the inward crisis, and the result was a period of spiritual agony so awful that it not only shook his health to its centre, but smote his spirit down into so profound a darkness that of all his early faiths but one remained: 'It must be right to do right.'"

From this experience dated his new birth of religious thought and feeling. Out of this came ultimately the principles which he taught, best given in his own words: "First, the establishment of positive truth, instead of the negative destruction of error. Secondly, that truth is made up of two opposite proportions, and not found in a via media between the two. Thirdly, that spiritual truth is discerned by the spirit, instead of intellectually in propositions; and, therefore, truth should be taught suggestively, not dogmatically. Fourthly, that belief in the human character of Christ's humanity must be antecedent to belief in his divine origin. Fifthly, that Christianity, as its teachers should, works from the inward to the outward, and not vice versa. Sixthly, the soul of goodness in things evil." In addition to this, as he worked out his problems for himself, and hence they are very valuable, his opinions on baptism, the atonement, inspiration, and the Sabbath were somewhat peculiar. Though we have no space here to examine these, we think the violence of his reaction from the Evangelical school, and the stout opposition which he received in Brighton, led him into statements which a more equable experience would have cancelled. These opinions have led many already, who cannot see or feel the sensitive spirit beneath the letter of a thought or opinion, to turn aside from him. This revelation of his life, showing how he fought his way through the deepest scepticism into truth, and his most rapturous and vivid embodiment of the great truth of the incarnation in all his teaching, must do much towards reconciling his opinions to the narrowest class of theologians; while the very earnestness with which he grasped at truth, and fought for it in his long incumbency at Brighton, and died for it there, will inspire and thrill and guide thousands who have got, in this age of the changes in received opinion, to walk through fire and blood and death to the light. As a guide to these, as the interpreter of the true way to these, Robertson's teachings, however much we may differ as to the bearing of his theology, have incomparable value. They convince the reason; they guide the heart. Some of the brightest minds of the present day, not only among the clergy, but outside their ranks in every walk in life, will find their own secret experience here mirrored in thoughts that breathe and words that burn. The clear teaching of the sermons can now be interpreted by the struggles, and these were often morbid under preying disease, which wrung Robertson's heart.

Robertson first began to develop himself in a small curacy in Oxford, where he at once attracted the undergraduates of the university, and thence he was transferred to Brighton, where, till the end, his heart and his brain were in unceasing activity. His religion, his sermons, were first lived in his own experience, and then he taught; and he had the inspiration of an apostle, because he knew and felt. Touching, in these volumes, is his isolation from sympathy, his vivid life of high spiritual aspiration and thought, his humility in labors among the poor, his contempt for the world, his lonely walking with the Great Teacher. We know not where to find the memoir of any clergyman which shows such purity and power and love. Robert Sinckling was no more devoted as a parish priest; Robert Vaughan was not more brilliant or successful in carrying on literary cultivation with constant preaching; George Herbert showed no sweeter or gentler resignation. To us, though we write with the glow of fresh and strong impressions, no biography since the publication of Stanley's "Life of Arnold" has been issued from the press so well adapted to sink into the thoughful minds of younger men, and mould their opinions, and to raise the tone of the Christian ministry to a higher standard, as the "Life and Letters of Robertson."

Considered simply as literary productions, with the author's name unknown, these letters would attract attention as the productions of a singularly gifted mind. As the revelation of the inward workings of Robertson's mind, even when they are morbid, as many are in the second volume, and as connected with the highest subjects of human thought, whether literary, social, or theological, they are veined with the results of a mind which threw light upon every topic within its grasp. He names ideas; he interprets thought; and, even in his hurried letters, he is always logical and accurate. These letters, even more than Arnold's, are a treasury of the chief ideas of our time. They are to be digested as Robertson himself read, and advised others to read, only a few pages at a time; and so read, we know not where to find their equal for suggestive power. Dying in the early prime of his development, at thirty-seven, his writings have the dew of youth upon them, combined with the ripeness of age. There is little that is immature; but all is fresh. And yet, while no reader can carefully study these volumes with his sermons (and only prolonged attention can unfold completely their very great merits), the total impression of the work is sad—not morbid, but sad. This is partly owing to the incessant struggle which the biography reveals, partly to the undertone of Robertson's own life, partly to the solemn and deep utterances with which its pages are filled. But not the sadness of despair, rather the sadness which weds itself mysteriously with all highest life.

The portrait of Robertson given in the first volume, a face so lighted with thought, so finely and clearly cut, so expressive of tenderness and insight, and said to be hardly adequate too, because the play of emotion and thought is gone, will attract every one. It has the highest beauty. It comes up to our ideal.

We regret to say that these volumes, so appreciatively edited, and prefaced with excellent tables of contents, have no index. They need one more than any book we have ever read, because they are so full of ideas and opinions to which every reader will often wish to refer; and for this reason, too, the index should be very careful and minute.

ILLUSTRATED HOLIDAY BOOKS.

TENNYSON, with illustrations, is abundantly furnished to an appreciative public this winter. For last Christmas there were, new, only the two editions of "Enoch Arden." One of those, our readers will remember, if they have not forgotten things so ephemeral as last year's gift-books, was published by Ticknor & Fields, with variorum illustrations; the other, with pictures by Hammatt Billings, was, unhandsomely and in violation of a good and well-established custom, issued by Messrs. Tilton & Co. There has recently been issued, with the imprint of the same publishing house, what purports to be and seems to be "Tennyson's Poems," complete in one volume, also illustrated by Mr. Billings. We know of no reason this year, and after a second objectionable action on the part of Messrs. Tilton & Co., for reversing the verdict of book-publishers and the book-loving public last year on the publication of "Enoch Arden." Criticism of the book is, however, quite independent of the propriety of making the book at all. We find a good and convenient edition of Tennyson, presenting the poems in the order, or nearly in the order, of their original publication, clearly and well printed, and compressed into a single volume, not too large, of 648 pages. We think this by far the best one-volume edition of Tennyson we have seen, sincerely as we regret its appearance and its existence, and heartily as we wish ill success to the enterprise.

Good as the volume is, however, it might have been made more compact by the omission of the pictures. We are of opinion that, considered as an edition of Tennyson, it would have been better without them, and that the world could have borne the deprivation of one gift-book. In wishing the illustrations away we make no charge of unusual worthlessness. There are very few of the poems which our publishers decorate with pictures which are not "obscured," as Lowell has said, by their "illustrations." When a book shall appear with illustrations worthy of the name, if we can, we shall give it due honor, but under the head of Fine Arts. Most of the pictures in this year's books would be too favorably "noticed" for just discrimination by being put under Fine Arts at all.

There is something in the printing of wood-cuts that puzzles our workmen. The Riverside Press of H. O. Houghton & Co. stands next, we presume, to the unrivalled University Press of Welch, Bigelow & Co., and their book-work is well done in this case as it always is, all but the wood-cuts. These are unequal; some are printed tolerably well, in the copy before us, but others execrably. But we see other wood-cuts as badly printed as these, where better designs are injured by the imperfect work.

Comparing Mr. Billings with himself, we find two or three of his designs which are better than the run, less mannered than most of his work, and looking more as if he wished to work out a thought and less as if he wished to make a little picture which would "do." Such an one, we think—though many will be surprised at our saying so, the picture is so unpleasing—is the illustration to the "Palace of Art," on p. 65,

> "Or the maid-mother by a crucifix," etc.

Such, also, are "The Letters," on page 432, and "Geraint and Enid," on page 475. Mr. Billings has also discovered some very little-known facts in relation to mediæval costume: his knights carry shields large enough to protect them, and support these on their left arms in nearly the actual way, and his ladies are not all restricted to the close-bodied gowns in which he and other artists have usually clad their "ideal" women.

Messrs. Ticknor & Co. give us three new illustrated Tennyson books: "Idyls of the King," "Gems from Tennyson," and the illustrated Farringford edition of the complete poems. The pictures in the "Idyls" are exceedingly bad. It is hard to find one spark of meaning or life among all the thirty-one. But perhaps there is a little flash of reality in the tail-piece to "Enid," where the travellers on their way to Devon are being ferried across a broad river in flat-boats, and we have all seen worse landscape in wood engraving than that on page 164. These two are Mr. Colman's designs; but nearly all the pictures in the book are designed by Mr. Eytinge, and, looking carefully through these to find the best of them, we think it is the head-piece of "Elaine," Elaine herself reading the shield; and the only other piece of Mr. Eytinge's work here that we care ever to see again is the single figure of the garrulous little novice in the head-piece of "Guinevere."

The "Gems" are selected poems with pictures, but both poems and pictures are all (we think) contained in the illustrated Farringford edition, to which we turn for an opportunity to judge a large number of designs together, since there are, the title-page says, sixty-four illustrations in these or this two-volumes-in-one.

The Farringford edition, as published last summer in two volumes, was handy and of convenient size, finely printed, and marred only by the disarrangement of the poems—"Enoch Arden" being put after the "Princess" to fill out the first volume. We have now a reprint from the same plates on larger paper, and with the sixty-four full-page illustrations bound in. It makes a very clumsy volume, and affords another instance of illustrations which are much in the way and an annoyance. They are not beautiful. Many of them are very badly printed, unless it is all the wood-cutters' fault, and they have left their blocks "lowered," as the phrase is, in the wrong way for the style of printing that was afterwards adopted. The books were made up so hastily that nearly all the cuts have printed off sharp and distinct impressions of themselves on the tissue paper; at least all the copies of the book that we have seen are so disfigured; and the copy from which we describe, which was the best among a dozen, is spoiled as a seemly book by this carelessness.

As regards the merits of the designs, before specifying any we must classify them. This the book does not help us to do, for there is no list of illustrations at all—a most extraordinary omission, betraying the publishers' conviction that every buyer or recipient of one of these volumes will have all the pictures in other previously published books, and will know all about them. But we have taken the pains to make out a catalogue raisonnée of the whole, and with the following result: Fourteen plates are taken from the quarto edition of "Tennyson's Poems," published by Moxon, in 1859, probably the best of these "gift-books" that has ever been published. Two or three of those that we have always thought the best in that book are omitted, and there is only one of the splendid designs by Rossetti given; but we have the two wretchedly theatrical illustrations by Maclise, of "Morte d'Arthur." All are fac-similed out of their delicacy and sharpness; they were inadequate enough in workmanship in the first instance, and now the second-hand rendering is worse and uglier. Next, of the illustrations to "Enoch Arden," which were noticed at length in THE NATION, No. 5, eight are given with that poem in this book. Then there are those, or a part of those, which we have already noticed as illustrating "The Idyls of the King;" and, finally, a large number that we can only call miscellaneous, of which some are of, to us, unknown authorship; and of all, known or unknown, but few are of any importance.

Mr. Hennessy gives us four illustrations to "Locksley Hall," one of which, at least, is of real interest, and one to "The Princess,"

> "In looking on the happy autumn fields
> And thinking of the days that are no more;"

which last is not, indeed, much of an illustration of the text, but is a pretty picture, and seems to be a good portrait of a lady. We find no Hennessy in the second volume; but there is a picture of "The Charge of the Six Hundred," by Mr. Homer, spirited enough but very inadequate, and suggesting the question, Did the Light Brigade charge in such loose order? There is also a landscape by William Hart (or so we translate W. H.), which we think the best landscape-cut in the book; and the last cut is the illustration to "The Grandmother's Apology," reduced from the drawing by Millais in the first volume of "Once a Week," and spoiled. There is little else to say except to notice the ugly and meaningless little figures on the reverse of each of the many title-pages, of which that one is the worst which is on the back of the title-page to "Maud," representing, with a grace and good taste which, we hope, is peculiar to the designer, a purse (in a grocer's scales) poised against and weighing down a smoking heart. This disgusting incident is the last we care to notice in reviewing one of the most unsatisfactory books of the year.

Longfellow's "Tales of a Wayside Inn," with illustrations by John Gilbert, is better than any of the books we have mentioned, because containing only a few cuts, and these few (all but one) of a certain order of merit. It would be well if American designers would learn how to treat American subjects by seeing how this Englishman has managed "Paul Revere's Ride." There are a plenty of better designs by Gilbert than these, but he rarely touches anything without giving it interest, and these, in common with all his work, are executed in a manly, broad-shouldered sort of way, which has our sympathy, and, when it is not too mannered, our admiration.

Messrs. Ticknor & Fields publish, also (probably "by arrangement with the English publishers"), "The Recreations of a Country Parson," with illustrations by Robert T. Pritchett. It is a curious book to choose for pictorial illustration, because one would hardly have thought it very suggestive of artistic design, or very stimulating to an artist's mind. But, on the other hand, how very much it needs whatever help an artist can give it! It is a dreary book, and Mr. Pritchett is to be pitied. Think of having to read it all through, looking for passages suggestive of pictures! Well, it is, perhaps, the best illustrated book of the year. The pictures seem to grow naturally out of the text, and really help it. And then Mr. Pritchett has known where to stop, and has stopped there—at least, in many of the cuts. It is a pleasure to get little landscapes, given as far as the essential lines—firm and black—can give them, and the sky left white, not constructed in a mechanical way by straight horizontal lines ruled close together. The first cut in the book—the little one at the tail of the table of contents—is a good example. The church and manse are both tumbling over, and we do not endorse that sort of search after gracefulness, but otherwise it is a good little picture of a bit of a Scotch village. When we are not ready to put forth our whole strength, make the best design we can, and the most minute and careful drawing, and then see it engraved perfectly; when we are not prepared to go to work in that thorough way, let us make simple sketches in a few positive lines, which careless wood-engravers cannot spoil. Mr. Pritchett's designs are very unequal in merit, and very different from one another in style. The picture of Abbotsford, on page 329, is nearly as poor as an illustration can be; the next one, "Sketching," on page 343, is very inadequate, and, indeed, wretchedly drawn; and the figure of Miss Limejuice, on page 396, a flat imitation of Punch, though the background is pleasant. But then "Arundel," on page 184, is an uncommonly good landscape for a modern wood-cut in a book; there are grains of truth in the Swiss houses in "Alpine Snow," page 151, which none but sketchers in Switzerland would detect; "Putting the Stone" is a very happy illustration of the commonplace lecture it follows; the counsellor's head, on page 51, has a great deal of character in it. In short, we would say to our reader, Do n't buy the prose Tupper's dull volume at all; but if you must, then get this edition of it, and the pictures will help you along. We offer no further criticism on the artistic merit of these slight scribbles, but we shall look at any work of Mr. Pritchett's we shall meet with hereafter, in hopes of finding something in it.

Messrs. Bunce & Huntington publish "Festival of Song; a Series of Evenings with the Poets," prepared by the author of "Salad for the Solitary," and illustrated by seventy-three pictures by members of the National Academy of Design. This is a book of a class that could not exist but for the custom of giving Christmas presents. Imagine buying a book which treats of one hundred and seventy-eight poets, gives something about some of their lives, criticism (generally laudatory) of their works, and copious quotations, and all within the compass of a moderate-sized quarto! It seems to us, indeed, almost an assumption of one's intellectual inferiority to give one such a book as a present. Miss Mitford's "Recollections of a Literary Life," Chas. Knight's "Half Hours with the Best Authors," and Dana's "Household Book of Poetry," are classical works of profound intellectuality in comparison with this. Not that Mr. Saunders (if that is indeed the name, as the papers say, of the author of "Salad for the Solitary" and compiler of this book) betrays any inferiority in his work. He seems to be familiar with English literature, and his selections are good; but he has put himself to poor work.

The Academicians have, on the whole, done their work well. Too much of it has been entrusted to one of the weakest of their body, Mr. Alfred Fredericks, A., who has furnished fourteen of the designs. From this artist's work as exhibited on the Academy walls we have not learned to expect much, and his illustrations in this book give us no new idea of his power. Mr. S. Colman, whose conventional castles, studied from Windsor, are to be found in the edition of the "Idyls of the King" of which we have spoken, has some more of the same quality in this. Four pictures are signed by him, all of which seem to us very uninteresting and without individual character. Mr. J. A. Hows, whose work is often met with in the wood-cuts adorning gift-books, has three wood-cuts here, none of them, to our thinking, of any value. But Mr. James Hart supplies three landscapes, Mr. Kensett one, Mr. Suydam one, Mr. Church one, Mr. Brevoort one; all of which we deem better than most of the landscape wood-cuts of the same character in English books, even of considerable pretension. Mr. Homer has a brave sketch; Mr. Hennessy has three drawings, one of them admirable, that on page 297; and Mr. H. P. Gray supplies a little figure, "Joyousness," which compares favorably, to say the least, with his pictures usually exhibited. We could wish for many improvements—could welcome a franker use of the medium of wood-cutting, and less effort to give the look of plate engraving—could enjoy fewer lines, and all to the purpose; but, having expected no such results in a gift-book illustrated by popular artists and in New York, are not disagreeably disappointed in this.

Messrs. Hurd & Houghton publish (in connection with the London publishers, Sampson Low, Son & Marston), "Pictures of Society, Grave and Gay," a collection of nearly an hundred full-page wood-cuts from the volumes of "London Society," an illustrated and ultra popular English monthly. The book is, of course, wholly English, and is not among the best of English illustrated books, because containing too large a proportion of feeble, fashion-plate-looking pictures de société.

"Songs of Seven," by Jean Ingelow, comes from Roberts Brothers. It is half an English book, like the last; half an American book, like others which Mr. Hammatt Billings has illustrated. In either capacity it requires no especial mention.

We have very little space left in which to treat of the new "illuminated" books, published by several leading houses. This is not matter of especial regret, because none of those that we have seen are of even the least artistic value; and all are so unattractive that people who look inside of books with any care, before buying, will be pretty sure to leave these unbought. We have tried to see and examine all the books of this class that have been published in America this year, and we find a family likeness among them. The designs are in all cases very poor, with just enough of the flavor of mediæval illumination about them to be a parody of it, and annoy those who love it. And the execution, though showing a certain effort on the part of our lithographers to do color work as well as they can, is very unsatisfactory. We shall be glad to speak at length of any work that may show signs of any improvement in these respects.

LEIGH HUNT'S SEER.*

This very handsome and convenient American reprint of Leigh Hunt's "Seer" is a new evidence of the permanent favor this species of writing finds among general readers. Some periodical analogous in character, however diverse in execution, to the "Spectator," has almost constantly appeared in Great Britain since that pleasant and prosperous experiment established the familiar essay as a phase of our domestic literature. A vein of curious and refined speculation on some of the details of human experience and minor phenomena of life, studies of character, graces of local description, and acute comments on manners and letters, are, indeed, prevalent traits of modern Continental writing—though oftener in an episodical form than as direct, complete, and brief treatises; but that peculiar blending of geniality in the tone with intelligence, humor, and rectitude, more or less vivified by individuality, quaintness, or picturesque style, which has made this department of authorship at once so prolific and so attractive in our vernacular, are eminently Anglo-Saxon qualities. They spring as much from the domestic as the literary habitudes of the race; they presuppose a certain rational taste as to pastime, and an average culture which renders such "household words" acceptable to young and old. People who live in the senses and out-of-doors would scarcely brood with such relish over the minutiæ of experience, or take such obvious pleasure in familiar censorship; neither would the zest of intellectual appetite make palatable such thoughtful and often subtle criticism and consciousness as the choicest of the essayists, such as Lamb, De Quincey, and Hazlitt, evolve and illustrate. Home life, with habits of reading and intellectual talk, foster the taste and talent for this kind of writing quite as much as private study and personal observation; and, in the last analysis, climate, social life, and family culture, such as obtain in Britain and America, will be found to encourage and confirm the love of and skill in essay writing.

The most popular novelist of the day finds it desirable to contribute "all the year round" to this familiar and pleasant stream of taste and teaching; the "Indicator" and "Seer" of Leigh Hunt are excellent specimens of the kind of colloquial speculation, narrative, and criticism which the mass of English readers enjoy and improve by. Without the subtle insight of Hazlitt, the comprehensive knowledge of De Quincey, or the rich and delicate humor of Lamb, Hunt had that love of beauty, sense of enjoyment, and sympathy with the pleasant, the plaintive, and the imaginative, which enables one to translate the minor philosophy of life to the common mind. His temperament was far more sensitive and vivacious than that of the average Englishman, because of a tropical element in his blood; he was a poet in feeling, and instinctively cultivated a cheerful view of things and a complacent theory of life. He believed, too much perhaps, à la Skimpole, yet with its justifiable side, in the available and familiar sources of comfort and pleasure as thoroughly as Jean Paul; he delighted in ransacking old poets for dainty conceits, old book-stalls for neglected authors of genius, the fields for early flowers, the world for charming companions, and his own fancy for images of love or suggestions of wisdom; he loved "to repose on his own sensations"—to vindicate the benign possibilities and celebrate the latent and common resources of existence. Without the aspiration of the reformer, the passion of the advocate, or the egotism of the dogmatist—with little earnestness, but much candor and kindliness, he sought to open vistas, not of sublime truth, but of homely wisdom, to the multitude; to cheer, to charm, to harmonize, and to humanize by means of gentle, genial suggestion, fanciful and friendly talk about men and things: not a very lofty ideal, it may be said—not a very grand purpose, it may be—yet still a graceful and worthy one, and perhaps more effective and requisite than many of more ambitious aspect, when we consider how prone we are to forget that "a man's best things are nearest him," and that it is the aggregate of small and continuous, rather than the advent of great, pleasures that makes up that innocent gratification of mind, heart, and senses which we call happiness. Well does Leigh Hunt call his "Seer," as a second title, "Commonplaces Refreshed;" for the effect of his agreeable chat is of a dewy kind, brightening the prospect and the mood; as the traveller sees the old

* "The Seer; or, Commonplaces Refreshed. By Leigh Hunt." In two volumes. Boston: Roberts Brothers, Boston.

mosaic floor of some dusty temple grow vivid when sprinkled, and give out its pristine design and color, so as we look on familiar but somewhat obscured life-pictures, with such a genial philosopher beside us, insensibly somewhat of the original grace and glow returns, and we recognize a compensatory idea, a fresh hue, or a hopeful purpose, and so go on our way more calm, charitable, or gay. The very subjects of the "Seer" give token of this auspicious interpretation—of a pleasant and suggestive, as well as observant and cheerful, cicerone: "Pebbles" and "Flowers" alternate, in the second, with thoughts on "Early Rising" and "Breakfast;" now we are offered a most inspiring "Pinch of Snuff," and now a choice bit out of Chaucer; here we thrid a "Crowd" in reflective mood, and there we watch and meditate over "A Cat by the Fire;" here is a kindly diagnosis of the functions and fortunes of "Washerwomen," and there a homily on the true way "To Make Presents;" the associations of and relations to the weather in "Spring" on a rainy and dusty day blend with speculations on the "Coach," as a social economy, and a "Piano," as a domestic resource; and these, with like familiar themes, are interspersed with charming stories and unpedantic yet appreciative critiques—altogether a kind of melodious running commentary on the by-ways of life, its inklings of romance and its grateful phases of reality.

LITERATURE FOR CHILDREN.

THE simplest classification of the books for children which the approach of the holidays has brought to our none too ample shelves, is into those of which the illustrations are the main feature, and those in which they are subordinate to the text. The first class, then, will consist of the series published by Messrs. Hurd & Houghton, of this city, after designs by H. L. Stephens. "Old Mother Hubbard" and "The House that Jack Built" are embellished with tinted lithographs, in each case occupying the entire page above the verse illustrated. Those which accompany the latter story are the better of the two, and exhibit more originality, more accurate drawing, and more real humor than any of this artist's productions which we have hitherto seen. This arises partly from the fact that his caricature involves the delineation of brute animals, whom he seems to have studied to much greater profit than he has his own species. He has a mannerism, and, it must be added, a vulgar mannerism, in drawing the human face and figure which always betrays his pencil. This appears very strikingly in the colored prints of his "Puss in Boots," "Beauty and the Beast," and "Cinderella," where the humor and the sentiment alike are injured by the coarseness of the draughtsman. "Cinderella," however, is least at fault.

Occupying a middle place between this division and the following are "The Fly," by Theodore Tilton (Sheldon & Co.), and "Hymns in Prose for Children," by Mrs. Barbauld. "The Fly" is a model of infant poetry, and needs no illustrations. Mr. Stephens, however, has furnished some, not meant to be elaborate, and so not fairly under criticism. In attempting to represent a baby's roundness he has exaggerated it to corpulency, and made the race with the fly an unequal one.—Mrs. Barbauld's "Hymns" are designed by easy stages to indoctrinate the youthful mind with religious ideas, chiefly of the existence and attributes of God. These are all drawn from a contemplation of nature, and are generally couched in simple phraseology. There are some exceptions; as when the children promise "on every hill and in every green field" to "offer the sacrifice of thanksgiving and the incense of praise;" or the startling question, "Child of reason, whence comest thou? what has thine eye observed, and whither has thy foot been wandering?" or the statement, "The memory, the judgment, the invention, the feeling of right and wrong, are all in the mind of a child; of a little infant just born; but they are not expanded, you cannot perceive them." The engravings of this handsome volume (of English origin) are truly admirable, abounding on every page, and a hymn in themselves.

We owe to the late war such stories as "The Gunboat Series," by H. C. Castlemon (R. W. Carroll & Co., Cincinnati), containing the career of Frank Nelson, as a young naturalist and hunter, on a gunboat and before Vicksburg. The incidents are varied and well-told, and the tone of the narrative free from objection. The style is adapted to children of ten or twelve and upwards. In mechanical execution, these four volumes are highly creditable to their Western publishers.—Roberts Brothers, Boston, republish Capt. Marryatt's "Privateersman," a highly seasoned tale of adventure and violence "by sea and land, in civil and savage life," and, on the whole, of doubtful tendency. There is not much to amuse, much less refine and elevate, in the following tit-bit from p. 292:

"An old woman who had been menacing and grinning at me for some time, and who was the most hideous animal that I ever beheld in the shape of a woman, thrust a straw into my eye, giving me most excruciating agony. I was so carried away by rage and pain that I saluted her with a kick in the stomach, which laid her doubled up on the ground," etc.

Of the "Army and Navy Series," by Oliver Optic (Lee & Shepard, Boston), we have for the fourth volume "The Yankee Middy." Mr. Adams has written many books for boys that have deserved and obtained popularity. The present work seems fully equal to its predecessors in clearness and interest, and agrees also with them in being superior in composition to the average tales for the same class of readers.—"Paul Prescott's Charge," by Horatio Alger, Jr. (Loring, Boston), is not to be understood in a military sense. Paul was charged by his dying father to redeem a debt which rested upon the latter, and having promised to do so succeeds at last. The tale is likely to prove a favorite in spite of occasional "big words." "The sexton," it is remarked on p. 98, "did not claim to be a connoisseur, and would probably not have understood the meaning of the word." Will the readers of Mr. Alger's book understand it any better? Loring publishes also "The Adventures of a French Boy," by Alfred de Bréhat; but Hurd & Houghton have a better edition with pictures. The book was suggested by and written in imitation of "The Swiss Family Robinson."—We cannot quite determine the age of "my young readers" to whom Miss Harriet Myrtle introduces "The Water Lily" (Hurd & Houghton), saying that "the times we [in England] live in are destined to be chronicled hereafter as fraught with important events in the world's history." The heroine, to be sure, is fifteen, unless one accepts "Phiz's" sharp-visaged, slender portraits of her, and concludes she may be thirty-five.—We are met by a similar difficulty in the opening chapter of "Countess Kate," by the author of "The Heir of Redclyffe" (Loring), where one little girl "between ten and eleven years old" rebukes a contemporary for profaning Hamlet; and a little further on tells her adopted father that he is her "tutor and governor, and spiritual pastor and master." This advanced young person becomes a countess very much against her grain, and is simple enough to have scruples about using the fashionable excuses of "a previous engagement" and "not at home," till her spiritual pastor assures her that these white lies proceed from motives of courtesy.—"The Little Gentleman in Green," by Una Savin (Loring), purports to be a fairy tale. It is a very improbable invention, and of inferior merit.—"David Woodburn," "The Scottish Minister," and "Ellen Vincent" (Henry Hoyt, Boston), like all the issues of this publisher, are religious stories of which the motive is respectable, the execution mediocre, and the need questionable.—"Sydney de Grey," by Lawrence Lancewood (Graves & Young, Boston), belongs in the same category in so far as the hero is made a very immaculate and gentlemanly youth, whose peace of mind is easily disturbed by a bit of boyish slang.—Pointedly moral tales are also "Jolly and Katy in the Country," by Alice Gray (Robert Carter & Bros., New York), and "On the Ferry-Boat," by Jennie Harrison (Hurd & Houghton).—Mr. Horace Scudder's fantastic "Dream Children" (Sever & Francis, Cambridge) re-appears this year in its beautiful attire, which quite places it at the head of the class of books we are reviewing. The stories are of a mixed character, and are only partially adapted for young ears. The author has an ingenious fancy, which finds a graceful and poetical expression.—The "Little Prudy Series," by Sophie May (Lee & Shepard, Boston), and "Good Little Hearts," by Aunt Fanny (Hurd & Houghton), are, of all the books named herein, addressed to the youngest readers. We are inclined to agree with the authoress that the former "are rather too old for Prudy," though there is some good infantile conversation in them. Aunt Fanny talks to her auditory very skilfully, taking incidents only into account; and her "Stories in the Wood," "Bird Nest Stories," "Nelly Rivers," and "Metropolitan Fair," are well adapted to delight the little ones. Once in a while she errs in the choice of a word, as in using "partitioned off," "quartette tables," etc.; but she may fairly pretend to have "got the hang" of the nursery.

"Our Young Folks" is not beyond criticism—especially in the illustrations, which the publishers certainly overrate—but far surpasses every other child's magazine. "The Little Corporal" (Alfred L. Sewell, Chicago) is a monthly newspaper in quarto form, and is conducted with a great deal of tact, taste, and care. Either of these two publications—and we should find it hard to choose between them—would prove a welcome Christmas or New Year's gift.

Glimpses of History, by George M. Towle. (Boston: William V. Spencer.)—This is a reprint of a number of magazine and newspaper essays on such subjects as "Memorable Assassinations," "John Bright," "The Opening Scenes of the Rebellion," "Count Cavour." Mr. Towle's preface is a very modest one, and we should hardly venture to find fault with him for having written his "sketches," as he calls them, if he had not thought proper to collect and republish them in a book form. This attempt to save them from the oblivion which usually overtakes contributions to the periodical press, however, we cannot help calling a waste of money. They are essentially commonplace. The facts which they contain may be all found in school histories, Macaulay's essays, or old volumes of the English reviews, or newspaper correspondence, and the style, if not a good example of the "forcible-feeble," is not far from it. The whole volume is marred by "fine writing" of a very poor quality. Some of the lapses from accuracy into which Mr. Towle's rhetorical fervor betrays him are curious, as when he makes Chatham die "on the spot where the cowardly and despotic John had been compelled by the barons of England to affirm the Magna Charta of their liberties," and in the hall where "Shaftesbury, Hampden, and Russell" had pleaded "in behalf of the rights of man."

The Trip of the Steamer "Oceanus" to Fort Sumter and Charleston, S. C. (Brooklyn.)—This is the record of one of the most romantic and delightful voyages belonging to any age, and covering a period fraught with the gravest events in American history. The party of privileged civilians who made the excursion here narrated, witnessed the symbolic act of restoring the national flag to its lawful position on re-taken Sumter; walked amid the retributive ruins of Charleston; were exalted by the tidings of Lee's surrender; and depressed, in a terrible transition, by learning, as they neared home, of the assassination of Mr. Lincoln. Such an experience was worthy to be printed, if only, as is the case, to strengthen the recollection of the excursionists, and not to satisfy a public demand. A handsome volume is the result; but it seems to us that more time might have been allowed for its preparation, and we regret that instead of photographs themselves, we have merely ordinary wood-cuts from photographs.

Humorous Poems. By Oliver Wendell Holmes. (Ticknor & Fields, Boston.)—This is another of the series, "Companion Poets for the People," already commended by us for its shapeliness and typographical excellence. The artist's pencil is quite incompetent to illustrate the author's humor in the present instance, and his drawings would scarcely provoke a smile if separated from the text.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

NOTES FROM PLYMOUTH PULPIT. By Augusta Moore. New Edition.—RICHARD COBDEN, THE APOSTLE OF FREE TRADE. By John McGilchrist.—MISS CAREW. By Amelia B. Edwards. Harper & Brothers, New York.

THE FREEDMEN'S BOOK. By L. Maria Child.—WAR LYRICS AND OTHER POEMS. By Henry Howard Brownell. Ticknor & Fields, Boston.

MARIAN ROOKE; OR, THE QUEST FOR FORTUNE. By Henry D. Sedley. Sheldon & Company, New York.

ALLWORTH ABBEY. By Mrs. Emma D. E. N. Southworth. T. B. Peterson & Bros., Philadelphia.

SOMETHING NEW FOR MY LITTLE FRIENDS. Original Stories in Verse. J. B. Lippincott, Philadelphia.

CHASTELARD. A Tragedy. By Algernon Charles Swinburne.—OTTALIE'S STORIES FOR THE LITTLE FOLKS. Translated from the German of Madame Ottalie Wildermuth, by Anna B. Cooke.—CHRISTMAS HOLIDAYS AT CEDAR GROVE. By Mary Alice Seymour.—CUSHIONS AND CORNERS; OR, HOLIDAYS AT OLD ORCHARD. By Mrs. R. J. Greene. E. P. Dutton & Co., Boston; Hurd & Houghton, New York.

CHRISTIAN COMPANIONSHIP FOR RETIRED HOURS. Alexander Strahan, London and New York.

HOME LIFE: WHAT IT IS, AND WHAT IT NEEDS. By John F. W. Ware. Wm. V. Spencer, Boston.

THE PATRIOTISM OF ILLINOIS. By T. M. Eddy, D.D. Two vols. Clarke & Co., Chicago.

THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS. By John Bunyan.—DREAM CHILDREN. By the author of "Seven Little People and their Friends." Sever & Francis, Cambridge.

AN ADDRESS ON THE LIMITS OF EDUCATION. Read before the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, by Jacob Bigelow, M.D. E. P. Dutton & Co., Boston.

Fine Arts.

MUSIC.

"L'AFRICAINE.

II.

"L'AFRICAINE" was given four times during the last week, and each time better and with greater appreciation on the part of the audience. A great work like this requires to be studied and to be heard frequently before it can be rightly understood. The performers themselves feel more what their parts require; they are always led on to this by a sympathizing audience; and consequently they have sung and acted more intelligently than they did at first. Zucchi is dressed in a costume which is about as nondescript as the place of the story, but which is sufficiently barbaric in type, and is becoming to her—in the fourth act quite gorgeous. We are very glad that her artistic sense led her to stain her skin and put on that essentially savage but very ugly wig. She acts always passionately and well; her singing is generally the best she is capable of, though sometimes, as in the duo in the fourth act, she errs by being too forcible and straining her voice too much. Bellini is equally the savage. His acting in the scene in the first act is especially to be commended, as also in the prison scene. His rendering of the consent to declare the marriage of Vasco and Selika, in the fourth act, struck us as being rather exaggerated. He should calm himself a little and not gasp quite so much. Ortolani is stiff and somewhat unnatural. She gives the romance in the first act quite well, at times, but lacks fine perception. She should pay a little more attention to her costume as well as her acting, as it seems absurd for her to wear the same grey satin dress from Lisbon to the South Sea, without a single change.

Mazzoleni acts well in the first act, and goes through his recitative with good spirit and feeling. In the second he accomplishes the difficult feat of going to sleep bolt upright, which is all the more strange as he could easily recline on the couch on which he sits. His part is nearly all cut out of the third act. He is best in "O Paradiso," and both sings and acts well in the duo. Antonucci lacks animation, and does not catch the exact shade of Don Pedro's character, at least he does not display a proper perception of it. The minor characters are not well sustained. These are all strongly marked musically. But the persons who take them destroy their individuality by singing them indifferently, and in much the same way that they are accustomed to sing parts in other operas which are really null. Lorini does not make half out of the High Priest that he ought to, and Müller does not do what he is able to do with the Grand Inquisitor. As for Don Alvan or Don Diego, they might as well not sing at all, as far as regards any force of expression they may have. One can lie back in his box and close his eyes and pay attention to the beautiful instrumentation alone with very great enjoyment and profit, so well do the orchestra play. At times they seem to us to play with an erroneous idea of the expression, but we are quite ready to defer to Mr. Bergmann's judgment, and hear even the unison passage without severe criticism.

Great care has evidently been bestowed on the mise-en-scène of this opera. The scenery of the third, fourth, and fifth acts is all new, and though not equal to the scenery of our first-class theatres, is an advance on what is usually displayed at the Academy. The ship does very well with the exception of the wheel, and of the mast, which should rise above the sail. The high poop and the carved work of the deck are quite in accordance with the vessels of the period. The fourth act presents us with a scene which is really Indian in appearance, though we must object to the Egyptian doorway in the temple. The scene of the upas-tree is not botanically correct—cacti, for instance, do not grow in India—but it is tropical in character and very effective. The chorus has been enlarged and improved; and in the fourth act was dressed with more than usual propriety, though its members all needed to darken their faces in order to be in character. The brown skin of Nelusco and Selika is in singular contrast to the pale-faced Brahmins and the black troops, who are armed with most fearful-looking weapons. The Bayaderes, too, were quite too modern in appearance. As they are an established institution in the East, they ought to be very easily represented. The ballet was danced with much grace and skill. We can't help wondering how Vasco's armor keeps so bright and polished through his long sea voyage and shipwreck. The savages who attack the ship afterwards come in in the grand procession, and are dressed in the full costume of North American Indians, feathers, paint, tomahawks, and even buckskin That might be tolerated in Europe; but it is hardly fair to treat us as though we were quite so ignorant of geography and ethnology as to imagine that our aborigines are Hindoos.

It is a subject of wonder how Meyerbeer, who was one of the most cautious writers, providing against all possible difficulties, and rewriting and remodelling all his works till the very night of production, came to choose a libretto which was so faulty dramatically. Weber once said, "A musician is responsible for the subject he treats, and it is not to be supposed that a libretto is put into the hand of a composer as an apple into that of a child." Meyerbeer, in his reading, always had the opera in mind, and was continually reflecting on how this and that subject could be treated; all other music he seemed to regard as preludial or episodical, and every story he considered as material for music. He refused "Faust," saying that the poem of Goethe carried its music in itself, and that none could be added to it; but he would have been very glad to put the story of Lazarus on the stage, thinking of the great effect that he could give to the words, "Lazarus, arise!" In "Robert" he had treated of the Middle Ages and of the supernatural in the style of the romantic school. In "Les Huguenots" he had shown himself under the influence of the religious controversies of the age, added to an historical spirit. He made "Le Prophète" with his mind on the Socialist discussions of the end of the reign of Louis Philippe. He had turned to the comic opera in "L'Etoile du Nord," and he had drawn a picture of pastoral life in "Dinorah." Now his eyes turned toward the tropics. He wished to display an entirely new side of life and passion. With this view he had Scribe prepare the original libretto to which we alluded in our last, with a fresh impulse to pictures of history, which was changed, and we have the present one. Scribe, with all his faults of versification and his degradation of a high ideal, is by many considered the true author of the modern opera. At all events, he has a good share in the success of many. With all his faults, he has not that of being uninteresting. If his work lacks unity of purpose and style, and is badly constructed in plot, it has many situations of the highest dramatic interest. That was what Meyerbeer especially wanted; for all of his operas consist chiefly of a succession of scenes of great power, on which he has used all the wealth of his art. Many of the faults of the present work would probably have been obviated had both authors lived to produce it, for constant and even radical changes were always made during the rehearsals, in the work as well as the music.

What relation "L'Africaine" bears to the rest ot Meyerbeer's works, is a difficult question to answer; but if we consider them in the order of their composition, "Robert," "Les Huguenots," "L'Africaine," and "Le Prophète," we shall have a pretty correct idea of their respective merits. Those who have never liked Meyerbeer's operas, cannot be expected to admire this, as it has the same beauties or faults as the rest, but there are many who remember with what enthusiasm they heard "Les Huguenots" twenty years ago, and finding that the same feelings are not awakened now, declaim against the decline of the composer's powers, and talk of the work of an old man just as others do of Beethoven's ninth symphony. They should remember that they themselves have grown older, that their nature is not as impressible, and the present effects should not be compared with an exaggerated remembrance, but rather the effect of "L'Africaine" should be compared with the effect of "Les Huguenots," or "Le Prophète," on an emotional nature to whom both are new.

To say that "L'Africaine" is one of the masterpieces of Meyerbeer, is to say that it is one of the great works in music. Meyerbeer, by that sudden leap from the Italian style of his "Emma di Resburgo" and his "Crociato" to the true dramatic fervor of "Robert," stood at once in the front rank of operatic composers. He is a worthy representative of the doctrines of Gluck, though they are very different in character. Gluck tends to the austerest simplicity; Meyerbeer's insatiable ambition brings us the utmost complexity of style. Both passed through nearly the same experience; German by birth, they both studied in Italy, and wrote opera after opera with the success of a day only; both suddenly changed their whole style and manner of writing from conviction, came to Paris, and produced works true, natural, and living.

It is said that Meyerbeer was a man of great talent, but not a genius, because he is not calm, or simple, and because his operas are not struck out at once, but are worked over, and retouched, and carefully studied. But are all geniuses cast in the same mould? Is it necessary for them all to be simple? Michael Angelo was not. Or calm? was Beethoven? Or spontaneous? were Shakespeare's plays written so? If "Le Prophète" or "Les Huguenots" do not show genius, no work of music does. The duo between Valentine and Raoul, and the finale of the first act of "L'Africaine," or the monologue of Selika in the fifth, are as surely specimens of true musical beauty as the air of Sarartro in the "Magic Flute," or the sonata in C sharp minor.

We ought to allude to the great art which Meyerbeer has shown in all his operas, but especially in this, as a musical colorist. His nice perception of contrasts and his excellent skill in using them have culminated here. We remember the viola of love in "Les Huguenots," and the bassoon accompaniment to the introduction of the trio in the fifth act; but where shall we find anything so consummate as the accompaniments to the "Slumber Song" of Selika, or to the "O Paradiso" of Vasco, or the unison passage in the fifth act? But all this perfection, some assert, shows that the opera is in its decadence when resort is had to means outside of those legitimately to be employed, and everything is exhausted and nothing further possible. But decadence does not begin till all means have been used, and it is hard to suppose that in a hundred years the resources of music are entirely at an end and nothing is left to the future. Wagner would tell us the contrary. When the last height is reached we shall have to return to the original simplicity; but vistas open yet.

SEND IMMEDIATELY FOR OUR

HOLIDAY GEM,

A little book containing—

Calendar for 1866;

Post-office Regulations, and how to send money safe;

A Doctor's experience in Cholera in 1840, '55, and '65, and Receipt for Cure;

Fourteen Reasons for not engaging in Stock Speculations;

The kind of Books we want in this age for our Children.

It will tell you where to get your Books and other articles good and cheap for the Holidays.

Sent for 5 cents, post free.

TIBBALS & WHITING,

37 Park Row, and 145 Nassau Street, New York.

25 Cents a Month! $3 a Year!

THE ARGOSY:

A NEW LITERARY ADVENTURE.

Welcome, Learned, Urbane, Hilarious,
Welcome, all the honest crew!
And, to make our bliss more various,
Welcome, choicest Ladies, too!
Ben Jonson's Leges Convivales.

In launching "THE ARGOSY" her Owners and Captain anticipate the question, "Are there not enough of these light Magazine Craft afloat already?" They answer that their venture will not run into collision with any; she will sail the high seas of literature, and bring her freight from the realms of imagination and fancy. The products of these regions make a market for themselves—their gems and silks and spices first creating the desires which they satisfy, and then becoming a necessary part of the common household fare.

The Projectors of "THE ARGOSY" do not intend to put in a claim to the prize of King Xerxes for the invention of a new pleasure, or for the discovery of any new world of entertainment. They are aware how hard it is to find "such wit as ne'er has been," and they therefore decline to give promissory notes, as is the order of the day, on an El Dorado of wit and wisdom. They are not going in search of that golden fleece, "The great want of the age"—an expedition which generally begins with "much cry" and ends with "little wool." Nor will they attempt to introduce the very Oriental business of amusing the unamusable. Enough if they succeed in making the thoughtful merrier and the unthinking wiser.

"THE ARGOSY" will address itself alike to the travelled and the untravelled; to the former seeking to recall the delight of scenes to which distance only lends enchantment, and to the latter to furnish pictures vivid enough to stand in the place of realities. In story-telling it will welcome all who can create "new worlds of lofty hopes, and fancies chaste and noble," and who can clothe incidents of natural construction with the real interest of human action and passion. In its essays it will try to display the lights and shadows of our age, bring out its harmonies and discords, aid its aspirations, and laugh at its absurdities. And it is intended that its every page, whether prose or verse, shall attest the presence of that genial poetic spirit from which the best fruits in any gracious art may be anticipated.

But however much might be said here, it would still require to be left to "THE ARGOSY" itself to make friends or to lose them. The public will, therefore, be pleased to consider themselves introduced to this new literary adventure, and then all is done that a prospectus can do.

Praying for a fair wind of popular favor, "THE ARGOSY" will start on the first day of January, in this year of grace 1866.

The price of "THE ARGOSY" will be twenty-five cents a month. It will be published by Alexander Strahan & Co., 178 Grand Street, New York, and be for sale at all bookstores and news-agencies in the United States.

"Good Words are worth much and cost little."—HERBERT.

25 cents a Month, $3 a Year, profusely Illustrated.

GOOD WORDS.

EDITED BY NORMAN MACLEOD, D.D.,

One of Her Britannic Majesty's Chaplains.

Now that Six Volumes of "GOOD WORDS" are before the public, the publishers fee that no words are required from them respecting either the successful labors of the past or the projected exertions for the future. They only wish to state that it is their desire to make the Magazine ever more worthy of its large circulation, and ever more beneficial to its hundreds of thousands of readers in all parts of the world. Among the leading features in 1866 will be: A NEW STORY, by Mrs. Oliphant; to begin in January, and be continued throughout the year. A NEW SERIES OF TRAVEL PAPERS, by Norman Macleod, D.D., Editor. A SERIES OF PAPERS ON OUR COMMON FAITH, by Dean Alford, Dr. Guthrie, Dr. James Hamilton, Dr. Norman Macleod, Professor Plumptre, Dr. Raleigh, Principal Tulloch, Dr. C. J. Vaughan, and others. A SERIES OF CHARACTER SKETCHES, by Anthony Trollope, William Gilbert, Sarah Tytler, Mrs. Henry Wood, the author of "Studies for Stories," George Macdonald, Alexander Smith, and others.

STRAHAN & CO., MAGAZINE PUBLISHERS,

178 Grand Street, New York.

☞ Sold by all Booksellers and News Agents.

NEW STORY BY MRS. OLIPHANT,

To be published in "GOOD WORDS."

In the January Part of "Good Words" will appear the first portion of MADONNA MARY.

A STORY OF MODERN ENGLISH LIFE.

By MRS. OLIPHANT, author of "Agnes," etc., etc.

The publication of this Story will be continued from month to month, and completed in the December Part.

STRAHAN & CO., MAGAZINE PUBLISHERS,

178 Grand Street, New York

ELEGANT PRESENTATION BOOK.

In one handsome volume of 950 royal 8vo pages, price $3 75, extra gilt cloth,

GOOD WORDS FOR 1865.

Edited by NORMAN MACLEOD, D.D., and Illustrated with upwards of 100 Wood Engravings from Designs by Eminent Artists.

Within this one volume will be found complete: 1. Charles Kingsley's new novel, "Hereward, the Last of the English." 2. Norman Macleod's "Eastward." 3. Henry Rogers's "Essays, Theological and Philosophical." 4. Dr. C. J. Vaughan's "Christ, the Light of the World." 5. John W. Kaye's "Indian Heroes." 6. Alexander Smith's novel, "Alfred Hagart's Household." And numerous contributions, by the Duke of Argyll, Sir John F. W. Herschel, Bart., Professor Plumptre, Jean Ingelow, the Dean of Canterbury, Principal Tulloch, George Macdonald, Robert Buchanan, John Malcolm Ludlow, Dr. Andrew Wynter, Catharine Winkworth, William Gilbert, Professor Lyon Playfair, and others.

STRAHAN & CO., MAGAZINE PUBLISHERS,

56 Ludgate Hill, London. 178 Grand Street, New York.

BE SURE AND EXAMINE

OUR LARGE AND CHEAP STOCK

OF

HOLIDAY BOOKS AND ALBUMS

BEFORE PURCHASING.

TIBBALS & WHITING,

37 Park Row and 145 Nassau Street, N. Y.

OAKLEY & MASON,

PUBLISHERS AND BOOKSELLERS,

21 Murray Street,

(near broadway,)

In addition to their well-selected stock of

SCHOOL AND MISCELLANEOUS BOOKS,

have a fine assortment of

Illustrated Books for the Holidays.

Also the

STANDARD HISTORIES, NOVELS, AND POETICAL AND THEOLOGICAL WORKS,

in half calf, half turkey, full calf, and full turkey bindings, to which Special Attention is invited.

BIBLES, TESTAMENTS, AND PRAYER-BOOKS

of all sizes and every variety of binding.

NEW JUVENILES AND BOOKS OF ADVENTURE FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Photographic Albums,

all prices, from fifty cents to twenty-five dollars.

The Publications of all the leading Publishing Houses in the Country constantly on hand, and for sale at publishers' prices.

Any book forwarded by mail, postage paid, upon receipt of the advertised price.

ECLECTIC MAGAZINE.

LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

BEAUTIFUL EMBELLISHMENTS!

FINE STEEL ENGRAVINGS!

New Volume Begins January, 1866.

NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE.

The Eclectic Magazine is, as its name indicates, a selection from other magazines and periodicals. These selections are carefully made each month, from the entire range of foreign periodicals. In this respect it is entirely unlike other monthlies, and has no rival. The following are some of the works from which selections are made:

London Quarterly,	Revue des Deux Mondes,
British Quarterly,	London Society,
North British Review,	Bentley's Miscellany,
Popular Science Review,	Cornhill Magazine,
Saturday Review,	Fraser's Magazine,
Leisure Hour,	Temple Bar,
Westminster Review,	Chambers's Journal,
Dublin University,	Edinburgh Review,
Art Journal,	London National Review,
Macmillan,	St. James,
Sunday Magazine,	Good Words,
Sunday at Home,	Victoria Magazine,
Reader,	Fortnightly Review,
Blackwood,	Athenæum.

While our own literature is indispensable, yet a knowledge of the literature of other countries is equally essential to all who would keep pace with the progress of the human mind. The main features of the work will remain the same, but some changes will be made, adapted, it is believed, to the present wants of the public.

We have also arranged to secure choice selections from the French, German, and other Continental Periodicals, translated especially for the ECLECTIC, and it is hoped this new feature will add greatly to the variety and value of the work.

EMBELLISHMENTS.

Each number is embellished with one or more Fine Steel Engravings—portraits of eminent men, or illustrative of important historical events.

With the extensive resources at his command, the Editor hopes to make the work a necessity to every intelligent reader, and no pains will be spared to accomplish this result.

Volumes commence in January and July of each year; subscriptions can commence with any month.

Terms.

$5 per Year, Single Numbers 50 Cents.

The Trade, Clergymen, Teachers, and Clubs supplied on favorable terms. Address

W. H. BIDWELL,

5 Beekman Street, N. Y.

HURRAH! HURRAH!! HURRAH!!!

THREE TIMES THREE, BOYS!

FOR

Three New Books,

BY

OLIVER OPTIC.

I.

JUST ISSUED:

THE YANKEE MIDDY;

OR,

THE ADVENTURES OF A NAVAL OFFICER.

A sequel to the "Sailor Boy."

BY

OLIVER OPTIC.

1 vol. 16mo. Illustrated. Price $1 50.

Being the Fourth Volume of the popular and patriotic

ARMY AND NAVY STORIES.

☞ A LIBRARY FOR YOUNG AND OLD.

II.

READY SATURDAY, DEC. 2, 1865:

WORK AND WIN;

Or, MIDDY NEWMAN ON A CRUISE.

BY

OLIVER OPTIC.

1 vol. 16mo. Illustrated. Price $1 25.

Being the Fourth Volume of the entertaining

WOODVILLE STORIES.

III.

READY DECEMBER 10:

FIGHTING JOE;

OR,

THE FORTUNES OF A STAFF OFFICER.

A sequel to "The Soldier Boy" and "The Young Lieutenant."

BY

OLIVER OPTIC.

1 vol. 16mo. Illustrated. Price $1 50.

Being the Fifth Volume of

ARMY AND NAVY STORIES.

☞ A LIBRARY FOR YOUNG AND OLD.

For sale by all Booksellers, and sent by mail on receipt of price.

LEE & SHEPARD, Publishers,

149 Washington Street, Boston.

ILLUSTRATED CHRISTMAS BOOKS.

LELAND'S LEGENDS OF THE BIRDS. With 12 lithographs, 4to, fancy boards, $1 50

PEARLS FROM HEINE. With illustrations and vignettes, 4to, 75 cents.

MOTHER GOOSE FROM GERMANY. Profusely illustrated, 4to, fancy boards, $1.

MOTHER PITCHER'S POEMS FOR LITTLE PEOPLE. 4to, fancy boards, 75c.

MOTHER MICHEL AND HER CAT. With illustrations and vignettes, 16mo, 75c.

LA MERE L'OIE. Poésies, Enigmas, Chansons et Rondes Enfantines. Illustrated, 8vo, fancy boards, $1.

EIA POPEIA. Deutsche Kinderheimath in Wort und Sang und Bild. Illustrated, 8vo, fancy boards, 75c.

THE ROOT PRINCESS. A Christmas Tale. 4to, fancy boards, 75c.

Gustave Doré's Illustrations.

PHOTOGRAPHS.

THE LEGEND OF THE WANDERING JEW. $5.

ATALA ALBUM. Portfolio, $5.

SLEEPING BEAUTY IN THE WOOD. 4to, cloth gilt, $3.

DANTE ALBUM. Portfolio, complete, 76 photographs, 4to, $25.

MINIATURE DANTE ALBUM. In case, $12.

FAIRY ALBUM. In case, $6 50.

Any of the above sent, post-paid, on receipt of the price, by

F. LEYPOLDT, 646 Broadway.

ILLUMINATED AND ILLUSTRATED BOOKS.

HURD & HOUGHTON,

401 Broadway, New York,

HAVE NOW READY:

THE TWENTY-THIRD PSALM.

Splendidly illuminated from original designs. Each page elegantly printed in oil colors, with emblematic border. 1 vol. quarto, extra cloth, gilt, $5 00; morocco gilt, or antique, $8 50.

From the Methodist.

"'The Twenty-third Psalm' is remarkable for the unusual elegance with which it is gotten up. We do not think we have ever seen so beautiful a thing in this line of publications. The chromo-lithography is extraordinarily fine. A page is devoted to each of six verses of the psalm. More beautiful emblems could hardly be found to match so beautiful a text."

2. THE THREE KINGS OF ORIENT.

"A Christmas Carol." Words and music by Rev. J. H. Hopkins, Jr. Each page printed in oil colors from exquisite designs. 1 vol. quarto, extra cloth, gilt, $5 00; morocco gilt, or antique, $8 50.

From the Christian Intelligencer.

"This famous carol is richly embellished by colored lithographs, six in number, representing the adoration of the Babe of Bethlehem, and various scenes in the life of our Lord. The designs are good and the execution admirable. This will be a desirable gift-book for Christmas."

THE DIVINE AND MORAL SONGS OF DR. WATTS.

A new and choice edition. Illustrated with 100 wood-cuts in the finest style of art, from original designs by eminent artists. Engraved by J. D. Cooper. Printed on best paper, and handsomely bound. 1 vol. small quarto, cloth, full gilt, $5 00; turkey morocco, $8 50.

4. HYMNS IN PROSE FOR CHILDREN.

By Mrs. Barbauld, author of "Lessons for Children." With 100 wood-cuts, from designs by Coleman, Barnes, Kennedy, and Wimperis. Engraved by Cooper. Elegantly printed on fine paper. 1 vol. small quarto, cloth, full gilt, $5 00; turkey morocco, $8 50.

☞ Copies free by mail on receipt of price.

The only Authentic and Official History of the Great Campaign.

I.

THOROUGHLY REVISED BY GEN. SHERMAN, AND PUBLISHED UNDER HIS SANCTION,

60,000 COPIES ALREADY SOLD,

SHERMAN AND HIS CAMPAIGNS.

By Col. S. M. BOWMAN and Lieut.-Col. R. B. IRWIN. 1 vol. 8vo, 512 pages, cloth, $3 50.

WITH SPLENDID STEEL PORTRAITS OF

Major-Gen.	SHERMAN,	Major-Gen.	SCHOFIELD,
"	HOWARD,	"	SLOCUM,
"	LOGAN,	"	BLAIR,
"	DAVIS,	"	KILPATRICK,

And Maps, Plans, etc.

II.

PUBLISHED UNDER GEN. GRANT'S SANCTION.

GRANT AND HIS CAMPAIGNS.

By HENRY COPPEE, A.M.,
Editor of the "United States Service Magazine."

WITH SPLENDID STEEL PORTRAITS OF

Lieut.-Gen.	U. S. GRANT,	Major-Gen.	SHERMAN,
Major-Gen.	MCPHERSON,	"	THOMAS,
"	MEADE,	"	SHERIDAN,
"	ORD,	"	RAWLINS,

And Maps, Plans, etc., etc.

1 vol. 8vo, 500 pages, $3 50.

C. B. RICHARDSON, PUBLISHER,
540 Broadway, New York.

MISS MULOCH'S CHRISTMAS BOOK.

"OUR YEAR:"

A CHILD'S BOOK IN PROSE AND VERSE.

WITH VIGNETTES AND 13 FULL-PAGE ILLUSTRATIONS.

6mo, tinted paper, gilt top, fancy morocco cloth, gilt stamp on back and side. Price $1 25. (Tauchnitz edition.)

Will be published on Saturday, December 16.

As only a limited edition can be prepared, early orders will be necessary to secure copies.

F. LEYPOLDT,
646 BROADWAY.

THE NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

NOW READY, and for sale by all Newsdealers and Booksellers, at the good old price of Twenty-five cents a number, or $3 a year, the January issue of

BEADLE'S MONTHLY:

A MAGAZINE OF TO-DAY.

Commanding the services of the Best Authors and Artists, the Publishers are able to present a Magazine which cannot fail to interest those in quest of good reading. It is proposed to render the publication a STANDARD FAVORITE—in matter, manner, and illustration second to no Monthly now claiming public attention. The scope, character, and artistic qualities of the Monthly will be partially apparent from the following table of contents of the January number:

CONTENTS.

BALL'S BLUFF: A Ballad of the War—Illustrated. A stirring story in verse, from the pen of one of our most noted poets.

THE DEAD LETTER: Chapters I., II., III., IV.—Illustrated. Of all the recent productions in American fiction, this is among the most original. Impressive and deeply absorbing in its nature and narrative, none who read it will forget it. A story of remarkable power, interest, and strangeness.

WALKS AMONG WORDS; or, A Half-Hour with the Lexicographers. A pleasant paper of gossip about the history, origin, and modifications of certain words. It will interest the educated and uneducated alike.

THE GORILLA AT HOME.—Illustrated. Anecdotes of Natural History. The "habits, manners, and customs" of this King of Beasts are here chronicled in a paper of pleasing and instructive features.

THE PRISONER OF WAR IN TEXAS. A Narrative of Life in Confederate Prisons. The graphic and interesting story of one who had a long experience of what he wrote.

SCORPION GULCH: A GOLD-SEEKER'S STORY. Of the most intense personal interest, thrilling in incident, strange in adventure, and powerful in its delineations.

NATIVE GREATNESS: A POEM.

ASSASSINS AND THEIR WORK: RIENZI. An historical essay of great beauty and picturesqueness of narrative.

THE BELLE OF THE BALL: A POEM.

OLD STYLE AND NEW STYLE. A Dissertation and something else on Woman's Toilet. Elaborately illustrated, giving styles, Ancient and Modern, Heathen and Christian, of head-dresses and ornamentation—a very unique and useful paper.

MY ROYAL WIFE. A very amusing story of a young American who would marry into a Royal Family, and what became of him.

THE SPY SYSTEMS OF EUROPE. All about the Espionage over every person's coming and going exercised by European Governments, with a story illustrative at once of the perils of travel and thoroughness of the Spy System.

FIRST AND LAST. A Love Story.

A PLEA AND A PROTEST. A few historic citations and a few suggestions towards reform in our representative (Congressional) system, which will command attention.

CURRENT NOTES ON LITERATURE, BOOKS, SCIENCE, ART, etc.

All readers of Current Literature are solicited to examine this Magazine. Sold by all Newsdealers and Booksellers.

Price Twenty-five Cents.

BEADLE & COMPANY, PUBLISHERS,
118 William St., New York.

GAMES AND PUZZLES.

"Splendid for Children, and not bad for Old Folks."

MERRY'S BOOK OF PUZZLES.

Containing over 400 Puzzles, Enigmas, Anagrams, Hieroglyphics, Riddles, Labyrinths, and Conundrums—beautifully embellished with 100 choice illustrations, making the cheapest and best Puzzle Book ever issued. Price 30 cts. Sent by mail.

THREE MERRY MEN.

A New Game, developing Strange Adventures, Laughable Scenes, Witty Sayings Grotesque Appearances, Droll Misunderstandings, Humorous Events, and Comical Transformations. Easily Learned, Played by any Number, and Productive of the Greatest Sport. Price 25 cents. Sent by mail on receipt of price.

THE MOST LAUGHABLE THING ON EARTH.

A Game that can be played by any number of persons; is susceptible of 50,000 Changes, Endless Transformations of Wit and Humor, and invariably produces Roars of Laughter. Price 25 cents. Sent by mail on receipt of price.

MAGIC PICTURE CARDS.

Disclosing, upon close examination, much more than is at first seen! New, Unique, Curious, Puzzling, and Amusing. Price 30 cents, with Explanatory Key. Address

J. N. STEARNS, PUBLISHER,
111 Fulton Street, New York.

JANUARY NUMBER NOW READY.

Oldest, Cheapest, and Best!

MERRY'S MUSEUM FOR 1866.

TWENTY-SIXTH YEAR OF PUBLICATION.

This YOUNG PEOPLE'S FAVORITE having passed a QUARTER OF A CENTURY with the children and youth, commences a NEW VOLUME WITH THE JANUARY NUMBER, with increasing attractions for the little folks. Every number will be beautifully illustrated with choice Engravings, and will contain instructive Articles and entertaining Stories from some of the best writers for children in America.

A NEW STORY OF THRILLING ADVENTURES, by SOPHIE MAY, the charming writer for youth, entitled

"WILD OATS,"

will commence in the January number, and be continued through the year.

THE BOYHOOD OF LIEUT.-GEN. GRANT, by WILLIAM M. THAYER, in the January number, is worth the price of the Magazine.

THE MERRY OPTICIAN, by "M. E. D.," FRANK'S CONUNDRUM, by CATHERINE M. TROWBRIDGE, and other stories, will be found in the present number.

THE PUZZLE DRAWER, by FLETA FORRESTER, the Queen of Puzzlers, will be filled with Riddles, Anagrams, Prize Trials, Hieroglyphics, Labyrinths, etc., etc. Valuable prizes given every month for the solution of puzzles.

A FINE STEEL ENGRAVING OF LIEUT.-GEN. GRANT will be sent in the January number to all new subscribers. Splendid Premiums given for obtaining new subscribers, and liberal inducements to Agents.

$1 50 A YEAR IN ADVANCE. SINGLE COPIES, 15 CENTS.

NOW is the time to subscribe. Address

J. N. STEARNS, PUBLISHER,
111 Fulton Street, New York.

HURD & HOUGHTON,

401 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

PUBLISH THIS WEEK,

CHASTELARD,

A TRAGEDY.

BY ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE,

Author of "Atalanta in Calydon."

1 vol. 16mo, cloth, $1 50.

Mr. Swinburne, as a poet, has the promise of rare excellence.—Commercial Advertiser.

"Atalanta" was a mere marvel of literary execution, being removed by subject and treatment from the stirring life of to-day. "Chastelard" is a long step nearer home, its subject being one of the erratic loves of Mary of Scotland, presented with rare grace of diction and polish of style.—Springfield Republican.

 Copies free by mail on receipt of price.

"The best illustrated volume of the season."—Round Table, December 9.

A ROUND OF DAYS.

DALZIEL'S FINE ART GIFT-BOOK FOR 1866.

WIDDLETON, Publisher, 17 Mercer Street, New York,

Has a supply of this superb book, which will be disposed of at Retail. Also, an assortment of the leading

ILLUSTRATED GIFT-BOOKS OF THE YEAR,

together with a stock of our own Standard Works, suitable for Presents, in fine bindings, such as DISRAELI'S WORKS. 6 vols., half calt.

LAMB'S WORKS. 5 vols., half calf.
BYRON. (A fine Library Edition.) 4 vols., half calt.
EDGAR A. POE'S WORKS—Prose and Poetical—in a variety of styles and bindings.
PROF. WILSON'S WORKS. NOCTES AMBROSIANÆ.
DOCTOR DORAN'S WORKS. 9 vols., half calf.
HALLAM'S WORKS.
SYDNEY SMITH PRAED.
INGOLDSBY LEGENDS.

And many other leading and popular authors.

WIDDLETON, 17 Mercer, nearly opposite Howard St.

English Magazines, Newspapers, and Periodicals.

WILLMER & ROGERS,

47 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

(ESTABLISHED 1844),

Supply on Subscription every Magazine, Newspaper, or Periodical published in Great Britain or on the Continent of Europe.

PRICE-LIST FOR 1866 NOW READY.

THE BEST HOLIDAY GIFT

FOR

BOYS AND GIRLS

Is a Year's Subscription to

THE LITTLE CORPORAL.

Acknowledged by the leading papers to be the Best Children's Paper in America!

Published Monthly by

ALFRED L. SEWELL,

Chicago, Illinois.

PRICE ONE DOLLAR A YEAR, IN ADVANCE,
Including a
BEAUTIFUL STEEL ENGRAVING AS A PREMIUM TO EVERY SUBSCRIBER.

SAMPLE COPY, TEN CENTS.
CIRCULARS SENT FREE.

Every person who shall send six subscribers, and six dollars, will receive as a premium one extra copy for one year, and also a copy of the Engraving.

Other inducements for larger clubs.

All pages are electrotyped, and back numbers can always be furnished.

READ WHAT THE PAPERS SAY:

"It already excels every children's paper that we know of in this country."—Chicago Evening Journal.

THE LITTLE CORPORAL.—The Pittsburg Christian Advocate says: "The best paper for children published in this great country of ours, is The Little Corporal. It is a gem in the catalogue of monthlies."

Forney's Philadelphia Daily Press says of it: "The Little Corporal is destined to become the great children's paper of America."

"We cannot say too much in favor of this beautiful paper."—Bryan [O.] Press.

"The Little Corporal sparkles all over with vivacity and entertainment. It is, without doubt, the best and cheapest children's gazette published anywhere."—Marshall [Mich.] Statesman.

"THE LITTLE CORPORAL.—Though modestly calling itself by a subordinate title, it is really a very major-general among the children's magazines."—Chenango Telegraph [Norwich, N. Y.]

"The Little Corporal is the most interesting and instructive monthly in the Union."—Louisville Democrat.

"The Little Corporal is universally admitted to be the best juvenile paper now in existence."—Dubuque Daily Times.

"We like it better than ever."—N. W. C. Advocate.

"It strikes the right key, and is admirable—neither heavy nor silly, but simple, fresh, buoyant, and earnest."—Adams [N. Y.] Visitor.

"Its influence for good can never be estimated."—Grand Haven News.

"Indeed, there is no paper of the kind published that approaches it as a juvenile journal."—Poughkeepsie Daily Press.

"Of all the children's papers which are competitors for the patronage of the public, we know of no one which so nearly approximates to our standard of what such a paper should be. The terms are most liberal."—Batavia [N. Y.] Republican Advocate.

"The children will be better and happier from reading it."—Henry [Ill.] Courier.

"The Little Corporal really excels any child's paper we have seen. The premium picture is of itself worth a year's subscription."—Sandusky [O.] Reg.

"We consider it the best, decidedly the best, journal of the kind for children that we ever saw."—Star of the Valley [Newville, Pa.]

"We have the first two numbers of The Little Corporal, which are edited with unusual ability. They sparkle with originality, and are attractive on every page."—Worcester [Mass.] Palladium.

"The Little Corporal is the most readable and interesting and instructive paper for children we have ever perused."—Farmington [Maine] Chronicle.

"It is the cleverest thing of its kind yet realized in America."—Roxbury [Mass.] Journal.

"THE LITTLE CORPORAL.—Certainly, we have seen nothing in the shape of a child's paper which could compare with this, which comes to us from over the prairies."—Portland [Maine] Daily Press.

The above are only a tithe of the many beautiful notices our young soldier has received.

Address ALFRED L. SEWELL,
Care of Dunlop, Sewell & Spalding,
CHICAGO, ILL.

Now Ready,

THE NEW STORY BY THE AUTHOR OF THE "SCHÖNBERG-COTTA FAMILY," "DIARY OF KITTY TREVYLYAN," ETC., ENTITLED

WINIFRED BERTRAM,

AND THE WORLD SHE LIVED IN.

By the Author of the "Schönberg-Cotta Family."

1 vol. 12mo, $1 75.

The marvellous power of this author over her readers has been felt to their delight and profit by tens of thousands in our country. The beauty and truthfulness of her pictures of life, which have given her other volumes of this series, published by us, such wide and deserved popularity, are conspicuous in this new work.

ALSO BY THE SAME AUTHOR,

THE SONG WITHOUT WORDS;

LEAVES FROM A VERY OLD BOOK.

DEDICATED TO CHILDREN.

On tinted paper, beautifully illustrated, bound, $1.

M. W. DODD, 506 BROADWAY.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS OF PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL,

501 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

In addition to our main business of PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS, we are Headquarters for the following, viz.:

STEREOSCOPES AND STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS.

Of these we have an immense assortment, including War Scenes, American and Foreign Cities and Landscapes, Groups, Statuary, etc., etc.; also, Revolving Stereoscopes, for public or private exhibition. Our Catalogue will be sent to any address on receipt of

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS.

We were the first to introduce these into the United States, and we manufacture immense quantities in great variety, ranging in price from 50 cents to $50 each. Our ALBUMS have the reputation of being superior in beauty and durability to any others They will be sent by mail, FREE, on receipt of price.

☞ FINE ALBUMS MADE TO ORDER. ☜

CARD PHOTOGRAPHS.

Our Catalogue now embraces over FIVE THOUSAND different subjects, to which additions are continually being made of Portraits of Eminent Americans—viz., about

100 Major-Generals,	100 Lieut.-Colonels,	550 Statesmen
200 Brig.-Generals,	250 Other Officers,	130 Divines,
275 Colonels,	75 Navy Officers,	125 Authors,
40 Artists,	125 Stage,	50 Prominent Women.
	3,000 Copies of Works of Art,

including reproductions of the most celebrated Engravings, Paintings, Statues, etc. Catalogues sent on receipt of stamp. An order for One Dozen PICTURES from our Catalogue will be filled on the receipt of $1 80, and sent by mail FREE.

Photographers and others ordering goods C. O. D., will please remit twenty five per cent. of the amount with their orders.

☞ Soldiers' Pocket Albums for 18 pictures, 75 cents.

☞ The price and quality of our goods cannot fail to satisfy.

MONUMENTS TO

WASHINGTON AND LINCOLN,

built with twenty-four neatly-finished blocks, upon which are the faces of all the Presidents, the coats-of-arms of all the States, and a variety of printed matter. In a substantial box. Price $2.

"A beautiful HOLIDAY PRESENT and a neat PARLOR ORNAMENT."—N. Y. Evangelist.

THE PALACE OF SANTA CLAUS, AND DOMINOES.

Nine games and fifty puzzles. Price $1 25.

For sale by all booksellers and dealers in toys. On the receipt of $3 25 the two boxes will be sent by express, free of charge, to any place east of the Mississippi, by

OAKLEY & MASON,

21 Murray Street, N. Y.

TWO NEW EDITIONS

OF

PLAIDY'S TECHNICAL STUDIES

For the Piano-forte, from the newly corrected German copy, as used in the Conservatoriums of Leipzic and Munich, one edition having American Fingering, the other Foreign Fingering. This work is designed to facilitate the studies of both Professors and Amateurs. Price $2. If no preference is designated, the American copy will be sent

OLIVER DITSON & CO.,

277 Washington Street, Boston.

JUST PUBLISHED:

Cheap Music for Christmas Celebrations.

THREE BEAUTIFUL CAROLS.

1st—"IT CAME UPON THE MIDNIGHT CLEAR."
Price 5 cents; $3 per hundred.

2d—"THREE KINGS OF ORIENT."

3d—"GATHER AROUND THE CHRISTMAS TREE."
Both on one sheet. Price 5 cents; $3 per hundred.

Published by

H. G. ABBEY,

593 Broadway, N. Y.

STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS OF THE WAR,

obtained at great expense, and forming a

COMPLETE PHOTOGRAPHIC HISTORY

OF THE

GREAT UNION CONTEST.

Bull Run,	Dutch Gap,	Strawberry Plains,
Yorktown,	Pontoon Trains,	Deep Bottom,
Gettysburg,	Hanover Junction,	Belle Plain,
Fair Oaks,	Lookout Mountain,	Monitors,
Savage Station,	Chickahominy,	Chattanooga,
Fredericksburg,	City Point,	Fort Morgan,
Fairfax,	Nashville,	Atlanta,
Richmond,	Charleston,	Mobile,
Petersburg,	Etc., Etc.	Etc., Etc.

Everybody is interested in these memorable scenes.

Just published by

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

501 Broadway, New York.

☞ Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.

READY DECEMBER 15,

With 12 Photographic Illustrations by Willingale.

O MOTHER DEAR, JERUSALEM!

The old Hymn: its Origin and Genealogy.

EDITED BY

WILLIAM C. PRIME.

One Vol. small 4to. Only 300 Copies printed.

A. D. F. RANDOLPH,

770 Broadway, Cor. Ninth Street.

FINANCIAL REVIEW.

NATION OFFICE, Monday Morning, Dec. 11, 1865.

THE Secretary of the Treasury laid his annual report before Congress on the 5th inst. It contains the following returns and estimates:

FOR 1864–5.

RECEIPTS.		EXPENDITURES.
Balance in Treasury	$96,739,905	War Department	$1,031,323,360
Receipts from Customs	84,928,260	Navy	122,567,776
" Direct Tax	1,200,573	Interest on Public Debt	77,397,712
" Internal Revenue	209,464,215	Civil Service	44,765,558
" Lands	996,553	Pensions, etc	14,258,575
" Miscellaneous	32,978,284	Balance in Treasury	858,309
Deficit	864,863,500
	$1,291,171,290		$1,291,171,290

FOR 1865–6.

Balance in Treasury	$858,309	War Department	$473,157,987
Receipts from Customs	147,009,583	Navy	51,520,669
" Internal Revenue	271,618,885	Interest on Debt	132,987,349
" Direct Tax	31,111	Civil Service	43,565,512
" Lands	632,890	Pensions, etc	18,281,031
" Miscellaneous	48,393,729
Deficit	250,968,041
	$719,512,548		$719,512,548

FOR 1866–7.

Receipts from Customs	$100,000,000	War Department	$39,017,416
" Internal Revenue	275,000,000	Navy	43,982,457
" Lands	1,000,000	Interest on Debt	141,542,068
" Miscellaneous	20,000,000	Civil Service	42,165,599
		Pensions, etc	17,609,640
		Surplus	111,682,818
	$396,000,000		$396,000,000

The deficit of 1864–5 was supplied by loans; of that of 1865–6, $138,773,097 have already been supplied in the same way, leaving $112,194,944 yet to be borrowed. With regard to the disposal of the surplus of 1866–7, the Secretary suggests that the entire debt should be funded into one general stock, bearing interest at the rate of 5 or 5½ per cent., and that a sum of $200,000,000 be annually set apart for the payment of the interest and the reduction of the principal; he shows that this method would pay off the entire debt in about thirty-two years, if it were funded at 5½ per cent., and in twenty-eight years if it were funded at 5 per cent. He strongly urges a specific appropriation of this amount of money, and recommends the repeal of the dead-letter statute ordering a Sinking Fund. With regard to the currency, the Secretary advises Congress to institute a policy of contraction, by declaring the compound-interest notes no longer a legal tender after their maturity, and by authorizing the Secretary to sell six per cent. bonds from time to time for United States notes, and to cancel the latter as fast as received. He replies to the popular arguments against contraction; contends that the public revenues will not be thereby diminished; that being gradual, it need not involve a commercial crisis; that it may embarrass the national banks, but it is "better to embarrass them now than bankrupt them two years hence;" that, without it, the country is rushing headlong to ruin; that labor is diminishing and speculation taking its place; that contraction would impart stability to industry and safety to trade. He assumes that the compound legal tenders being out of the way, a reduction of $200,000,000 of United States notes would cause gold to fall to par. He appears to believe that the Department could negotiate this amount of 6 per cent. bonds within the next three years, and at the same time take care of the $1,200,000,000 of short notes and bonds which mature in 1866, 1867, and 1868. He does not recommend an increase of national bank currency, but suggests that his policy of contraction will compel such a curtailment of national bank issues at the North as will leave for the South an adequate share of the $300,000,000 already authorized. With regard to taxes, he recommends a simplification of the internal revenue laws, by modifying some of the leading taxes, and removing a number of minor imposts which produce much vexation and little revenue. He does not appear to contemplate a larger revenue from internal taxes than $275,000,000. He recommends no changes in the tariff.

Such are the leading points in Mr. McCulloch's report. It is very favorably viewed in Wall Street, though grave doubts are entertained with regard to the possibility of contracting the currency by the negotiation of long loans —at least until the short-date liabilities of Government have been got out of the way. Foreign bankers intimate that the exhibit of our financial position and prospects will exercise a favorable influence upon the European markets for our securities, and that the receipt of the report will probably revive the European demand for 5-20 bonds. At present prices there is a profit on their importation from England.

Some regret is expressed in certain quarters that the Secretary did not hint at the propriety of a revision of the tariff, with a view to the reduction of duties which were imposed for mere protective purposes, and which neither yield revenue to the Government nor conduce to the benefit of the people. In view, however, of the composition of the Congressional Committee of Ways and Means, there is but little ground for hoping that such a recommendation, had it been made, would have met with favorable consideration.

In national bank circles the report is naturally viewed with disfavor, These institutions have been doing a lucrative business on the basis of Government deposits, and a pretty broad license to issue irredeemable paper; the policy of the Secretary, if carried out, would involve a general bank contraction, a liberal withdrawal of currency from circulation, and, consequently, a material reduction in bank dividends. It is understood that influential parties interested in national banks have gone to Washington to plead the case of the national institutions before the commitees of Congress; some weeks must elapse before a trustworthy opinion can be formed with regard to the prospects of their success or failure.

The following table will show the course of prices in the stock, gold exchange, and money markets during the week:

	Dec. 2.	Dec. 9.	Advance.	Decline.
United States Sixes of 1881	106⅜	107⅛	1	....
5-20 Bonds, old	101⅛	102⅜	1¼	....
5-20 Bonds of 1865	99⅛	99⅝	⅛	....
10-40 Bonds	90⅜	91¼	⅞	....
7-30 Notes, second series	96⅜	96⅞	⅜	....
New York Central	97⅛	96¾	....	¾
Erie Railway	92	92⅛	⅛	....
Hudson River	108¾	108¼	....	½
Reading Railroad	115⅜	117¼	1⅞	....
Michigan Southern	75¾	74⅜	....	1⅜
Cleveland and Pittsburg	92¾	93¼	½	....
Chicago and North-Western	36	35¼	....	¾
" " " Preferred	64¼	63¼	....	1⅛
Chicago and Rock Island	107	105¾	....	1¼
P., Fort Wayne and Chicago	105¼	105⅛	....	⅛
Canton	46	45⅝	....	⅜
Cumberland	43¾	43⅛	....	⅝
Mariposa	16	14¾	....	1¼
American Gold	148¾	144¾	....	3⅛
Bankers' Bills on London	109	109⅛	⅛	....
Call Loans	7	7	....	....

The feature of the week has been a general advance in Governments, based mainly on the favorable light in which the President's message has been viewed. Before its publication, it had been generally reported that it would take strong ground both on the Mexican question and on the Alabama dispute; and many holders were sellers on this expectation. Disappointed by the calm and statesmanlike utterances of the Executive on these questions, these parties have since become buyers, and prices have consequently advanced from ½ to 1¼ per cent. The general course of miscellaneous shares has been downward, with a few exceptions. Reading advanced on Saturday to 117¼, on a rumor that the directors had agreed upon a dividend of 10 per cent. in money and 5 per cent. in scrip. As they do not meet till to-day, the rumor was of course premature, though it is not unlikely that Mr. Moses Taylor and his friends may carry their point and insist upon a larger dividend than 10 per cent. Pittsburg and Erie continue to fluctuate actively; both, at the close on Saturday, were a fraction higher than they were a week ago. A small parcel of Erie arrived last week from London. Most of the railway shares declined on the general theory that the tendency of the policy of Government is towards contraction and lower prices. The heaviest decline was in Southern Michigan, which is being severely hammered by parties supposed to represent managing directors; in Rock Island, of which a large block is being distributed; in Mariposa, which seems to be gradually sinking back to old figures; and in North-West Preferred, on which a dividend was expected ere this. The volume of business done in the Street was small. Both bulls and bears seem confident in their position, though neither at present evince a disposition to demonstrate against the enemy.

Gold advanced last Monday to 148¾ on the report that the President would recommend to Congress a policy toward France which was likely to provoke an angry controversy, if not actual hostilities. On the receipt of the message, the speculators who had been buyers on the false report appeared in the market as sellers, and the Government brokers offering considerable parcels at the same time, the price declined steadily to 144½, closing Saturday at 144¾. Exchange remained pretty steady at 109 to 109⅛ for bankers' bills. The importations last week were lighter than usual, falling considerably below the corresponding week of the two last years. As the holidays approach, general business relapses into quiet; but if no change takes place in the money market, importers and jobbers feel confident that we shall have a handsome spring trade.

FISK & HATCH,

BANKERS,

AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,

AND

AGENTS FOR THE SALE OF

THE 7.30 POPULAR LOAN

5 NASSAU STREET,

(Continental Bank Building, near Wall Street).

DEPOSITS RECEIVED, COLLECTIONS MADE.

ALL KINDS OF UNITED STATES

AND OTHER POPULAR

FIRST CLASS SECURITIES

BOUGHT AND SOLD AT MARKET RATES.

FOURTH NATIONAL BANK,

27 & 29 PINE ST., NEW YORK,

Has for sale U. S. 7 3-10 Notes, all sizes; also, One Year Certificates and all other Government Loans.

P. C. CALHOUN, President.

B. SEAMAN, Cashier.

ANTHONY LANE, Asst. Cashier.

GIFTS FOR CHRISTMAS AND NEW YEAR'S.

The interchange of presents among friends is the very surest cement of friendship. To confer a gift proves forethought, a desire to please, to serve, to be useful to a friend. Every one desires to be thought of by his or her friends when absent. To provide a present for a friend who is at a distance, is the most certain proof that you are thinking of that person.

If to think of our friends' present tastes, when at a distance from them, is to show a sincere concern for them, how much more strongly would this concern be manifested if we showed that our interest in them extended away into the future, and provided not for their mere personal gratification, but for their permanent welfare.

No better time could be chosen for advancing the generous principle of Life Insurance as applied to a provision for a wife or family.

If you stand in the relation of parent, can you manifest your affection for a married son or daughter better than by presenting him or her, as a gift, with the means of effecting a Life policy, for the protection of the young family?

If you stand in the relation of a wealthy brother or friend, can you not find an opportunity of making such a gift in a manner that will render it an acceptable compliment and an enduring benefit?

THE UNION MUTUAL

is one of those well-established and prudently managed Life Insurance Companies which distinguish this nation for enlightened benevolence, practical wisdom, and disinterested philanthropy. It offers superior advantages to the life-insuring public. It is based upon fundamental principles of soundness, and gives abundant security in large accumulated funds. Through the admirable economy of its management large dividends are secured to policy-holders. It is prompt in payment of losses, and accommodates the assured in the settlement of their premiums in life policies, by receiving a note for one-half, when the premium amounts to over $30.

THE UNION MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

This is one of the oldest wholly Mutual Life Insurance Companies in the United States, and has been uniformly successful, having always made large returns in Cash dividends to all the policy-holders.

NEW YORK OFFICE, 151 BROADWAY.

J. W. & H. JUDD, GENERAL AGENTS.

ATLANTIC MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY,

51 WALL STREET, cor. of William, NEW YORK,

JANUARY, 1865.

Insures against Marine and Inland Navigation Risks.

The WHOLE PROFITS of the Company revert to the ASSURED, and are divided ANNUALLY, upon the Premiums terminated during the year, and for which Certificates are issued, BEARING INTEREST until redeemed.

The Dividend was 40 per cent. in each of the years 1863, 4 and 5.

The Profits for 22 years amount to the sum of	$19,691,020
Of which there has been redeemed by Cash	12,653,730

The Company has—

ASSETS, OVER ELEVEN MILLION DOLLARS,

Viz.:

United States and State of New York Stock, City, Bank, and other Stocks	$4,974,700
Loans secured by Stocks and otherwise	2,187,950
Premium Notes and Bills Receivable, Real Estate, Bond and Mortgages, and other securities	3,140,530
United States Gold Coin	541,890
Cash in Bank	288,430
	$11,135,500

TRUSTEES.

John D. Jones,	Daniel S. Miller,	Cornelius Grinnell,
Charles Dennis,	Joshua J. Henry,	C. A. Hand,
W. H. H. Moore,	Geo. G. Hobson,	Watts Sherman,
Henry Coit,	David Lane,	B. J. Howland,
Wm. C. Pickersgill,	James Bryce,	Benj. Babcock,
Lewis Curtis,	Wm. Sturgis,	Fletcher Westray,
Charles H. Russell,	Henry K. Bogert,	Robt. B. Minturn, Jr.,
Lowell Holbrook,	William E. Dodge,	Gordon W. Burnham,
R. Warren Weston,	Dennis Perkins,	Frederick Chauncey,
Royal Phelps,	Joseph Gaillard, Jr.,	James Low,
Caleb Barstow,	J. Henry Burgy,	Charles H. Marshall,
	. P. Pill ot.

JOHN D. JONES, President.
CHARLES DENNIS, Vice-Presiden.
W. H. H. MOORE, 2d Vice-Pres't.

J. H. CHAPMAN, Acting Secretary.

Insurance Scrip.

WILLIAM C. GILMAN,
46 PINE STREET, NEW YORK,
BUYS AND SELLS INSURANCE SCRIP.

HOME
INSURANCE COMPANY
OF NEW YORK,
OFFICE, 135 BROADWAY.

Cash Capital,	$2,000,000 00
Assets, 1st Jan., 1865,	3,765,503 42
Liabilities,	77,901 52

FIRE, MARINE, and INLAND

INSURANCE.

Agencies at all important points throughout the United States.

CHAS. J. MARTIN, PRESIDENT.
A. F. WILMARTH, VICE-PRESIDENT.
JOHN McGEE, Secretary.
J. H. WASHBURN, Assistant Secretary.
W. C. NICOLL, Superintendent Marine Department.

Marine and Fire Insurance.

METROPOLITAN INSURANCE COMPANY,
108 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Cash Capital,	$1,000,000
Surplus, over	400,000

This Company ensures at customary rates of premium against ALL MARINE AND INLAND NAVIGATION RISKS on CARGO or FREIGHT; also, against LOSS or DAMAGE by FIRE.

IF PREMIUMS ARE PAID IN GOLD, LOSSES WILL BE PAID IN GOLD.

The Assured receive 75 per cent. of the net profits without incurring any liability, or in lieu thereof, at their option, a liberal discount upon the premium.

All losses equitably adjusted and promptly paid.

SCRIP DIVIDEND, declared Jan. 10, 1865, FIFTY per cent.

JAMES LORIMER GRAHAM, President.
ROBERT M. C. GRAHAM, Vice-President.
JAMES LORIMER GRAHAM, JR., 2d Vice-President.
HENRY H. PORTER, Secretary.

THE
MORRIS FIRE AND INLAND INSURANCE COMPANY
COLUMBIAN BUILDING, 1 NASSAU STREET.

JUNE 1, 1865.

AUTHORIZED CAPITAL, $5,000,000.

CASH CAPITAL, PAID IN, AND SURPLUS, $885,040 57.

POLICIES OF INSURANCE AGAINST LOSS OR DAMAGE BY FIRE
Issued on the most Favorable Terms.

WM. M. WHITNEY, Secretary. B. C. MORRIS, President.

E. W CLARK & CO.,
BANKERS AND BROKERS,

35 SOUTH THIRD STREET, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS AND TREASURY NOTES, CERTIFICATES OF INDEBTEDNESS, QUARTERMASTERS' VOUCHERS, COMPOUND INTEREST NOTES.

STOCKS and BONDS of all kinds BOUGHT and SOLD on COMMISSION.

HOFFMAN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.
Office, 161 Broadway, New York.

Cash Capital,	$200,000

JOSEPH W WILDEY, Secretary. WILLIAM B. DIXON, President.

NIAGARA FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY,

OFFICE, 12 WALL STREET.

CASH CAPITAL INCREASED TO - - - - - - - - $1,000,000
SURPLUS, JAN. 1, 1865, - - - - - - - - - 275,253

Losses equitably adjusted and promptly paid.
CHARTERED 1850.
Cash Dividends paid in fourteen years, 248 per cent.

P. NOTMAN, Secretary. JONATHAN D. STEELE, President.

PHENIX INSURANCE COMPANY,

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

OFFICES, 1 COURT STREET, BROOKLYN, N. Y.
" 139 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

CASH CAPITAL - - - - - - - - - - - - $1,000,000 00
ASSETS - - - - - - - - - - - - - - 1,500,000 00

Insurance against Loss by Fire, Marine, Lake, Canal, and Inland Transportation.

STEPHEN CROWELL, President. EDGAR W. CROWELL, Vice-President.
PHILANDER SHAW, Secretary.

BROWN, BROTHERS & CO.,

56 WALL STREET,

Issue, in New York, Circular Credits for Travellers, available in any part of the world

The Nation:

A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

THIS journal will not be the organ of any party, sect, or body. It will, on the contrary, make an earnest effort to bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit, and to wage war upon the vices of violence, exaggeration and misrepresentation by which so much of the political writing of the day is marred.

The criticism of books and works of art will form one of its most prominent features; and pains will be taken to have this task performed in every case by writers possessing special qualifications for it.

A special correspondent, who has been selected for his work with care, is pursuing a journey through the South. His letters appear every week, and he is charged with the duty of simply reporting what he sees and hears, leaving the public as far as possible to draw its own inferences.

It is intended, in the interest of investors, as well as of the public generally, to have questions of trade and finance treated every week by a writer whose position and character will give his articles an exceptional value, and render them a safe and trustworthy guide.

TERMS:—Six Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Four Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, PUBLISHER,

130 Nassau street, N. Y.

ONE PRICE ONLY.

Writing Paper cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Envelopes cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Blank Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Memorandum Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street
Pens and Pencils cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Pocket-Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Portfolios cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Cash Boxes cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Stationers' Tinware cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Account Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Black, Blue, and Red Ink cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau St.
Arnold & Boss's Fluid cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau St.
Scrap Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.

EDWARDS'S WHITE SUGAR-CURED
WASHINGTON HAMS
w ready for sale.
Name branded in full.
ALSO ALL KINDS OF SMOKED MEATS.
GEORGE W. EDWARDS,
227 and 229 Christie Street, N. Y.

SERPENTS DI PHARAON,
OR,
SERPENTS' EGGS.

The scientific Miracle of the Age! On lighting the cone, a small snake uncoils itself.
"They are truly marvellous and apparently inexhaustible."—London Times.
Wholesale and Retail by OLDEN & SAWYER,
246 Canal Street, New York.
Price 50 cents a Box, mailed free. A liberal discount to the trade. Agents wanted.

AMERICAN WATCHES.

J. H. JOHNSTON & CO., 150 BOWERY, N. Y., sell at lowest rates
American Gold and Silver Watches,
English Lever Watches,
Fine Swiss Watches.
The handsomest Detached Lever Watch in the market for $25.
PURE GOLD WEDDING RINGS.
Fine Jewelry, diamonds, silver ware, and best quality silver-plated ware of our own manufacture.
Articles sent free of expense to all parts of the country, and satisfaction guaranteed.

WILLIAM SELLERS & CO.,

1,600 HAMILTON STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
MACHINISTS', FOUNDERS', SMITHS' and BOILER-MAKERS' TOOLS.
SHAFTING, with Ball and Socket Bearings and Double Cone Vice-Couplings, admitting of the easiest possible adjustment.
A complete assortment of PULLEY and WHEEL PATTERNS, from which Castings or finished work will be furnished.
RAILWAY EQUIPMENTS, TURNING and TRANSFER TABLES, and PIVOT BRIDGES.
Sole Manufacturers and Licensees of
GIFFARD'S INJECTOR,
For Feeding Boilers.
WILLIAM SELLERS. JOHN SELLERS, JR.

BOYNTON'S FURNACES.

Boynton's Brick and Portable Furnaces, Fire-place and Parlor Heaters, Kitcheners, Ranges, Parlor and Office Stoves, are warranted o give satisfaction. Send for circular.
RICHARDSON, BOYNTON & CO.,
234 Water Street, near Beekman, New York.

Economical Housekeepers Use

PYLE'S SALERATUS, | PYLE'S O. K. SOAP.
PYLE'S CREAM TARTAR. | PYLE'S BLUEING POWDER.

Articles designed for all who want the best goods, full weight. Sold by best Grocers everywhere. Each package bears the name of JAMES PYLE, Manufacturer, New York.

KEYS'
AMERICAN UNION WRITING FLUID,
AND COPYING INKS.
THE CHEAPEST AND THE BEST.
Always clean, and flowing freely from the pen, these inks are rapidly taking the place of all others, and merit the special attention of the penman.
On trial they will be found superior in every respect to the imported inks now in use.
REEVES & CO.,
(Successors to J. G. Keys,)
MANUFACTURERS AND SOLE PROPRIETORS,
303 Washington Street (near Reade), N. Y.

The Fourth Exhibition in New York

of FRENCH, ENGLISH, and FLEMISH PICTURES is open daily from 9 A.M. to 5 P.M., and on Monday and Thursday evenings from 7 to 10, at the Studio Building, 15 Tenth Street. F. J. PILGERAM, Secretary.
E. GAMBART, Director.

MAKE YOUR OWN SOAP WITH
B. T. BABBITT'S
Pure Concentrated Potash,
OR READY SOAP-MAKER.
Warranted double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other saponifier or lye in the market. Put up in cans of one pound, two pounds, three pounds, six pounds, and twelve pounds, with full directions in English and German for making Hard and Soft Soap. One pound will make fifteen gallons of Soft Soap. No lime is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest Potash in market.
B. T. BABBITT,
64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington st., N. Y.

Bradbury's Pianos "the Best."

Pronounced "THE BEST" by the most renowned artists. "SUPERIOR in tone, touch, power, DURABILITY, and elegance of finish." Warerooms 425 and 427 Broome Street, corner of Crosby. Call or send for circular.
WM. B. BRADBURY.

Steele & Co.'s
PATENT FEATHER DUSTERS.
EXTRA FURNITURE DUSTERS, CARRIAGE DUSTERS, PIANO, CORNICE, AND COUNTER DUSTERS. 300 VARIETIES FOR STORE, HOTEL, AND HOUSEHOLD USE AT ALL PRICES.
3 PARK ROW,
Opposite Astor House, N. Y.

THE MUSICAL INSTITUTE,
OF PROVIDENCE, R. I.,
Affords rare facilities for obtaining a
THOROUGH MUSICAL EDUCATION.
Send for Circulars and Catalogue. Address
EBEN TOURJEE, Providence, R. I.

PHELPS, DODGE & CO.,
Importers and Dealers in
TIN-PLATE, SHEET-IRON, COPPER, BLOCK-TIN, WIRE, AND METALS GENERALLY;
Manufacturers of
COPPER, BRASS, and WIRE,
19 and 21 Cliff st., New York.

WILLIAM KNABE & CO.'S

GRAND, Celebrated Gold Medal SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT

PIANOS.

These instruments have been for thirty years before the public, in competition with other instruments of first-class makers. They have, throughout that long period, maintained their reputation among the profession and the public as being unsurpassed in every quality found in a first-class Piano.

650 BROADWAY,

AND

CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE, CHICAGO, ILL

J. BAUER & CO., Agents.

SPECIAL GOLD MEDAL.

(From Watson's Weekly Art Journal.)

AWARDS TO MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—A Gold Medal was awarded, at the late Fair of the American Institute, to CARHART, NEEDHAM & CO., for the best Reed Instrument on exhibition—a most just testimonial.

"They are an exceedingly good substitute for an Organ, and I can speak of them in the highest terms."
GEO. W. MORGAN.

"I have found them to be the finest Instruments of the class I ever saw." GEO. F. BRISTOW.

"They are entitled to be ranked as the first and best among instruments of their class." WM. A. KING.

"The tone is incomparable, and they are far in advance of any other instrument of a similar kind."
CHARLES FRADEL.

THE PARLOR ORGAN,

with the recent improvements of Mr. J Carhart, is, without exception, far superior in QUALITY, POWER, SWEETNESS, VARIETY and EXPRESSION OF TONE, DURABILITY OF CONSTRUCTION, ELEGANCE OF CASE—POSSESSING IMPROVEMENTS APPLIED BY US ONLY.

A Descriptive Catalogue and Price List sent by mail.

CARHART, NEEDHAM & CO.,
97 East Twenty-third St., New York.

PIANOS.

RAVEN & BACON'S PIANO-FORTES.

(ESTABLISHED 1829.)

A full assortment of these Instruments, which have been well known in the New York market for more than thirty years, constantly on hand. We are continually adding improvements to our Pianos, and our facilities enable us to furnish them at terms and prices satisfactory to purchasers. Pictorial circulars sent by mail.

Wareroom, 135 Grand St., near Broadway, New York.

The Horace Waters

Grand, Square, and Upright PIANOS, MELODEONS, HARMONIUMS, and CABINET ORGANS. Wholesale and retail, at reduced prices. To let, and rent allowed if purchased. Monthly payments received for the same. Second-hand Pianos at bargains, prices $60, $75, $100, $125, $150, $175, $200, and $225. Factory and Warerooms, 481 Broadway. Cash paid for second-hand Pianos.

COOKING AND HEATING BY GAS.

EAGLE GAS COOKING STOVES AND RANGES,

GUARANTEED TO BAKE PERFECTLY.

HEATING STOVES, GUARANTEED TO HEAT ROOMS PERFECTLY.

Also,

KEROSENE OIL COOKING STOVES,

The best in market, have regular SIDE OVENS, and guaranteed to BAKE PERFECTLY, and not to Smoke or Smell.

EAGLE GAS STOVE MFG. CO.,
474 Broadway, N. Y.

☞ Illustrated Catalogues sent free.

ESTABLISHED IN 1823.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT PIANOS.

At the Great Mechanics' Fair, held in Boston in October, 1865, Messrs. CHICKERING & SONS were awarded

THE FIRST GOLD MEDAL

For the BEST GRAND PIANOS.

The FIRST SILVER MEDAL
For the BEST SQUARE PIANOS.

The FIRST SILVER MEDAL
For the BEST UPRIGHT PIANOS.

This Fair called forth an UNUSUAL COMPETITION—35 Pianos being represented. The report of the judges is very thorough and very decided on the merits of the CHICKERING PIANO.

THE MICHIGAN STATE FAIR, of 1865, awards Chickering & Sons THREE FIRST PRIZES.

THE INDIANA STATE FAIR, of 1865, awards Chickering & Sons THREE FIRST PRIZES.

THE IOWA STATE FAIR, of 1865, awards Chickering & Sons TWO FIRST PRIZES.

THE WISCONSIN STATE FAIR, of 1865, awards Chickering & Sons TWO FIRST PRIZES.

FOURTEEN FIRST-CLASS GOLD AND SILVER MEDALS IN THE MONTHS OF SEPTEMBER AND OCTOBER, 1865.

Making a total of FIFTY-FIVE PRIZE MEDALS awarded to CHICKERING & SONS, as

FIRST PREMIUMS OVER ALL COMPETITION for the SUPERIORITY OF THEIR PIANOS.

OPINIONS OF EMINENT ARTISTS.

THALBERG.

"I consider Chickering & Sons' Pianos, beyond comparison, the best I have ever seen in America."

GOTTSCHALK.

"I consider Chickering & Sons' Pianos superior to any in the world."

WEHLI.

"I believe that, in every particular, your Pianos are superior to any I have ever seen in this country or in Europe."

SATTER.

"For volume and fine quality of tone, with nicety of articulation, the Chickering Pianos are unequalled."

BASSINI.

"I always use and always recommend your Pianos to my pupils and friends."

MUZIO.

"I consider your Pianos the finest I have ever played upon."

Watson's Art Journal, of November 11, in its criticism of Mme. Abel's concert, says: "Madame Abel performed on the new Chickering Grand, which took the Gold Medal at the Fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanics' Association, held at Boston last month.

"IT IS THE NOBLEST INSTRUMENT WE EVER HEARD IN A CONCERT-ROOM.

"Grand in power, without noise; capable of sustaining any amount of forcing, without losing the rich purity of its tones; clear, bright, and beautiful throughout the entire range, every tone is a pearl of sound, sympathetic and vocal as the finest human voice cultivated to the highest point of perfection."

AGRAFFE BRIDGE.

Pianos with or without the Agraffe Bridge, which we have constantly used for the past twelve years.

WAREROOMS.

652 BROADWAY, N. Y.
246 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.
914 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

GROVER & BAKER'S

SEWING MACHINES

WERE AWARDED THE HIGHEST PREMIUMS
At the State Fairs of

New York,	Illinois,	Virginia,
New Jersey,	Michigan,	N. Carolina,
Vermont,	Wisconsin,	Tennessee,
Pennsylvania,	Iowa,	Alabama,
Ohio,	Kentucky,	Oregon,
Indiana,	Missouri,	California,

And at numerous Institute and County Fairs, including all the Fairs at which they were exhibited the past three years.

The GROVER & BAKER ELASTIC-STITCH SEWING MACHINE is superior to all others, for the following reasons:

1. The seam is stronger and more elastic than any other.
2. It is more easily managed, and is capable of doing a greater variety and range of work than any other.
3. It is capable of doing all the varieties of sewing done by other machines, and, in addition, executes beautiful embroidery and ornamental work.

GROVER & BAKER S. M. CO.,
495 Broadway, New York.

THE BEST SEWING-MACHINES IN THE WORLD.

THE WEED MACHINES,

With all their valuable improvements, entirely overcome all imperfections. They are superior to all others for family and manufacturing purposes, simple in construction, durable in all their parts, and readily understood. They have certainty of stitch on all kinds of fabrics, and are adapted to a wide range of work without change or adjustment, using all kinds of thread. Will hem, fell, bind, gather, braid, tuck, quilt, cord, and, in fact, do all kinds of work required by families or manufacturers. We invite all persons in search of an instrument to execute any kind of sewing now done by machinery to inspect them, and recommend all parties engaging in the sale of sewing-machines to make sure they secure the best by examining the WEED before purchasing. They make the shuttle-stitch, which cannot be excelled for firmness, elasticity, durability, and elegance of finish. They have received the highest premiums in every instance where they have been exhibited in competition with other standard machines. The company being duly licensed, the machines are protected against infringements or litigation.

Reliable agents wanted, to whom we offer great inducements. Every explanation will be cheerfully given to all, whether they wish to purchase or not. Descriptive circulars, together with specimens of their work, will be furnished to all who desire them by mail or otherwise.

WEED SEWING-MACHINE CO.,
STORE, 506 BROADWAY, N. Y.

FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE CO.,

505 BROADWAY, N. Y.

THE BEST FAMILY MACHINE IN THE WORLD.

Wonderful REVERSIBLE FEED MOTION. SELF-ADJUSTING Tension. No Snarling and Breaking Threads. FOUR distinct Stitches.

WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES,

625 BROADWAY, N. Y.,

MAKE THE

LOCK-STITCH,

and rank highest on account of the elasticity, permanence, beauty, and general desirableness of the stitching, when done, and the wide range of its application.—Report of American Institute.

FINKLE & LYON'S

IMPROVED

LOCK-STITCH SEWING-MACHINE.

N. B.—Money refunded if the Machine is not preferred to any in market for family use.
AGENTS WANTED. 538 Broadway, N. Y.

Lock-Stitch Sewing Machines

FOR FAMILIES AND MANUFACTURERS.

THE HOWE MACHINE COMPANY,

ELIAS HOWE, Jr., Pres.,

629 BROADWAY.

Agents wanted.

SCHOOL FURNITURE!

Lecture-Room and Sabbath-School Settees

IN EVERY STYLE,

MANUFACTURED BY

ROBERT PATON,

24 GROVE STREET, NEW YORK.

DEMULCENT SOAP,

FOR CHAPPED AND TENDER HANDS,

FOR TOILET AND BATH USE.

MANUFACTURED ONLY BY

J. C. HULL'S SON,

32 PARK ROW, N. Y.

Upwards of 100 styles of Toilet and Staple Soaps. For sale by all Dealers.

Pacific Mail Steamship Company's

THROUGH LINE

TO CALIFORNIA,

TOUCHING AT MEXICAN PORTS,

AND CARRYING THE U. S. MAIL,

Leave Pier No. 42 North River, foot of Canal Street, at 12 o'clock noon, on the 1st, 11th, and 21st of every month (except when those dates fall on Sunday, and then on the preceding SATURDAY), for ASPINWALL, connecting, via Panama Railroad, with one of the Company's steamships from Panama for SAN FRANCISCO, touching at ACAPULCO.

DECEMBER.

1st.—HENRY CHAUNCEY, Captain Gray, connecting with CONSTITUTION, Captain Farnsworth.

11th.—ATLANTIC, Captain Maury, connecting with GOLDEN CITY, Captain Bradbury.

21st.—NEW YORK, Captain Horner, connecting with COLORADO, Captain Watkins.

Departures of 1st and 21st connect at Panama with steamers for SOUTH PACIFIC PORTS. Those of 1st touch at MANZANILLO.

Through Passage Rates, in Currency.

	First Cabin,	Second Cabin,	Steerage,
On Steamers....	$325.	$225.	$100.

Panama Railroad ticket invariably $25 additional, in currency.

A discount of ONE-FIFTH from steamers' rates allowed to second-cabin and steerage passengers with families.

One Hundred Pounds Baggage allowed each adult. Baggage-masters accompany baggage through, and attend to ladies and children without male protectors. Baggage received on the dock the day before sailing, from steamboats, railroads, and passengers, who prefer to send down early.

An experienced Surgeon on Board. Medicines and attendance free.

A steamer will be placed on the line January 1, 1866, to run from NEW ORLEANS to ASPINWALL, via HAVANA.

For Passage tickets or further information apply at the Company's ticket office, on the wharf foot of Canal Street, North River.

F. W. G. BELLOWS, AGENT.

Improvements in Piano-fortes.

One of the simplest and most truly valuable improvements yet made in the Piano-forte is that invented and patented by

DECKER BROTHERS, 91 BLEECKER STREET,

in this city. By correcting the only imperfections arising from the use of the full iron-plate, and that, too, by not detracting in the slightest degree from its many positive advantages, the Messrs. DECKER have developed in their instruments a tone at once admirable for its purity, fulness, prolongation, and sweetness, and the high estimation in which their improvement is held is well shown in the rapidly increasing business of their firm.—Tribune.

MARVIN'S

PATENT FIRE AND BURGLAR SAFE.

Superior to any others in the following particulars
They are more fire-proof.
They are more burglar-proof.
They are perfectly dry.
They do not lose their fire-proof qualities by age.
Manufactured only by

MARVIN & CO., 265 Broadway.
721 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

Send for a descriptive Circular.

NEW YORK

LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY,

112 AND 114 BROADWAY.

This is one of the oldest institutions of the kind in America, having been chartered in 1841, and commenced business in May, 1845.

EVERY ONE SHOULD ENSURE.

While we live we may protect those dependent upon us; but when death severs the tie of all others most dear, it is a consolation to know that our prudence and foresight have made provision for the wants to which we can no longer minister; and the man who has the power, and neglects the opportunity, of providing in this way for the comfort and independence of his family, fails in the duty which he owes to them and himself. Therefore let every one who has not obtained a policy of Insurance upon his life no longer neglect this imperative duty. GREAT CARE SHOULD BE MANIFESTED IN THE SELECTION OF A COMPANY.

The

NEW YORK LIFE INSURANCE CO.

Offers the following highly important essentials:

It is a strictly Mutual Company;
It has had Twenty Years' Business Experience;
It has large Accumulated Assets;
It gives Liberal Assistance in the payment of Premiums;
Its Dividends are declared Annually;
It is prompt in the Payment of all Losses.

IN FACT,

Special care in the selection of its risks, strict economy, and a safe and judicious investment of its funds, emphatically characterize the management of this Company.

Assets over

$4,500,000.

Annual Dividend, January 1, 1865,

50 PER CENT.

Amount Returned Premiums (Dividends) paid,

$1,700,000.

Amount Claims by Death paid,

$3,500,000.

During its existence it has issued

Over 36,000 Policies.

TEN-YEARS NON-FORFEITING POLICIES.

The New York Life Insurance Company originated, and was the first to bring before the public, the Ten-Year Non-forfeiting Plan, which has so fully commended itself to the judgment of thinking men that it has become the most popular mode of assurance, and is rapidly superseding the old method of life-long payment. It has received THE UNQUALIFIED APPROVAL OF THE BEST BUSINESS MEN OF THE LAND, large numbers of whom have taken out Policies under it as an investment.

TEN-YEARS NON-FORFEITING PLAN.

A Party ensuring by this table, after the second year, cannot forfeit any part of what has been paid in, and his policy becomes a source of income to him while living.

ANOTHER NEW FEATURE.

TEN-YEARS NON-FORFEITURE ENDOWMENT POLICIES.

A party ensuring by this table the amount is received by the assured himself, upon his attaining a specified age, while full provision is made for death occurring prior thereto. As a sure and profitable investment for one's declining years, they deserve the attention of all. These policies are coming into general request. [The New York Life Insurance Company have recently prepared A NEW TABLE BY WHICH THE PREMIUMS CAN ALL BE PAID IN TEN YEARS AND THE NON-FORFEITURE BENEFIT ALSO SECURED.

POLICIES ISSUED IN ALL THE USUAL FORMS.

MORRIS FRANKLIN, President.
ISAAC C. KENDALL, Vice-Pres't.
WILLIAM H. BEERS, Actuary.

☞ Parties desirous of acting as Agents will please apply personally or by letter.

UNIVERSAL CLOTHES WRINGER,

WITH COG-WHEELS.

The World's Fair in London, the Mechanics' Institute, and Eleven State Fairs have decided that the U. C. W. is THE BEST.

We also WARRANT IT THE BEST and most durable Wringer made. Over 200,000 have been sold, and each family can testify to its superior merits.

"It saves its cost in clothing every year."—ORANGE JUDD.

"One of the most useful articles in my house."—MRS. HENRY WARD BEECHER.

"I heartily commend it."—REV. DR. BELLOWS.

Call or send for illustrated circular, with testimonials, retail prices, and terms to salesmen.

Money can be made rapidly selling them in every town.

R. C. BROWNING, GENERAL AGENT,
347 Broadway, New York.

JOHN V. FARWELL & CO.,

WHOLESALE

DRY GOODS AND NOTIONS,

42, 44 & 46 WABASH AVENUE,
CHICAGO,

AND NO. 5 COLLEGE PLACE, NEW YORK.

DECKER & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS OF PIANO-FORTES,

419 BROOME STREET,

One Block East of Broadway, N. Y.

These Pianos stand unrivalled in regard to their singing quality; volume and purity of tone; sympathetic elastic, and even touch; and durability of construction, which enables them to remain in tune much longer than ordinary Pianos.

JESSUP & MOORE,

27 NORTH SIXTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
128 WILLIAM STREET, NEW YORK,

PAPER MANUFACTURERS,

Have on hand, or make to order at short notice, all qualities of Book and News Printing Papers at current market prices.

UNITED STATES STEEL PEN WORKS,

FACTORY, CAMDEN, N. J.

R. ESTERBROOK & CO.,

STEEL PEN MANUFACTURERS,

WAREHOUSES, { 403 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia.
{ 42 JOHN STREET, New York.

Samples and prices on application. Lots made to order of any pattern or stamp required.

CAUTION.

These Pens are of genuine American manufacture, and equal in finish, elasticity, and fineness of point to the best imported. They are, therefore, sure to gain the confidence of the American public. The fac-simile of our signature is sufficient security against foreign imitation.

R. ESTERBROOK & CO.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

OF THE OLD STANDARD QUALITY.

TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Warranted.

or Descriptive Name, and Designating Number.
New Series, Good and Cheap, from No. 700 to No. 761.

TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Birmingham. With Designating Numbers.

For sale by

JOSEPH GILLOTT & SONS,
91 John Street, New York.
HENRY OWEN, Sole Agent.

FRANCIS & LOUTREL,

45 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK,

STATIONERS, STEAM PRINTERS

AND

BLANK-BOOK MANUFACTURERS,

Supply everything in their line at lowest prices. Every kind of Writing Paper, Account Books, Fancy and Staple Stationery, Diaries for 1866, Expense Books, etc. Orders solicited.

The Nation.

VOL. I.—NO. 25. THURSDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1865. { SIX DOLLARS PER ANNUM / SINGLE COPIES, 15 CENTS

CONTENTS.

THE WEEK..... 769
MINOR TOPICS..... 772
A Word with Sensible Southerners ... 774
One Branch of Native Industry that Needs Protection..... 774
The Government and the Eight-Hour Movement..... 775
The Progress of the Cattle Plague..... 776
CORRESPONDENCE:
The Sovereignty of the States..... 776
Old English Literature..... 778
A Cheap and Easy Way to Fame..... 778
The South as It Is..... 779
England..... 780
The Italian Question..... 782
Presents..... 783
LITERATURE:
Literary Notes..... 784
Lecky's Rationalism..... 785
Our Mutual Friend..... 786
The Cyclopædia of Biography..... 788
A Summer in Skye..... 788
The Welsh in the United States..... 789
FINE ARTS:
Music.—Recent Concerts..... 790
FINANCIAL REVIEW..... 796

Six Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Four Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, PUBLISHER, 130 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

The Week.

ON Friday a protracted meeting was held in this city, at the Chamber of Commerce, of delegates from the American Freedmen's Aid Commission and the American Union Commission, which resulted in the adoption of a plan of union between the two bodies represented. A constitution has yet to be drafted, but the basis of the union is already agreed upon: No school or supply-depot will receive the support of the Freedmen's Aid and Union Association—the proposed style of the new organization—which makes any distinction of color among its beneficiaries. The consolidation of these two great charities in its most obvious aspect is a subject for general congratulation. There is a sufficiently common ground of sympathy for the victims of slavery both white and black, and a sufficient community of interest between the poor whites and the freedmen in striving each for their own elevation, to render it desirable to combine the benevolent efforts of the especial friends of each. The great charge that rests upon the whole people of repairing the waste of the system they tolerated so long, is now brought home in the simplest and most forcible manner. There is an end of distracting appeals for pecuniary aid, and of anxious enquiries concerning the most trustworthy channels through which to respond to them. Nor is this all. The real significance of the movement out of which the association arises consists in its educational purposes, which, though confined to the South in their practical direction, have a truly national bearing, and illustrate the growing conviction that intelligence must be the basis of democratic self-government. This is one of the valuable lessons of the war, and if it shall pass into a fundamental feature of our Constitution, the credit will be largely due to the spirit which has hitherto animated the various freedmen's associations, and which now finds it highest expression and widest scope in the union to which we have alluded.

THE manners of the bench and bar are rapidly improving. In the Strong divorce case the counsel wrangle like fishwomen, in language that would be considered foul in a bar-room, and the judge sits and listens in helpless degradation. One lawyer actually asked him to rule on a certain exception as a "husband and father," which is tantamount to asking him to be corrupt. In Washington, the other day, a lawyer in the Circuit Court called the judge a "liar and scoundrel," and when taken into custody for contempt, threatened to "thrash him." Now, if anybody wants to know the explanation of the tolerance for trials by courts-martial displayed by the public during the last four years, he may find it, we are satisfied, in the growing want of confidence in the courts civil. The popular doubts of the efficiency and integrity of our tribunals are, unquestionably, on the increase, and are now so strong that people are easily reconciled to seeing justice done in any way that is swift and sure, however summary or extra-legal. The great question is now—how long are we to let this feeling grow? That it will grow, and will seriously shake our whole political system unless we can discover some means of making our judges more self-respecting and respected, there is no question.

THE NATION has, since it came into existence, received a good deal of abuse from other journals, which has often been amusing, and almost always harmless, and we consequently do not mind it. But the practice of copying from our columns articles which have been prepared with care, and paid for highly, and publishing them without any indication of the source from which they come, in which many of our contemporaries have been indulging of late, is not simply a dishonest practice, but one very injurious to us, and we therefore respectfully request all journals that are conscious of being addicted to it to mend their ways. We are sorry to notice, too, that some of the worst offenders in this respect are those that were loudest in their complaints of the "heaviness" of THE NATION. Those who find its contents too heavy to read, ought at least to support their theory by not stealing them. We have borne this in silence for some time, and have comforted ourselves by general reflections on the aid we were rendering to human progress in the country districts, but patience has ceased to be a virtue. We shall, therefore, commence our remonstrances by requesting the Missouri Democrat to mention in its columns that the poem by Mr. Whittier, which it recently extracted from THE NATION without any acknowledgment, was a special contribution to this journal, and, being paid for by us, was our property. We shall also thank the Cincinnati Daily Gazette, from which we expected better morals, to explain in its next issue that the "Interesting Historical Episode," to which it devoted a solid column and a half on Friday last, is a carefully prepared review of Mr. Frederick Kapp's book on the "Hessians of the Revolution," which appeared in THE NATION two weeks ago, which the Gazette has "prigged" bodily, without saying where it found it; and has added insult to injury by falsely pretending to have "condensed" the article.

MR. HECKER is evidently in a bad humor over his defeat, and has administered his supporters a severe rebuke, and is apparently preparing a pamphlet in which he will more fully give vent to his feelings. At least, we presume that what he calls "his considerations of partizan and official corruption, and the vitiation of the exercise of the elective franchise, and destroying the life of our political institutions," would, if put into good English, mean a pamphlet.

THE Tribune made a display of enterprise last week, which we hardly know whether to praise or condemn, in publishing an obituary of Mr. Corwin before he was dead. It is customary in these cases to wait until a man is not only deemed past recovery, but is actually deceased—a usage which, aside from all sentiment, has a substantial basis in the large number of recoveries which have been known to take place after the doctors have given up hope. The energy of the Tribune, however, leads one to question the propriety of the rule. Why not write a "notice" of a man's performances whenever he falls dangerously ill? If he chooses to recover, the critique on his performances may not be pleasant reading; but then who is to blame for his recovery but himself?

THE Evangelist calls our attention to its long review—three solid columns—of Smith's "Dictionary of the Bible" as a proof that the religious weeklies are not open to the charge of carelessness in criticism which we recently brought against them. As far as we can judge, the critique in question seems to be a very able one, written by a man who understands his subject; but we put it to the Evangelist—Is it not a little "heavy"? Is it not an article which, according to the theory which the Evangelist recently propounded in the friendly advice which it offered THE NATION as to the propriety of being "lighter," ought only to have appeared in the "North American Review?" When its subscribers come home on Saturday night, with brows aching from the labors of the week, does it really expect them to sit down and read through such a mass of ponderous lore? In our opinion, in a weekly newspaper intended for popular circulation, even a "Dictionary of the Bible" ought to be noticed briefly, and with a light and delicate touch, and in "a genial spirit," and with enough wit to keep the reader, if not in a roar, at least beaming with smiles over the writer's happy, etc., etc.

COLONEL O'MAHONY, the head of the Union Square branch of the Fenian Brotherhood, has published a "financial statement," from which it appears that he received about $100,000 for the month ending Oct. 10. What comes of this money he does not state, but probably most of it goes in payment for secret service. This revenue amounts to little over a million a year, if kept up every month, and would not quite keep one regiment on a war footing. The Brotherhood must really be more liberal, if they mean business.

THE World enumerates as the President's means of resistance to Congress, the command-in-chief of the army, the pardoning power, the veto, and the appointing power, all of which it seems to assume that he will exercise, if Congress should persist in keeping the South in its present limbo, and "if his will should prove equal to his authority." "If" is a very valuable word. The President might, also, if his will was equal to his authority, release all pirates, coiners, forgers of United States currency, and every other species of offender against United States laws. Everybody knows the extent of his power; it is about the bent of his will that the World would do well to furnish information.

GENERAL BUTLER is said to be preparing a reply to so much of General Grant's report as relates to him. We have little doubt that, no matter how completely Grant may beat him on the facts, he will beat Grant fearfully in letter-writing.

THE Committee of Congress appointed to make arrangements for commemorating the death of Mr. Lincoln have determined on celebrating his birthday, in February next, by an oration from Mr. Stanton. Mr. Stanton has every qualification for the task but one, and that is that he is a poor orator. He can be forcible enough, but when he attempts eloquence, and, above all, the eloquence of grace, or delicacy, he is certain to prove a failure. No man who is not, in the best sense of the word, silver-tongued, can do Mr. Lincoln's memory justice, and no man who has not great skill in marking shades of feeling and of thought can make even a tolerable sketch of his character. But this certainly is not Mr. Stanton's forte, to say the least. Still, he probably was in closer intercourse with Mr. Lincoln during the most trying periods of his career than anybody else, and this is something.

CAPTAIN CORBETT, of the Shenandoah, has been tried in Cork "for illegal enlistments." Most wonderful to relate, there was no proof against him, so he was acquitted. Upon the theory of what constitutes proof in these cases which has been developed by English lawyers and journalists, it is quite certain that no human means will ever prevent private persons in that country from carrying on war on their own account if they please. Mr. Laird might, in fact, as far as the courts and police are concerned, rig out and maintain a fleet of buccaneers.

THE Mayor of Washington has graciously consented that there shall be a special election in that city to decide the question of "colored suffrage." His Honor's course reminds us of the ingenious pleasantry of the Philadelphia horse-car corporations, when they appointed a day on which those who rode in their conveyances might vote whether those who were excluded should come in. The world, of course, gets on, always has got on, and always will get on, in just this fashion, by taking the sense of abuses and prejudices, and burying them only when they return a unanimous suffrage in favor of their own dissolution. Perhaps Mayor Wallach's election will not find grace at the Capitol.

THE correspondent of the London Times has been in the Shenandoah Valley, and the natives availed themselves of the opportunity to pour into his unsuspecting ear stories of Confederate exploits in that region which have had no parallels in military history. The only place we know of in which anything like them can be found is in the "Lives of the Saints."

THE President has encouraged the Georgians to have a Governor elect if they please, and has even intimated that if the election of a Senator would be any comfort to them, they may elect one. South Carolina, in the meantime, haggles over the repudiation of the State debt; and all are clearly determined to find out in some way what the exact point is to which they may push their pretensions.

THE President has set aside the new law of the Mississippi Legislature prohibiting freedmen from owning or leasing lands. This, we presume, was part of the code intended to keep "the negro down." A few more acts of this sort, if enforced, and enforced they would be, would certainly "keep them down" with a vengeance. If white men were deprived of the right of owning lands, of entering any profession, or acquiring any political rights, they, too, would rapidly come "down." It is said that this action of the President again raises the question—Where is Mississippi, in or out of the Union? That question, however, is clearly a metaphysical one. For all practical purposes Mississippi, and every other State which is not represented in Congress, is out of the Union, no matter what theory of their position may be held by anybody.

WHILE Virginia is arguing her continuous existence as a State throughout the rebellion, from the fact that she gave her indispensable consent to the partition of the western portion, her legislators amuse themselves with recalling that consent. This is another proof of the absurdity of confounding the Virginia of Gov. Peirpoint with the Virginia of Gen. Lee. The effort to recover the lost territory will be about as successful as that to replace a chicken in its shell.

WE do not know the precise age of a Kentucky conservative, and therefore will not be disrespectful to the Mr. Young who got resolutions printed last week in the Kentucky House, approving the action of the previous General Assembly in regard to the Constitutional Amendment. We cannot, however, accept his doctrine that this action was a finality, and that neither the present Assembly nor any subsequent one can so much as consider the subject again. States as well as men have the consolation that it is never too late to mend; and Mr. Young will find that his opinion will not deter New Jersey from backing out of her very disreputable association with the community which he represents.

JUDGE BUSTEED has come out second best in his controversy with Gen. Wood in the United States Circuit Court at Mobile. To his surprise, the President failed to support him in asserting the restored subordination of the military to the civil authority in Alabama. The magistrate was wise enough to decline contending with the Government, although protesting against what he chose to consider "an encroachment of the Executive department of the Government upon one of its co-ordinate branches." No grand or petit jury will be empannelled during the present term of the court.

A GALVESTON paper, anticipating the State Convention, indulges in an etymological disquisition on the right word to be used in undoing the secession ordinance. It would not have "abolish" applied to an act which is still savory in the nostrils of many. "Repeal" is too suggestive of eating one's words to suit the unyielding spirit of chivalric Texans. On the whole, "annul" is freest from objection; for it implies a once existing reality, which alone can be reduced to nought, and so avoids the disagreeable acknowledgment that the ordinance was ab initio of no effect.

OREGON ratified the Constitutional Amendment on Monday, the 11th.

THE excitement in England about the Jamaica affair continues to increase, and has been aggravated by Governor Eyre's attack on the Baptist missionaries. There can hardly be any doubt that he will be recalled; if so, legal proceedings will probably be instituted against him for the murder of Gordon, for such it undoubtedly was. The affair is one of the most atrocious in English annals, and especially atrocious after the canting appeals for mercy for Davis, Forrest, & Co., with which the English press has been filled for the last six months.

M. DE LAMARTINE has lately written a surprising essay on the Mexican question, of which he declares that he alone understands the magnitude and sublimity. He approves the invasion because America belongs not to herself, but to Europe, and preferably to the Latin races of Europe; because it will be very profitable for France to have Mexico, and because it will prevent the United States from possessing her riches. He thinks us disqualified for destroying weak governments and civilizing helpless peoples at the point of the bayonet (the great offices of France), because we are very disagreeable people, speak monotonously, chew tobacco, put our feet on chimney-jambs, are proud, and have regular features. He suppresses, however, the real cause of our disqualification, which is to be found in our failure to subscribe for the support of a mendicant literary Frenchman long past poetry and usefulness.

A "LIFE OF JESUS," by the Abbé Michon, in reply to the books of Renan and Strauss, is announced in Paris. A valuable feature of the work will be a translation of the Evangelists, made directly from the Greek of the oldest and most authentic manuscripts.

M. BENJAMIN GUSTINEAU is about to publish a history of the subscription for striking a medal in honor of Abraham Lincoln. His book will be called "The Medal of Liberty," and will contain letters from Victor Hugo and Louis Blanc.

NOT men and cattle only seem to suffer from epidemics in these days. A pestilence has attacked even the poultry in France, and the hen-coops are (to use the strong language of the French journals) decimated by a disorder for which there is no apparent cause, and no cure known—except to eat the victims.

RECENTLY a sale of effects took place in the chateau of the Marquis de Villette, near Pont-Sainte-Maxence, where Voltaire lived so long. Some personal relics of the philosopher brought immense prices; the crown of gilt paper with which he was honored at the Théâtre Français sold for 440 francs; his satin waistcoat for 490; his dressing-gown for 990; his arm-chair for 2,000; his portrait, by Largillière, for 6,200.

THE speech of Victor Emanuel at the opening of the Italian Parliament was not of great significance. He congratulated the Houses on the almost universal recognition which the kingdom of Italy had received, and on the French evacuation of Rome; reminded them that they would have to deliberate upon the question of separating church and state, and abolishing the religious corporations; and roused them to applause when, predicting a profound change in European affairs, he expressed the faith that if Italy must sustain new trials, her sons would rally around him to her succor.

CONGRESS.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 16.

THE session of this week, though shortened by two days, permitted the exhibition of a great deal of legislative activity, as may be seen by referring to the diary below. The most important measures were the resolutions touching Mexico and the Monroe Doctrine, offered on Monday, in the Senate by Mr. Wade, in the House by Mr. Schenck; the admission, on Tuesday, on motion of Mr. Stevens, of the Tennessee delegation to seats upon the floor of the House, against the inclination and votes of such staunch Republicans as Boutwell and Washburne, of Massachusetts, Farnsworth, of Illinois, Schenck, of Ohio, and Wilson, of Iowa; the adoption of Mr. Farnsworth's resolution declaring that the colored soldier ought to vote, by the House, on Wednesday; Mr. Donnelly's excellent suggestion concerning a national bureau of education, on Thursday, and, on the same day, Mr. Wilson's successful restoration of that clause in Mr. Stevens's resolution on reconstruction which proved obnoxious to the Senate. Besides these salient acts and propositions, there was a great variety of projects for reaching the common aim of loyal men, through amendments to the Constitution, etc., etc. The material prosperity of the country was consulted by Mr. Wentworth's bill against the importation of cattle, by the resolution concerning the Pacific Railroad, the bill directed against railroad monopoly, and that which related to the Hudson River bridge at Albany. There was a vigorous contest over the usual motion to adjourn during the holidays, but the majority were undismayed by the prospect of summer heat and the cholera.

DIARY.

Monday, Dec. 11.—In the Senate, Mr. Sumner offered a bill to warrant and confirm the land titles of grantees under the field-orders of General Sherman, at Savannah, in 1865 (being the assignment to the freedmen of all the islands from Charleston south, and the abandoned rice-fields for thirty miles inland). Referred. Also, a bill to provide for payment of claims on account of French spoliations. Referred. Mr. Brown offered a bill granting lands to aid in constructing a railroad and telegraph line to the Pacific, by the southern route. Referred. Mr. Stewart offered a bill to establish a mining bureau. Referred. Mr. Willey, a bill giving consent of Congress to the annexation of Berkeley and Jefferson counties, formerly of Virginia, to West Virginia. Referred. Mr. Wade offered a joint resolution that the attempt to establish a monarchy in Mexico by a foreign power is opposed to the declared policy of the United States Government, and offensive to our people, and that the President be requested to vindicate our policy and protect the honor and interests of our Government. Referred.

In the House, bills were offered for the reimbursement to loyal States of sums expended and debts contracted in aid of the war; to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy; giving bounty lands and money to United States soldiers; to facilitate postal and commercial communication between the States (i. e., to destroy New Jersey monopolies); to repeal that portion of the Confiscation Act which limits forfeiture of real estate to the lifetime of the offender; all of which were referred. A bill was passed prohibiting the future importation of cattle into the United States, with a view to prevent the spread of foreign diseases. Resolutions were offered and referred, proposing legislation for the protection and safety of travellers on railroads in the United States; declaring that the United States, as conquerors in war, now have the political power of the States late in rebellion; that said States have no title to take part in the general Government until Congress prescribes the terms, and that it is an indispensable condition of their recognition that their constitutions secure to all their inhabitants, of whatever color, equal rights before the law. Four propositions to amend the Constitution were offered and referred, as follows: that all male citizens of the United States of the age of twenty-one years, who can read, shall have the right to vote for officers of the federal Government; that all soldiers shall have the said right, and no person who cannot read the Constitution shall enjoy the right of suffrage; that it shall be the duty of each State to promote education, and secure life, liberty, and property to all its inhabitants without distinction; and that all national and State laws shall apply equally to every citizen.

Dec. 12.—In the Senate, Mr. Davis offered a resolution that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, by the operation of the Constitution, now stands rightfully restored in Kentucky, and throughout the whole of the United States. Referred. The Senate passed (ayes 33, nays 11) the resolution of the House, constituting a joint committee of fifteen to report upon the condition of the lately rebel States, and whether any of them are entitled to representation in Congress, after striking out the last clause, which declares that no member shall be received into either House, and no credentials received or debated, until the report of said committee. In the course of the debate, Senator Howard, of Michigan, held that the late Confederate States are simply conquered communities, having in them no rightful political power but that of the United States; that their people are not loyal, and neither branch of Congress can recognize them as entitled to representation in that body. Mr. Doolittle, of Wisconsin, argued that the resolution, as passed by the House, infringed the prerogative of the Senate to judge of the qualifications of its own members, limited the right of debate, was disrespectful to the President and his declared policy, and, if passed, was a resolution to dissolve the Union by act of Congress.—A resolution was adopted, calling on the President for information of the state of that part of the Union lately in rebellion, including the reports of John Covode and Carl Schurz.

In the House, on motion of Mr. Raymond, a resolution was passed, ayes 126, nays 42, referring the credentials of the representatives elected from Tennessee to the joint committee of fifteen. A resolution passed, ayes 132, nays 35, inviting the Tennessee representatives to occupy seats on the floor of the House, without participating in its proceedings.

Dec. 13.—In the Senate, Mr. Stewart submitted a joint resolution to amend the Constitution with two articles affirming the Union to be indissoluble, and allegiance to it to be beyond the power of any State to absolve, and prohibiting State or national assumption of any debt incurred to impair or resist the national authority. Referred. Mr. Brown introduced a bill to reimburse Missouri for war expenditures. Referred. Mr. Guthrie presented a remonstrance from the Executive of Louisiana against the election of Messrs. Hahn and Cutler as senators from that State. Laid on the table. Mr. Foot offered a resolution providing for paying to the widow of the late Senator Collamer the amount due him at the time of his decease. Mr. Sherman reported from the committee on agriculture the House bill passed on Monday to prohibit the importation of cattle. Passed. Mr. Sumner called up the resolution asking for information concerning the employment of persons in the Treasury Department who have not taken the oath of allegiance. Passed, after amendment. Mr. Wilson called up the bill to maintain the freedom of the inhabitants of the States declared to be in insurrection and rebellion by the proclamation of July 1, 1862. It abrogates all laws enforcing an inequality of civil rights and immunities on account of race or color. The bill was opposed by Mr. Johnson, and objected to as premature by Senators Sherman and Trumbull. Pending the debate the Senate adjourned.

In the House, Mr. Schenck reported a joint resolution requesting the President to suspend the order mustering out the officers of the Veteran Reserve. Passed (ayes 111, nays 50). A joint resolution was also offered authorizing the entry for consumption of goods in bond, on payment of the respective rates of duty. Referred. Bills were introduced and referred providing for the subdivision and sale of the mining lands of the United States; and to extend the benefit of the Bounty Land Act of March 3, 1865, to all soldiers, sailors, and seamen who served during the war. On motion of Mr. Niblack, the committee on the judiciary was instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the adoption of the "eight-hour system" in all matters and places under Congressional jurisdiction. The committee in charge of the Pacific Railroad was instructed to enquire if any action is needed on the part of Congress to expedite the work. Mr. Stevens called up, and the House concurred in, the resolution providing for a joint committee on the condition of the so-called Confederate States, as amended by the Senate. Mr. Farnsworth's resolutions denying that to be a just government which deprives a large portion of its citizens, who bear its civil and military burdens, of a share in the government, and affirming that good faith and impartial justice demand that the colored soldiers of the Union obtain the equal rights of citizenship, while their exclusion and the readmission of rebels and traitors would be criminal, were referred, after an unsuccessful attempt (ayes 43, nays 113) to lay them on the table. On motion of Mr. Boutwell, the committee on the judiciary was instructed to consider and report whether compensation is due any of the inhabitants of the insurrectionary States for losses sustained during the war; and also the expediency of amending the Constitution so that no State shall make any distinction in the suffrage on account of race or color.

Dec. 14.—In the Senate, Mr. Brown offered a resolution on the adoption for Government employees of the "eight-hour system." Laid over. On motion of Mr. Harris, it was ordered that when the Senate adjourn it be till Monday, the 18th. The remainder of the session was occupied in eulogies on the late Senator Collamer, of Vermont.

The House (ayes 90, nays 67) voted to adjourn, the Senate concurring, from the 20th of December to the 9th of January. A bill was reported and passed appropriating $30,000, or what should be necessary, to repair the President's House; also, one appropriating $15,440,000 for the payment of invalid and other pensions. Bills were reported and referred making appropriations for the West Point Academy up to June 30, 1867; making the bridge now constructing across the Hudson at Albany a highway and postal route; authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase a suitable site for a custom-house and warehouse in Jersey City; equalizing the bounty of soldiers. Mr. Henderson's resolution was unanimously adopted, that treason against the United States Government is a crime and ought to be punished. The joint committee on reconstruction was instructed to enquire into the expediency of establishing a national bureau of education, to enforce education without regard to race or color upon any population that falls below a certain standard. The committee on the judiciary was instructed to consider if the retrocession to Virginia of the District of Columbia south of the Potomac was not void and unconstitutional. Mr. Wilson offered as a resolution that part of Mr. Stevens's which the Senate had rejected—that all papers relating to the representation of the so-called Confederate States be laid on the table without debate, and no members be admitted till their title has been acknowledged by Congress. Passed (yeas 107, nays 56). The House adjourned after eulogies upon Senator Collamer.

THE FREEDMEN.

Gen. Howard's report has been approved by the Secretary of War, and handed by him to the President; but up to the present writing its contents have been kept strictly private.

The constant reduction of hospitals for freedmen having been brought to the attention of Gen. Howard, he has ordered it to be stopped, and a sufficient number to be kept open at different points to provide for the large number of sick that will, probably, have to be cared for by the Bureau.

Gen. Fisk has been diligently at work in Tennessee and Kentucky to obtain homes for the freed people for the winter, and has been successful to a great extent. Nearly all those who were dependants at the time of his appointment as Assistant Commissioner have been placed by him in good homes with fair wages. The exodus from the cities and towns has been large, and the general has been able, without neglecting to care for the aged, sick, and orphans, to break up nearly all of his "camps" and "homes." He states that the freed people in his district are becoming better advised as to their new relations, and that he has the greatest faith in their ability to "paddle their own canoe."

Gen. Swayne reports that he met the committee on finance of the Alabama Senate by appointment:

"They expressed a willingness to set on foot a legalized system of care for the poor blacks, and a degree of favor towards the cause of education among them which was gratifying to me, and which I hope to see reduced to a law within a week or two. . . . A good deal of spite and pandering to low public sentiment will have to find vent in the Legislature before there is much beneficial action; yet I am hopeful of the ultimate result."

Col. Osborne, of Florida, has been making a tour of the State, to his great satisfaction. He found the freed people mostly at work and generally fairly paid. A considerable portion of Florida has been under Federal rule for so long a time that blacks and whites have begun to understand their relative positions pretty well.

The restoration of the Sea Islands is still delayed. Wm. Whaley, of South Carolina, has been in Washington for some time endeavoring to hasten the work, but thus far without effect. The condition "mutually satisfactory" seems to be the chief impediment to any arrangement, and almost insuperable, since the freed people will be satisfied with nothing less than the land itself. This they have been accustomed to regard as their own ever since Gen. Sherman's order setting apart the islands for their use.

Col. Brown, of Virginia, reports about 11,500 colored pupils receiving instruction in that State from 195 teachers. Instances, he says, of personal violence are becoming rare on the part of the whites towards the blacks. The supply of laborers there is in excess of the demand, and would sustain an emigration of at least fifty thousand freedmen. Many are seeking homes and places that promise to be permanent. During the month of September an average of 9,196 rations was issued daily. There are eight freedmen's hospitals in the State, and fifteen medical officers.

Col. John Eaton, who has been Assistant Commissioner for the District of Columbia since the organization of the Bureau, has resigned his position in the army in order to become editor of a newspaper in Memphis. His official career has gratefully recommended him to the Government and the freed people.

Minor Topics.

A thrill of the rapture which great cities, like children, feel at the approach of holidays may be supposed to communicate itself even to journalism; and if a newspaper babble of Christmas at a time like this, shall it be blamed because Christmas has been coming once a year, now, for above eighteen centuries? Consider, friends, what a life a newspaper's is: how it is for ever hearing or telling some new thing; how it has to do continually with affairs of to-day; how it must speak only of recent events, new people, new plays, new operas, new books; how weary it must get of the latest intelligence; and then forbid it, if you have the heart, to gossip a little about that of which it is utterly impossible for the newspaper to speak with its habitual freshness and originality. For, supposing that the newspaper should talk of Christmas in that fine, poetic strain characteristic of the best moods of journalism, would it not appear to trench upon feeling already occupied by Milton, and Tennyson, and the rest? Or if it should endeavor to present Christmas in the light of all that is plum-pudding, charity, roast-beef, holly, punch, and brotherly kindness in human nature, would it not presently be confronted with Charles Dickens? And as for the religious sentiment of Christmas, are there not innumerable pulpits which have long possessed the exclusive expression of that? We imagine that a man who had a new idea about Christmas would die of it—that the newspaper in which he printed it would be returned by all the subscribers. For what would a new idea of Christmas be like? We were on the point of telling.

But no new ideas for us, if you please. Indeed, we conceive that the very pleasure of Christmas time is in its likeness to all other Christmas times. There should be nothing novel about it; all should be familiar; and the past should come back in the repetition of old thoughts, words, and acts. Everything like change should be banished from association with it. Some gentle readers, no doubt, remember with what a pang they suffered the illusion of Santa Claus (or St. Nicholas, or Kriskringle, or however you may choose to call that first of the saints) to pass from them; and none would consent that fresh light should be thrown upon Christmas lest some other essential charm should be taken from it. Therefore, as we say, no new idea for us. Let us honor Christmas with world-old feelings of kindliness and jollity, and let us say nothing which has not been said a thousand times before in much better language.

In those ancient lands beyond the sea how jealously they guard the observance of their Christmas from all strangeness; the English, with their plum-pudding and their holly; the Germans, with their Christmas-trees and papered candies and gilded nuts; the Italians, with their masses and odd presents of sweetened mustard and honey-sweetmeats! Their Christmas from year to year, and from cycle to cycle, knows no mutation. Yes, the instinct of this festive time is, everywhere, to hold fast by that which is old.

Even here, in this New World, where the Christmas festivity is itself a sort of novelty to more than half the land, how fondly we cling to the idea of its antiquity! We go up and down the streets, and look at the alluring windows of the shops, and are proud of such honor to the good old holiday, which we are every year learning to love more and more. We are quite willing to take our Christmas bodily from the Old World, and have a kindness both for the holly and the Christmas-tree. We buy Christmas presents, and give them about with a lavish hand; we like to see pictures of ideal Christmas in the illustrated papers; and we are fond of gaily dressed, expensive literature for the Christmas holidays. It all serves to make us believe that we have Christmas in our hearts, as, indeed, such of us as were born West or South really have. In the regions remoter from the influences of New England, Christmas has always had joyous observance among us, the common happiness formerly seeking too often a rude expression in fire-crackers and turkey-raffles, but certainly being always a genuine feeling of jubilance, full of hospitable and genial impulses, and tending to great content and indigestion.

There was so little for any but sentimentalists to admire in Southern life, that one is loth to confess that Virginia had a social advantage of New England in honoring Christmas, but the fact is so. It is notable, moreover, that the children of the Pilgrims, who have departed from ancestral customs and beliefs in so many points, take kindly to Christmas as they find it away from home, though the grim Puritan traditions seem still to forbid them its enjoyments in New England.

Well, patience! Christmas shall be after awhile, perhaps, in the hearts of all. The Puritan spirit which abolished the jollity of this season shall for ever give tone to our national thought and morals, let us hope; but it cannot shape the national emotion in the present time or the future. The whole land has accepted Thanksgiving Day as a goodly and pleasant usage, but the elder festival is dear to us also, and both are not too many for our laborious year. We would have both holidays as "differently beautiful" in our calendar, and should be grieved to lose the younger of the twain, even to make the gain of Christmas. Thanksgiving may serve to express joyfully the sentiments of our more immediately American devotion, and in Christmas we may take delight as citizens of Christendom. We can then best recognize our kinship with all the world, and pass the bounds of nationality to embrace mankind, in the name of One born that holy day to bless the whole race. No sect, nor tongue, nor blood limits the spirit of the first Christmas time; but wherever men were good-willing on earth, it brought peace to them:

"Be united, O ye millions!"

utters the merry season to us now; and we would that we might accept its gospel in full and perfect love of Christmas.

The troubles of the Fenian Brotherhood are only less mysterious than its purposes, as the Fenian Brotherhood explains them. This explanation varies, of course, from the generally received idea of Fenian troubles and purposes. To the mind of a public vitiated by the habit of considering causes and effects, as they develop themselves in facts, the cause of Ireland has seemed to be comprehended in the collection of large sums of money from many industrious Irish people, and the effect in the maintenance of a few lazy Irish people in a luxurious brown-stone house on Union Square. Generally speaking, no one has consented to accept a very large green flag, with a large golden harp on it, as evidence that the liberation of Ireland was taking place under the roof over which it floated; nor has a completely organized republican government in the brown-stone house, nor the parade of a troop of small boys in green-baize jackets before the door of this house, led the public to any other conclusion than that a hollow, greedy, and pompous humbug dwelt within. Indeed, the public would hardly have been more surprised to know that there was actually something going on there besides ostentatious swindling, than they have been at the folly of those who could not enjoy in quietness the spoils of purely abstract office-holding, but must needs quarrel over them, and at last break up and impeach and depose one another. Generally speaking, again, nobody believes that the secession of the ten Fenian Senators, and the election of a new Fenian President, with a vast deal of elegant writing in the newspapers, means anything in the world but the suspicion of some of the Fenians that the others were getting more of the money of the cooks and chambermaids than they ought to have according to the operation of a principle with which we are familiar in the form of adage.

Of course, these are not the explanations of the case which the Fenian Brotherhood offers, but the public is forced to accept them, because it cannot understand the Brotherhood's reasons. The Brotherhood's reasons are too abstruse and, at the same time, too abundant, and fill too many columns of fine print, and altogether would take a great deal of time to read which could be much more profitably given to a thorough acquaintance with the Strong Divorce Case. All that plainly appears is that the Fenian Brotherhood throughout the country is pretty equally divided into believers in O'Mahony and believers in Roberts, and that everybody has disappeared as soon as trusted with Fenian money, as if Fenian money were an agent of sorcery which instantly rendered its possessor invisible. There is a pathetic story of one who went to Ireland with a draft in his boots, and lost it in pulling them off; John Mitchel has passed into oblivion with $75,000 on his person, with which he was authorized to corrupt the Emperor of the French; another ambassador to the Tuileries is said to have wisely deposited his money in Paris, so as to impress the tradesmen with whom he had dealings as a merchant that he had boundless resources. Finally, B. Doran Killian, the type of valor and the ornament of epistolary composition, having shown symptoms of a pecuniary retention suspicious in a Treasurer of the Irish Republic, has been deposed by the ten seceding senators from his office, as far as they could depose him. Naturally, Mr. B. Doran Killian does not acknowledge any dismissal from office in his case, and supports President O'Mahony with all the eloquence of his ardent pen.

The latter gentleman is naturally the object of exceeding bitterness and of glowing eulogy, according as the head centres approve or disapprove his attitude, and varies in his private and public qualities all the way from Jefferson Davis up to General Washington. All that is certainly known about him is that he defends his presidency against the world, and that he continues to direct the destinies of the mutilated remains of the Irish Republic of Union Square, while President Roberts presides over the missing fragments somewhere on Broadway.

In this pleasant state of things the head directress of the Fenian Sisterhood has the sublime courage to address a fresh appeal for funds to the verdant branches of the Fenian Sisterhood, in which she tells them that the call has gone forth, and that Ireland is to be freed in a very few days, if the branches will sell their jewelry for the cause, and dress plainly. This is a reasonable request, and ought to receive a favorable response.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

A WORD WITH SENSIBLE SOUTHERNERS.

MR. DE BOW, and a great number of other Southerners of education and intelligence, particularly the ex-officers of the Confederate army, profess to be, and we are bound to believe are, now sincerely anxious to restore material prosperity at the South. They say frankly that they do not like the new order of things—that they wish it were different, and have done their best to make it so, but they accept accomplished facts, and are now about to go to work and try to make the new South, if not as happy or satisfactory as the old one, at least as rich. Numbers of these men have gone to work on their farms; many more have gone into business; and large numbers are now on here at the North trying to secure the aid of Northern capitalists in developing the resources of their soil and building up their broken fortunes. They may be met with in all our Northern cities, trying either to borrow money or to induce Northern men who have money to go into partnership with them. As to Mr. De Bow, the great apostle of slaveholding economy, he has abandoned the "eternal truths" he used to preach in the Review with the most praiseworthy versatility, and proposes now to do for free labor all, and more than all, he used to do for slave labor.

This is all as it should be. Nobody who admires manliness and good sense can help admiring it. There is little doubt that the regeneration of the South, whenever it comes, must come from the exertions of these men—from their full perception of the truths, moral, social, and political, which the North has been so long preaching and practising. But they ought to be told, and we trust everybody who comes in contact with them does tell them, frankly, that neither Northern capital nor labor can ever be had at the South in sufficient quantity to contribute much to the development of its resources, until they can induce their people in some way or other to pay more respect to the life and property of Northern settlers and of negroes than they now show. We are not now talking about the moral aspect of the case. We will grant, for the sake of argument, that it may be a natural and even excusable thing to hang, shoot, and harry the negroes in the way described by our correspondent in this week's paper, or to threaten or drive out Yankee visitors and settlers in the style practised the other day upon the able correspondent of the Boston Advertiser in Albany, Georgia. But the great question for sensible and influential Southerners is, Will it pay? Is it expedient? Do they seriously suppose that, after all that has happened, Northern men will invest capital in sufficient quantities to be of much use in a country in which mobs, composed of the "most prominent citizens," are in the habit of assembling, as in the case of the correspondent of the Advertiser, to murder a man in his hotel on suspicion of sympathizing with negroes, to set the law at defiance, and to make the night hideous in a quiet town with drunken railings? Do they seriously imagine that Northern men will go down to enter into partnerships, and carry with them their families and their hard earnings, and establish their homes in a place in which they will hold their lives and their property at the mercy of the more evil disposed of their neighbors, and be forced to watch every word they utter on the social and political problems of the day, lest some careless expression should be distorted into an excuse for murdering or pillaging them, or hunting them out of the country?

Now we tell these gentlemen plainly, until they can, either by their influence or example, put an end to this state of things at the South—until they can induce their friends and neighbors, we will not say to like the Yankees, but to treat them civilly and to tolerate their ideas and the expression of them, and to support the law in protecting their lives and property, they might as well bay the moon as come on here to raise money or organize emigration. A few adventurous spirits, or men who share Southern prejudices or are ready to pretend that they share them, or a few speculators who will run any risks for the chance of high profits, may accept their invitations to emigrate or invest; but the prudent, careful, industrious men of the North, the only ones whose support in commercial undertakings is worth having, will have nothing to do with them. Some of the Southerners who have come North have probably found this out by this time; we can assure those who have not yet tried the experiment that they will find it out also in time.

And all this applies to the want of protection for the blacks as well as for the white men. There are very few people who have been bred in the sober, orderly communities of the North who will want to live where whipping, shooting, and assaulting are going on around them, whether they themselves are exposed to them or not, or where a permanent and bitter antagonism is fostered between two races. There is in all such states of society a constant feeling of insecurity and discomfort. There are few Northern men who can avoid sympathizing with the victims of cruelty or injustice; and there are no conscientious or brave men who can feel that sympathy and long conceal it. Yet, in most districts of the South, any display of such sympathy at this moment would, if half what we hear be true, lead, to use the terse and expressive language of one of our correspondents, to a man's being "shot in the back" the first time he left his house. As long as this state of things lasts, we must tell the intelligent men of the South that no considerable body of emigrants can be tempted away from the fertile plains and settled and peaceful social organization of the North-west. Young and adventurous and single men may like to go to bed every night anticipating a visit from a Champ Ferguson or a Quantrell before morning, but they soon lose their taste for it, and middle-aged and married men will not face it on any terms.

The Evening Post, which, since the war came to an end, has shown an extraordinary tendency to take the loftiest philosophical views of human society both North and South, not long ago read a severe lecture to one of its correspondents for complaining of the railing against the Union and the North which he constantly heard in the South, and the abuse and insolence to which Northern men were exposed. It told him that he must let Southerners rail and call names, and asked him sarcastically what harm could it do him. Now we submit with great deference, that although abuse and hard names either in the Southern States or anywhere else are, per se, perfectly harmless, yet whenever they indicate, as they unquestionably do at the South, that something worse is coming, they are calculated to make people of ordinary nerves highly uncomfortable. If one's neighbors at the North blackguard him a little, he knows perfectly well that in nine cases out of ten they will stop when they get tired, or that if they keep it up too long, he can call in the assistance of the police. But it is one of the peculiarities of Southern society, that when a person becomes obnoxious to others, and especially to a whole neighborhood, for any reason whatever, and they give vent to their feelings in scolding or vituperation, they are apt to appear on the scene soon after with rifles, or shot-guns, or a rail, a bag of feathers, and a pot of tar, and give him still more substantial proofs of their displeasure. It is this which makes Southern scolding so exceedingly disagreeable to people brought up in more cold-blooded communities, and which gives Northern men who travel in the South the right to treat Southern language as an important and alarming symptom of the social and political condition of the country.

ONE BRANCH OF NATIVE INDUSTRY THAT NEEDS PROTECTION.

IN all schemes and appeals for the protection of native industry that we have ever seen, the claims of one section of national workers, the authors and artists, have been entirely overlooked, although we have no hesitation in saying that the work they do, or would do if they got fair play, is just as important, in the highest sense of the word, to the community at large as that of any branch of trade or manufacture. No other traders or manufacturers—and for the purpose of this argument we may consider their calling a manufacture—are treated with the gross injustice of which they are the victims. The most ardent free-trader has never wished to have foreign products placed on a better footing in the home markets than the native ones. If the latter are the subject of an excise tax, he is willing that an import duty of a similar weight should be clapt on the former. And what the protectionist seeks is that the native manufacture shall be protected against the competition of the foreign one. But at this moment we have so arranged matters with regard to literary and artistic products, that the publisher, or, in other words, the importer, shall be able to import them duty free, and reproduce them to any extent he pleases, leaving the poor author or artist without even that amount of protection which, under a system of absolute free trade, is derived from the importer having at least to pay the foreign producer for his labor.

It is not an uncommon supposition that the absence of copyright treaties with foreign countries, although it may tend to some doubtful results in point of honesty, at least inflicts no material injury on anybody but the foreign author. But this is a gross fallacy, and one which we wish to dispel. The native author and artist suffer far more, and the country suffers to an extent, too, of which few who have not given the matter much consideration have any idea. This subject is brought very forcibly to our mind just now by the holiday books which lie on our table. A very large proportion of them—we will not say what proportion, lest we should be deemed guilty of exaggeration—are reproductions either in whole or in part of English books; of the designs, it is safe to say that two-thirds are those of English artists. This is true of the lighter literature. It is true in a still greater degree of the heavy. Almost all the weighty books, requiring protracted thought or research for their production—dictionaries, political, religious, or philosophic or economic speculation, which have appeared in the American market for several years, have been of foreign origin. Even the department of political philosophy, in which we once shone, seems to have passed out of our hands. Mill, Buckle, Lecky, Göschen, De Tocqueville, Laboulaye, have of late years done nearly all our deep thinking and protracted investigating for us, though all these men have been laboring in fields in which we, with our greater freedom from the obscuring influence of tradition, ought, unquestionably, to be more at home than they.

Our dependence on European art is not so apparent. Of late years we have been making great progress in its higher branches, but in the higher branches of art our artists do enjoy complete protection. Paintings and statues cannot be multiplied except at a cost in labor and money little short of that of the original. But designs can be reproduced ad infinitum, and we accordingly find that our designing power is infinitesimally small. The designs on our carpets and cottons, so far as we can be said to have any, are imported from Europe; those in our illustrated books come mostly from the same source. Our illustrated papers appropriate everything from foreign journals that will possibly admit of adaptation to local circumstances, with the most admirable sang froid. Great progress has been made during the war, owing to the necessity of the case, in descriptive drawing, but when there is any call for creative power, as in the case of Mrs. Grundy and other defunct comic journals, the lack of it is made deplorably manifest, and mainly, in our opinion, because the facility with which publishers are allowed to help themselves abroad has prevented its cultivation at home.

It may as well be understood, once for all, that but very few men will devote themselves with all their souls to literary or artistic pursuits without any hope of material advantage. The most ardent worshipper of the sublime or beautiful wants in our day to be paid for his work, and paid well; and unless he is paid well he will not stick to it. This is particularly true in this country, where so many roads to pecuniary independence are open to every man of ordinary industry and energy. There are not many men who love art or letters well enough to turn aside from "business" in order to write or draw, unless these pursuits too are sufficiently like business to pay them for their time. But we may rely upon it we shall not only never witness the formation of a good and large literary class here, or get our best men to do their best in writing and designing, until the command of the American market is secured to them. How can any review, for instance, afford to offer writers sufficient inducements to use all their powers in its service, when every quarterly and almost every monthly in England is cribbed wholesale and hawked about the country for a small profit on poor paper and worse typography? And how can we expect our best artists to use their highest powers in that most important branch of art, the designing of wood-cuts for popular publications, when publishers are able to appropriate everything they can lay hands on abroad, and multiply it here to any extent they please? With such a book-buying public as we have, artists ought every Christmas to reap a golden harvest from the preparation of drawings for holiday books. As it is, they derive hardly any benefit from the enormous sales of this species of literature which take place every year. Very few of them are called on to contribute; those who are, find the price of their work fixed by the cost of copying English designs; and what is almost worse is, the scurvy execution of the copies prevents native designers being compelled to do their best in competition. Any of them can, with very little exertion, produce work that will compare well enough with the poor copies of English prints by which so many of our holiday books are disfigured.

It is no doubt true that knowledge is diffused and society benefited by the fact that the works of foreign authors are, through the wonderful freedom of trade enjoyed by our publishers, to be had very cheap. We dare say we know more than we should know if there were not so many cheap reprints of foreign books. But we certainly think much less, and there is nothing more certain than that we shall as a nation, no matter what wonderful results we may achieve in beef, pork, and flour, and machinery and inventions, never realize our own ideal, unless more of our thinking is done in America; unless the American mind is applied with greater intensity and thoroughness than at present to the study of the great social and moral and political problems of our time. This will, however, never be until our thinkers get a fair chance in the market of their own country. Philosophers need bread and butter and beef-steaks as well as other people, so do writers of all kinds who undertake to do their work thoroughly, and at present it is hardly worth the while, in a material sense, for any American writer to do anything thoroughly. Our slowness in forming a large literary class, or even a large class possessed of a keen critical judgment, may, we think, be partly accounted for in the same way. At present the only authors below those of genius who have really "made a good thing" out of literature are "historians" like J. S. C. Abbott, and "biographers" like P. C. and J. T. Headley, and "moralists" like our friend A. Muzzey, who play about the same part in supplying the public with intellectual food that the great stump-tail establishments do in supplying it with milk.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE EIGHT-HOUR MOVEMENT.

The advocates of the eight-hour movement are making an effort to have the working-day restricted to eight hours in all Government yards and workshops, which is a very good idea if Government can afford it, as it cannot until it has paid its debts. Nor has it an right to pay any of its employees more than the market price for a fair day's labor as long as the rest of the community is working to the utmost extent of its powers, in order to meet the heavy burden of taxation under which we are now laboring. The day when it will be established as a precedent that the Government is authorized to pay men full wages for a short day's labor will witness the unsealing of a great fountain of corruption. There are not many steps from this to the establishment of Louis Blanc's "national workshops."

It is hoped, we are told, that the example of the Government will exercise a "moral influence" on other employers, and lead them to do likewise. If the question were simply a moral one, this might be a legitimate way of pricking the consciences of hardened capitalists. But the doctrine that men have to work ten hours a day owing simply to the greed or hardheartedness of capitalists is an unfair assumption. In democratic countries, people are supposed to work for what length of time they please. The argument that American workmen have to submit to the demands of capitalists in order to save their families from starving, means simply that they are, as regards this, in pretty much the same fix as nine-tenths of the human race, though in many other respects better off. We are all, who have not inherited wealth, or accumulated it by past industry, working to keep ourselves and others dependent on us from starvation, and if we work to the full extent of our powers, it simply proves that society requires it of us, and that the world has not acquired sufficient wealth to allow of the human race maintaining itself on half time.

There is only one way in which these demands can be rendered less injurious, and that is by reducing the community to a condition of contentment like that of the natives of the tropics, for whom a few mangoes a day and a cotton rag twice a year fill the cup of bliss to the brim. Capitalists, when they get all the labor they can for their money without injuring the powers of those who work for them, fulfil the only condition on which capital can be either preserved or increased, and it is their first duty to increase it ; and in our opinion, in a free country like this, where every man has the unbridled use of his faculties, Providence has so arranged it that in doing this they shall serve the best interests of those around them.

But the eight-hour men have not, after all, faced the real question, and that is—How do you propose to enable capitalists who are reached by your law to compete with those who are not; and how do you propose to prevent those who own capital from transferring it to other places as soon as your law begins to diminish their profits?

THE PROGRESS OF THE CATTLE PLAGUE.

The report of the commissioners concerning the cattle plague in England was made at the close of October, when the rate of mortality from pest and pole-axe together did not seem to justify their recommendation of a general suspension of transportation and a very free slaughtering of infected beasts. But the returns of the four succeeding weeks have indicated a truly alarming increase of the ravages, and equal the total loss for as many months since the disease broke out. From the original centre of infection it is now estimated that there have been developed by contagion four thousand separate centres, embracing nearly the whole of Great Britain. Estimating the horned stock of the island at 7,000,000 head, the weekly mortality up to the 21st October was 700; a month later it was four times that number, with an upward tendency. Add to these uncomfortable statistics that by certain Orders in Council inspectors of neat cattle have been appointed, through the justices of the peace, with almost unlimited power to destroy or cause to be destroyed, not only the infected, but even the remaining healthy, portion of any herd.

When it is remembered that the Rinderpest which afflicted England in the middle of the last century lasted more than a dozen years and died out rather than was expelled, while as yet science is unable to explain its nature or to provide a remedy, it is natural for all classes of the population to be despondent before the present prospect. There is, indeed, a temporary gleam of hope from a despised quarter. The application of the homœopathic treatment has begun, in spite of much opposition from the regular practitioners, and has commended itself to some of the richest and largest stock-owners, who, for the rest, are not universally believers in it. No positive result has yet been reached. A Mr. Moore is said to have been successful in the county of Norfolk; but his cures are disparaged by assertions that he selects the mildest type of the disease. This, however, is better than nothing. In Yorkshire on certain farms fifty per cent. of the cattle attacked have been saved, it is asserted, by homœopathists. On the other hand, the Times mentions an experiment in Leeds where seventeen cattle were housed with great regard to temperature and subjected to the same treatment. Of these eleven died and the others were not expected to live. "Arsenicum" appears to be the drug chiefly relied on, and is even administered as a prophylactic. A report on this treatment is eagerly awaited from the Dutch Government, for it is stated that seventy-three per cent. of the cattle attacked in Holland are indebted for their preservation to the disciples of Hahnemann.

Philosophers are not wanting to turn the calamity of the plague to account, and to see in it the cause of permanent advantages. The price of meat having risen inordinately in London and the great towns, a growing resort to distant butchers is noticed, with the promise of lowering prices in the city and enhancing them in the country; in other words, of equalizing them throughout the kingdom. Those who do not patronize Devonshire or other counties send to Holland and Denmark as easily and cheaply for sides and quarters, and meat is now imported in this fashion at 6d. or less per pound. Liebig's extract of meat, once considered a costly article of diet, has been outstripped by the rise in beef, and is coming into fashion. American beef and mutton are also in the market at moderate rates, and the importation is likely to increase. Then it is hoped that Parliament will take measures to establish a system of agricultural statistics, for want of which there is now great ignorance of the proportion between the wealth of the farming districts and the losses entailed upon them by the plague. The British secretaries of legation on the Continent are instructed to obtain such statistics from the respective countries in which they reside, but it would be impossible for them to give in return an account of acres, crops, and domestic animals in their own. The ignorance of the farmers, who fear an exposure of their private affairs, has been and still is the chief obstacle to the proposed system. The land-owners favor it.

The bill which Mr. Wentworth carried through the House on Monday week, and was reported in the Senate on Thursday, prohibits henceforth the importation of cattle to this country until thirty days after the President shall have proclaimed the danger of contagion to be past. The measure is prudent and timely.

Correspondence.

THE SOVEREIGNTY OF THE STATES.

IV.

THE STATES UNDER THE CONSTITUTION.

Before proceeding to discuss the relations between the individual States and the United States—relations which must be considered in the light of a pending, practical, vital question, not of a mere historical problem—I desire to protest against the imputation that I am covertly arguing in favor of federal centralization or of any increase of executive or legislative federal powers. I would sooner reduce than augment those powers. I would greatly retrench the federal patronage, which is one of the executive powers most dangerous to the liberties of the citizen, and, at the same time, to him who wields it, for in unskilful hands it is apt to prove suicidal; and I would not enlarge the sphere to which the law-making power of Congress extends. But, at the same time, I think some of the questions which the framers of the Constitution did not dare to touch, or which have been unsettled by State legislation, or by the weakness, the partiality, or the partizanship of judicial tribunals, should now be determined for ever by constitutional amendment. For the first time since the Constitution went into operation, the true friends of its fundamental principles, the real democracy, have the power of supplying its deficiencies, explaining its few equivocal provisions, and correcting its fundamental error—the toleration of an aristocratic class. Politically speaking, the enemies of the Union "have no rights which" its friends "are bound to respect." Let us generously use the power which the sword, not the revival of patriotic sentiment among a traitorous faction, has given us, for purposes of undeserved mercy; and let us confer on the rebellious South, in spite of herself, those equal institutions the value of which she is incompetent to appreciate, and which she certainly has not yet shown that she merits.

Independently of all considerations of justice and humanity to the negro as such, the rights and franchises of citizenship ought to be determined by explanatory amendments to the federal Constitution, because the plain intent and meaning of its provisions have been perverted and set at naught both by State legislation and by a sectionally inspired judiciary.

By the second section of the fourth article it is declared that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." The legislation of the South has nullified this provision by denying to citizens of Northern States the rights guaranteed to them by the clause in question; and to sustain this monstrous violation of constitutional law, the Supreme Court, in defiance of every principle of American jurisprudence and of the notorious fact that many, if not most, of even the slaveholding States had extended the elective franchise to free colored persons, solemnly adjudged that such persons could not be citizens—could not be men—under our boasted frame of free government. This shameful decision cannot, indeed, be expunged from our judicial records. It must remain for ever as emphatically the "damned spot" of the parricidal hand, the ineffaceable stain on the scutcheon of the federal judiciary. We cannot recall to life the millions who have fallen, the oceans of treasure that have been wasted in the struggle which found its occasion, if not its chief cause, in that ill-omened judgment; but we can, at least, repudiate the perverted interpretation of the Constitution, and remove one cause of future conflict of local jurisdictions, by providing a common test of citizenship, a common rule of civic qualification, for all who by birth or naturalization are entitled to the privileges of American nationality.

A further necessity for regulating the qualifications of citizenship by constitutional provision has arisen from the action of different States in regard to residents of foreign birth. The seventh section of the first article of the Constitution confers upon Congress the power "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization," and the Supreme Court has decided that this authority is lodged exclusively in Congress. Some of the States, however, have practically overruled this decision and the constitutional provision to which it refers, by conferring the elective franchise on foreigners not naturalized, without requiring any other qualification than a short residence. It is contended in some parts of the Union that, in spite of this decision, every State has the right to fix the qualifications of voters for the local legislature. By the second section of the first article of the Constitution it is provided that the electors of members of Congress shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature. Accordingly, a foreigner who is permitted to vote for a representative in such legislature, votes also for members of Congress. While, therefore, a native-born freeman who owns a large estate, pays taxes in proportion, and perhaps serves in the army, is in one State denied a voice in the government of his country, a transient foreigner, here to-day and gone again back to Europe, perhaps, to-morrow, who pays no taxes, who is ignorant even of the English language, and who does not so much as know that we have a Constitution, has, in another State, or even in the same, as great weight in the election of members of Congress as Andrew Johnson or Ulysses S. Grant. Nay, the inequality does not stop here; for in some States qualifications are required in native-born white freemen which are not required elsewhere in foreigners who have given no other pledge of their intention to become American citizens than a year's residence. Such discrepancies in the exercise of the most sacred of political rights ought not to exist in a free and enlightened commonwealth. They cannot be harmonized by concert between the States. Congress has no jurisdiction of the question; and it is evident that the evil can be remedied only by constitutional amendment.

The claims to the rights of secession and of nullification ought also to be for ever silenced by declaratory provision. But, these various points being regulated by proper changes in our organic law, and the amendment abolishing slavery being adopted, I would leave the States unshorn of every prerogative, and in the full enjoyment of every power and privilege which they have hitherto possessed.

I have said that the point under discussion, the sovereignty of the States, was a pending, practical, vital question, and it seems to me that, unless the view I am taking of the subject is sound, neither the emancipation proclamation nor any other of the leading measures of the last Administration, nor even the plan of reconstruction now in progress under President Johnson, can be sustained as having any legal force or validity. Every one of the measures in question involves the exercise of powers by the national Executive and Congress which are utterly inconsistent with the notion of a substantial sovereignty in the States. Sovereignties are either co-equal or, with reference to each other, they are non-existent; for "a sovereignty subordinate to another sovereignty" is a contradiction in terms, and the true relation of the inferior to the superior can never be expressed by a proposition which shall ascribe that attribute to both, with whatever qualifications it may be guarded. We may indeed say, loosely, of the United States and the several States, that they are sovereign each in their respective spheres. But we may, with equal truth and comprehensiveness of meaning, say the same thing of the United States and any chartered corporation—Dartmouth College, for instance. The word sovereign signifies just as much in one case as in the other, and it is an abuse of language to employ it in either. The application of the predicate "sovereign"—a definite and well understood technical term of the vocabulary of political science—to the States of the American Union, is precisely one of those cases where, as Coleridge observes, "by familiarizing the mind to equivocal expressions—that is, such as may be taken in two or more different meanings—we introduce confusion of thought and furnish the sophist with his best and handiest tools. For the juggle of sophistry consists, for the most part, in using a word in one sense in the premises and in another sense in the conclusion." In the minds of the framers of the confederation, "sovereign," as applied to the several States, conveyed a totally different idea from that expressed by the same word as applied to the United States, or to other independent powers, as France or Great Britain; and this double use of the word, this "juggle" of Southern sophistry, has proved the "best and handiest tool" of the State-right disorganizers.

It must strike persons familiar with our political history as a singular fact, that the pretensions of the several States to the rights of sovereignty have risen just in proportion as more and more the real attributes of sovereignty have been denied to them by the successive forms of organic law under which we have lived. The colonies, with far larger governmental prerogatives than the States have ever enjoyed, claimed no sovereignty at all. The States, under their original organization by authority of Congress, made no such claim. It was not advanced in the Declaration of Independence, which in no way attempted to define or limit State powers, nor was it heard of until the confederation, in which instrument a feeble plea was set up in its behalf. In the species of interregnum which elapsed between the confederation and the Constitution, no definite pretension or recognition of State sovereignty was put forward or conceded, and it was only after the Constitution had declared the States destitute of every shadow of truly sovereign power which the confederation had left them, that the crazy doctrine of a supremacy within, and at the same time absolutely independent of, another supremacy, the most consummate reductio ad absurdum ever arrived at by political theorists, appeared in its full-blown mock majesty. It is to modern South Carolina that we are indebted for the fullest development of these doctrines, for it is her publicists who have proclaimed the States to be superior over Congress, over the federal judiciary, over the people of the Union. But the pupils have outrun the master; for Calhoun, though he advocated nullification, or the right of a State to decide for itself upon the constitutionality of a law of Congress, admitted that the right of secession did not exist.

In following the steps of this history, we are continually brought back to the question: How did the Anglo-American colonies individually acquire this attribute of sovereignty?

Not by royal grant, assuredly.

Not by successful revolt and conquest of independence. For it was not the colonial governments which revolted. On the contrary, the people revolted against those governments as the instruments of British despotism, overthrew them, and erected in their place new governments organized under the authority of Congress.

Nor did any colony conquer its own independence.

All fought for all; all achieved together the independence of the people of the United States. The sovereignty won by American arms could only lodge in the power which conquered it—the people, namely, whose only common visible organ was the Congress, and in whom it still remains, except just so far as that people has conceded it, for local purposes, to the States. Congress being once organized, the exercise of the popular sovereignty was vested in it, and the people looked to this instrument of their own creation as the deus ex machina who was to intervene because a dignus vindice nodus, a conjuncture demanding the putting forth of powers which no Colonial Governments could, either singly or jointly, exercise, had arisen. It has always been admitted that, in a revolution which aims at emancipation from allegiance to an existing dynasty, of whatever form or name, the revolutionary government, to which the nation entrusts its physical force for the achievement of its deliverance, is necessarily supreme. The inefficiency of Congress was not in its want of power, but in the want of organs for the employment of its powers, and when, at a critical moment in the autumn of 1776, the national Government bestowed upon Washington the unlimited authority of a military dictator, no State complained that Congress had gone beyond its limits by conferring what it did not itself possess. There was, then, at this period, no sovereign but the American people; for sovereignty could not lodge in subordinate jurisdiction; in colonies which had no governments but those acknowledging the supremacy of Congress and existing only by its authorization; in colonies which had no known, no ascertainable, in fact no possible, boundaries, and, of course, not even a geographical individuality. And in connection with this last point, it is important to notice that the consciousness of this fact, namely, the impossibility of knowing the territorial limits, the extent of jurisdiction of the several colonies, had a vast influence in opening the eyes of sectional politicians to the true status of those corporations, and was an argument of great weight in inducing the adoption of a national frame of government, invested with power to administer, for the common benefit, the immense empire of unappropriated lands to which there were so many conflicting claims.

Nor has State sovereignty been conceded by grant from the people of the United States. We have shown that neither by the Declaration of Independence nor by the Confederation was this attribute conferred upon the several States. It remains to enquire whether the federal Constitution so enlarged the prerogatives of those bodies as to entitle them to claim the rank of sovereign and independent peoples, which will be the object of my next and final communication on this subject.

G. P. M.

FLORENCE, ITALY, Nov. 30.

OLD ENGLISH LITERATURE.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I beg leave to avail myself of your columns to call attention to the proceedings of the Early English Text Society of London, an association formed for the purpose of publishing, at cheap rates, and in a form satisfactory to critical scholarship, that portion of old English literature which has not yet been made generally accessible to students of our mother tongue. It is well known that the public and private libraries of England contain a large number of manuscripts of early English writers which have never been printed, and that many valuable works belonging to the primitive age of English literature, though printed, cannot be said to have been published, because the editions have not been brought into the market, and have consisted only of a sufficient number to supply the members of small literary clubs, and hence they are practically almost as much out of the reach of ordinary scholars as if they still existed only in manuscript. It is said that more than half of the early printed literature of England—including the romances relating to King Arthur, who, after having been almost forgotten for five centuries, has, though perhaps but a mythical creation, been evoked from the dead and made an ever-living memory by the genius of Tennyson—is in this inaccessible condition, while the yet unprinted song and story of British national infancy would form a body of mediæval literature very considerable in extent, in philological interest, and in intrinsic worth.

In 1864 the society published a volume of alliterative poetry of the fourteenth century; a new text of the story of Arthur; "Lauder on the Office and Dewtie of Kyngis;" and "Syr Gawayne and the Green Knight." The publications for 1865 make seven volumes, comprising texts from four unique manuscripts now edited for the first time, besides three works of which small editions had previously been printed; and it is intended to increase the number of yearly issues as fast as due care in preparation and execution permit, and the amount of subscription justifies.

The volumes are of the octavo size; the texts conform with scrupulous accuracy to the best manuscripts; they are provided with learned historical and critical introductions, various readings, explanatory notes and glossarial indexes, and, as reproductions of most valuable and fast decaying literary and philological material, they satisfy every reasonable demand, while in mechanical execution they leave nothing to be desired.

The annual subscription is but twenty-one shillings sterling, or five dollars and eight cents, which is scarcely half what the volumes would cost if brought out in the usual way of publication.

The labor of editing works of this character and of carrying them through the press is immense. The eminent philologists who are performing this task must be very inadequately compensated, if, indeed, they receive any pecuniary recompense; and it would be hard to name a literary enterprise of the present day which better merits a generous encouragement among the nations that use the English tongue.

If the society is sustained as it deserves, its operations will, in a few years, place the American scholar who avails himself of its labors on a level with the favored few who have access to the vast repositories of manuscript lore in England, and we shall be able to prosecute original researches into the structure, composition, and history of our noble speech, instead of adopting, without independent enquiry, as we have been hitherto too often obliged to do, the conclusions of foreign investigators.

When, a few years ago, the London Philological Society asked the aid of American scholarship in the collection and preparation of the material for the great English thesaurus which it had undertaken, the appeal scarcely met with a response, a large proportion of the letters addressed to literary men, and especially to the professors in American colleges, on this subject, not having even been answered. It reflects little credit on the zeal of our literati for the elucidation of their native tongue that one of the most magnificent lexicographical enterprises ever undertaken—an enterprise, too, in which our real interest is every whit as great as that of the people of England—should have been treated with this cold neglect; and I am sorry to be obliged to add that, though the proposals of the Early English Text Society have been brought to the notice of a large number of American literary men, they have been received with equal indifference.

The publications of this society will undoubtedly form the most important series of works illustrative of old English philology ever offered to the public. No literary institution possessing a permanent library, no student who makes the English language a specialty, can dispense with this collection. No better—and, if I must again refer to the economical argument, no cheaper—helps can be found for the study of old English literature, and yet, though our colleges and ardent philologists are counted by hundreds, not ten subscriptions for these volumes have been received from the United States!

I do not know that the society has any authorized agent in New York, but subscriptions can be remitted, and the volumes received, through any bookseller who imports from London. The subscription of one pound one shilling is payable annually before the first of January, and remittances, with directions for the consignment of the books, should be sent to the Honorary Secretary, H. R. Wheatley, Esq., 53 Berners Street, London, W.

G. P. M.

Florence, November 20, 1865.

A CHEAP AND EASY WAY TO FAME.

To the Editor of The Nation:

A late British periodical has briefly noticed a bookselling speculation which deserves a mention in the columns of The Nation, both as one of the curiosities of contemporary literature and because it offers to the illustrious obscure of our own and other countries a means of securing present fame and future immortality at rates which, considering the price men are willing to pay for even vulgar notoriety, must be allowed to be dog-cheap. With this view I give you the history of a case where the privilege of blowing his own trumpet was offered to an American residing in Europe in an official capacity. Operations were commenced by a letter from the directorship of the Temple of Renown at Geneva, or, as it modestly styles itself, the "Histoire Générale des Services, des Œuvres et des Fonctions dans chaque Nation," informing the person addressed that his name was to form the subject of a "historical article" or of a "mention" in that work, and requesting him to communicate to the director such information as he should think expedient. The "Histoire Générale" was described as an historical and biographical dictionary on the plan of Moreri, and designed as a continuation of that work. It was to be published in both octavo and folio, and it was stated that it counted among its subscribers twenty-six sovereign princes of the blood and other chiefs of states, three hundred and sixty heads of princely houses and other great families, one hundred and eighty ministers of state, ambassadors, ministers plenipotentiary, field-marshals, admirals, other great dignitaries, cardinals and other ecclesiastics, generals, men of science, besides a miscellaneous multitude of persons in "different social positions."

In spite of the temptation of seeing himself in such choice company, the gentleman in question took no notice of the invitation, and it was followed by a second letter, earnestly pressing the request for such facts of his personal history as would suffice for "the few lines of which a simple mention was composed." He then sent the director a statement of the facts and dates of his official and public life, and was soon after favored with a third communication, acknowledging the receipt of the information, which was pronounced to be full enough for an "article assez complet," instead of a simple mention. The candidate for fame, present and posthumous, being now regarded as having fairly nibbled at the bait, he was informed that, in consideration of the great expense of bringing out so voluminous a publication, of running cars for posterity—a terminus so distant that trains would start "only once in an age or a generation"—he must make a "subscription," take a first, second, or third class ticket, according to his ambition and his purse. The price of the first class, articles of six or seven large folio pages, was a thousand francs; of the second, three or four pages, five hundred; of the third, one or two full pages, two hundred; and any additional amount of celebrity could be had at one hundred and fifty francs per page, payment in advance in all cases. "Well," said the gentleman on reading this communication, "if I can't go down to posterity on cheaper terms than these, I'll stay here!" and he returned no reply to the director. A further attempt was made to secure his patronage, by an offer of twenty-five per cent. deduction from the regular prices, as a compensation for the authorship of his own biography, but, this not being accepted, the correspondence was dropped, and large as is the space he fills in his own eye, future generations must be content with such knowledge of him, his words, and his works as they can gather from a "simple mention" of his name in the "Histoire Générale des Services, des Œuvres et des Fonctions dans chaque Nation."

"He that is great wants to be rich; he that is rich wants to be great," says the French proverb. Our war is reported to have made many great men rich. Let our rich who long to be great address themselves—of course, with remittance post-paid—to the illustrious Goncet, à la Direction de l'Histoire Générale, à Genève, and glory shall be dealt out to them in proportion to their tin.

Viator.

Rome, November 20, 1865.

THE SOUTH AS IT IS.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

XXI.

CHARLESTON, S. C., November 27, 1865.

THE various new influences and agencies recently brought to bear upon the freed people of South Carolina are all under the direction and control of officers whose headquarters are in this city. The courtesy of these gentlemen has enabled me, during my stay in Charleston, to gather some information, not easily to be obtained elsewhere, on two or three interesting subjects, such as the negro schools, the Freedmen's Savings Bank, one of the most useful of Gen. Saxton's institutions, the working of the Freedmen's Bureau throughout the State, and the reports made by its subordinate officers to the Assistant Commissioner.

The task of instructing the negroes was begun at Port Royal, under the auspices of the Northern Freedmen's Aid Commissions, so long ago as the spring of 1862, and the schools then founded have since been constantly giving instruction to many hundred persons, and are still in successful operation. As soon as Charleston was surrendered, these same charitable societies sent out their teachers and a supply of books; and in March last, under the general supervision of Mr. Redpath, of Massachusetts, several large schools were formed, which were kept open till July. In the autumn, by a happy appointment, Mr. Reuben Tomlinson was made State Superintendent of Education. He at once proceeded to grade the schools in the city, to provide them with suitable rooms, and so far as possible to extend the school system over all the State. To a considerable extent this has been effected. The Freedmen's Bureau is poor, and before the school buildings could be fitted for the reception of pupils it became necessary for the superintendent to expend something like a thousand dollars of his private means in making needful repairs. The houses had suffered from Gillmore's bombardment.

By the middle of October about eighteen hundred scholars were collected into three schools, separated into many classes, and put in charge of forty competent teachers. The largest school, held in the old Normal School building, contains nearly eight hundred pupils. The head-master is a colored man, a graduate of the University of Glasgow, and the various classes are taught by about twenty persons, of whom some are Northern women and some Southern, and of the latter some are white and some are colored. In the other large school the principal is a Massachusetts man, and among his sixteen subordinates are included women from New England, women who were once slaves, and women belonging to Charleston families once wealthy, but made poor by the war. Among the pupils there were no white children, or rather, none of unmixed Caucasian blood; there were many whom most people would have taken for white, and more than a fourth of the children were brown or yellow. I visited many of the rooms, finding the scholars studious and very orderly, and at all stages of advancement. In a room of the Normal School building three hundred children together were taking an object lesson; in another room a class of boys, whose parents, I was told, intended them for professional life, were transposing, analyzing, and parsing a passage from Milton's "L'Allegro," and recitations in reading and arithmetic were going on with more or less success before the other teachers.

A majority of the pupils in these schools were ignorant of the alphabet a year ago, but nearly half of them had received some instruction. The first assistant in the Normal School building, a free colored girl, has kept a private school in Charleston during the past four years, and among her present pupils are many of her old ones. Having been herself educated by her father, she began just before the war to teach a class of forty or fifty free colored girls in her own house. Under the law prohibiting the teaching of negroes she was twice arrested, but by the interposition of her mother's guardian, Major King, a license was granted her by Mayor McBeth to keep a school for free colored persons, on condition that no slaves should be admitted to it, and that a white person should be always in the room during school hours. She complied with these conditions, hiring a white woman to sit in the school-room with her sewing, and kept the school open till the capture of the city.

I am told that the free negroes, as distinguished from the freed people, still cultivate a feeling of exclusiveness, and, among other modes of displaying it, still send their children to private schools. Whether or not their action in that particular is justified by any superiority of the private over the public schools, I cannot say.

All the teachers in Charleston, as well as in the State at large, are paid by the New York National Relief Association, or by the New England Freedmen's Aid Commission. The buildings now occupied by the schools belong to the State, and as these may soon be taken away from the Bureau, the Superintendent of Education proposes soon to solicit contributions from Northern men in order that he may build a house for the exclusive use of the freedmen.

In the whole State there are now forty-eight schools in operation, attended by six thousand pupils, and taught by one hundred and eight teachers, of whom eighty are from the North and twenty-eight are Southerners. In Columbia, Greenville, Orangeburg, Summerville, Georgetown, and on the coast islands schools are already established; they are in process of organization at Camden, Florence, Darlington, Sumter, and Cheraw, and it is confidently hoped that before the spring at least one teacher will be at work in each county town. The superintendent, after an extended tour through the State, reports the white people as not only indifferent but entirely opposed to the educating of the negroes, and is of opinion that outside of Charleston no colored school could be maintained a month after the Federal troops are withdrawn.

The South Carolina Freedmen's Savings Bank was founded at Beaufort in August, 1864. The colored soldiers then in the Department of the South were receiving large bounties and good pay, and many of them being unused to the possession of money were in the habit of spending it wastefully and improvidently. For example, after a regiment had been paid off it was not unusual to see a soldier wearing two watches and two chains, and some one of the little jewelry shops at Beaufort or Hilton Head would sell as many as seventy, more or less, worthless watches in one day. It was not uncommon for the officers of colored regiments to borrow their men's money and embark it in some land scheme or other profitable business. If the creditors of these officers chanced to die, they very likely left no heirs, for many of them were refugees from hostile States and without families. It was proved that the captain of one company, after the paymaster had made his rounds, sent his orderly sergeant on a borrowing mission to every man in his command. It was in the interest of the soldiers, therefore, that General Saxton established his bank. Two gentlemen of his staff, who served without salary, were designated as managers of the business, with orders to receive deposits of five cents and upwards. Interest at the rate of 5 per cent. was to be paid on all sums exceeding $25, and when dividends should be declared the profits that had accrued were to be divided among persons who had deposited $25 and upwards. All investments were to be made in United States securities. General Saxton issued a circular explaining the objects of the institution, telling the freedmen, "You will thus have a secure place of deposit for your money, where it will yield you a fair rate of interest, and will at the same time indirectly aid in sustaining the Government which is doing so much for you." Deposits at once came in rapidly, and the enterprise seems to have been very successful. A circular issued on the 16th ult., when the bank was a little more than a year old, makes these statements: "On this day the actual deposits in the bank amounted to $250,734 74, of which there had been paid out to depositors $73,690 71. After paying all expenses, the total assets, consisting of United States securities and cash on hand, amount to $179,066 20, showing a profit to the bank of about $2,000 over and above all liabilities and expenditures."

The funds remaining in the bank on the 16th of October have been turned over to the National Freedmen's Savings and Trust Company, and I believe the sum thus entrusted to that corporation forms by far the larger part of its capital.

The depositors in the bank at Beaufort were nearly all soldiers. The laborers there deposited very little; for, while they had less money than the men serving in the army, their expenses were very much greater, and less pains was taken to inform them of the nature of the institution. Their small savings were usually concealed in their cabins.

The Freedmen's Bureau was organized in this State by the appointment of General Saxton as Assistant Commissioner. General Ely, at Columbia, is an acting Assistant Commissioner, and is subject to General Saxton's orders. Subordinate to these officers, there are officials of two classes thinly scattered up and down over the State; in several of the districts there are civilians, called agents of the Bureau, who have no other duty than to attend to the government and protection of the negroes. The limited fund at the disposal of the Commissioner has kept the number of such agents very small. The great bulk of the colored population where it can be reached by the Bureau at all is in the charge of sub-assistant commissioners. These are military officers who, in addition to their strictly military functions as commanders of garrisons and the like, are expected to carry into effect the orders of the Assistant Commissioner. For this additional duty, as may be supposed, they have little liking and little fitness of any sort. At headquarters it is said of them that a majority of the sub-assistants cannot be trusted to do justice between the laborers and the planters; they invariably range themselves on the side of the latter.

It is beyond a doubt that during the past year many of these officials have permitted the planters to tie their laborers up by the thumbs, to throw them into confinement, and to ill-use and oppress them in many ways. I hear of plantations where negroes have been compelled to work throughout the season under a contract which gave them as wages only one-sixth of the crop. It is to be remembered that all planting this year was done late, and that there has been almost no attempt to raise anything more than a limited quantity of breadstuffs. As a consequence, therefore, of the mistaken policy pursued in many districts, there are large numbers of negroes, of whom some are newly discharged from their places, who have only four or five bushels of corn for the support of their families through the winter. Many of them have even less than that. An agent of the Bureau in Beaufort district says in his report for the month of November: "The pressure upon this office for assistance for those who have spent the summer far up in the State, laboring for Mr. Inscot, Robert Barnwell, and others, who have now sent them here without any pay for the summer's work or provisions for the winter, is immense."

Doubtless, an officer of the greatest ability and activity, with the best intentions, would find it almost impossible, with the means now in his control, to protect all the negroes in one of these wide-extending districts.

Every agent of the Bureau is required to make a monthly report of affairs in his district to the Assistant Commissioner, and he, in turn, at the end of each month sends a concise abstract of the reports to the office of the Commissioner at Washington. The brief for October I have been permitted to see, and I make some extracts from it as perhaps showing more fully than it could be done in any other way some features of the present condition of the freedmen in this State. Reports had been received from eleven districts only, and those for the most part situated on the coast and along the Georgia line. "In the interior of the State," says the report, in conclusion, "where military force cannot readily reach the plantations, affairs are in general worse. It is difficult to reach the murderers of colored people, as they hide themselves and are screened by their neighbors."

Of Edgefield district it is said: "Several affidavits have been received of cruelties practised here. One freedman with two males and one female children were stripped naked, tied up, and whipped severely, threats of murder being made if complaint was made to the military. Another man was whipped severely with a stick and cut over the eye with a knife, and, as he ran away to escape from their cruelty, was shot at. A woman was severely whipped and carried off to jail, and, as she has disappeared, fears are entertained that she has been murdered. Two children were severely whipped and their mother driven off the plantation without any pay for work done."

In Georgetown district "it is reported that the planters, with assistance of the military, compel the freedmen to do work not called for under their contracts. On one plantation a freedman was twice beaten over the head with a stick and was refused rations."

In Beaufort district, "the officer at Beach Branch is reported as assisting the planters in acts of injustice and cruelty to the freedmen. In one case, a woman and her children were brutally whipped and driven off the place after the crop was harvested. Two men were tied up four feet from the ground and left in that condition more than two hours."

In Anderson district, "one man was shot and killed in presence of his wife, who begged for his life, Two other men were tied up, cruelly flogged, then shot (and, it is believed, killed, as the men have disappeared), while the wife of one of the men received fifty lashes."

The report, in speaking of the Barnwell district, after detailing six cases of negro whipping, and several other outrages that took place during October, goes on to say, that "two freedmen were whipped by their master, who took them to the commanding officer at Barnwell, who told him to whip them again, as they had not had half enough. This officer is reported to pay no attention to the complaints of freedmen. With such an officer in power it is hardly possible to protect them from abuse. Lawlessness on the part of the freedmen must be looked for under such circumstances. It is reported that a band of sixty of them are organized for the purpose of robbery. The leader of it and three men had been captured, and one escaping was shot, and afterwards died of the wound."

Of this district it is also stated that "a regular pass and patrol system (such as was in vogue at the time of slavery) is said to exist."

In Darlington, Williamsburg, and Marion districts, "the reports show in general a better state of affairs than elsewhere. The freedmen are self-supporting, and there is little or no conflict between the two races, though there are individual cases of injustice and dissatisfaction. Many of the planters are not making contracts for the ensuing year, as they are waiting to see what legislation may be made in regard to labor."

Most of these statements are based on affidavits made by the injured parties, and by witnesses of the occurrences. When the report of a case calling for the arrest and trial of any man reaches the office of the Assistant Commissioner, it is necessarily referred to the military commander of the department. It has been usual in this State for the general in command to refer it back to the commander of the district named in the report. Then it is referred by him to the subordinate officer stationed nearest to the place where the outrage is alleged to have occurred. Hitherto it has been found that when this stage was reached the matter ended. Without the co-operation of the military the Commissioner is quite powerless to bring any criminal to justice or to carry the orders of the Bureau into effect.

Just at the cessation of hostilities, in May last, several negroes living on a plantation in Clarendon district refused to work any longer under the old system. They were full of uncertainty as to the future, and they were very much dissatisfied with their overseer, a man by the name of White. Six of them, therefore, left home one morning in a body. White and several of his neighbors pursued them with dogs, and captured them all. One was shot in attempting to escape; the other five were at once hung by the roadside. For a month after this event the people on the plantation remained at home, but some of them at last made their way to Charleston and Kingstree. Affidavits were taken, and complaint was formally made, but the crime has not yet been punished. Perhaps an offense of so great magnitude, and so easily susceptible of complete proof, could nowhere in the State pass unquestioned at the present time; yet this I think by no means quite certain.

It is probable that during the coming winter there will be a good deal of suffering among the freedmen for want of food and clothing. Even more distress is to be apprehended in the Gulf States than in South Carolina. At present, however, less food is given away by the Government than at any time since Johnston's surrender. The money value of the rations delivered to destitute freedmen in Georgia and South Carolina during the month of October was $29,672 09, which is less than half the value of those issued in those two States in the month of September, and in September the value was not so great as in the preceding months. Throughout the four years of war very few masters gave their people the customary supply of clothing, and the destitution in this particular is, therefore, not wholly of recent growth.

But little, I should say, is to be hoped for from State action in these matters. The negro code has been framed, and if that fails to be applied it seems unlikely that anything else will be attempted. I observe a marked change in the feeling and language of the people; they seem much less confident than they were three or four weeks ago that the management of their affairs is to be at once entrusted to their own legislation. These apprehensions affect their actions as well as their words. Mr. Wm. Whaley, a candidate for Congress in the Second district, was beaten at the polls by Mr. Aiken and by General Stephen Eliot, "The hero of Fort Sumter," as he was styled in the electioneering placards. About one half of the voters took no part in the election. In Barnwell district, a very large county, Mr. Whaley says that the polls were not opened. Since the day of election his friends, he says, have come to him by scores and excused themselves for voting for his opponent: "The delegation was not going to be admitted, and they thought it just as well to let Gov. Aiken stand in the lobby as to let him." In Orangeburg and other districts there was the same indifference, and from the newspapers I might quote many expressions of the despondency that has recently stolen over the community.

ENGLAND.

London, Nov. 25, 1865.

The Ministry still remains incomplete. Of the reasons why the process of completion has proceeded so tardily, the outer public knows little or nothing. Indeed, the aristocratic aspect of our mixed government has never been more apparent to me than in the secresy with which the negotiations for the reconstruction of the Palmerston administration have been conducted. Of course, if the nation happened to be eager for information on the subject, that information would be forthcoming. Such changes as there are, are undoubtedly in a liberal direction. In the first place Sir Robert Peel leaves the post of Under-Secretary of Ireland. Seldom, I think, was there ever a more completely manquée career than that of the member for Tamworth. Owning a name dear to Englishmen, the possessor of a large fortune, gifted with considerable talents and with keen ambition, he might have risen to the highest posts in the political world. But somehow he had a fatal faculty for getting into scrapes, from which his friends had to extricate him, with much difficulty to themselves and with some damage to his own repute. Sir Robert was always embracing the side of one or other of the rival factions in the sister kingdom with excessive ardor, and then deserting their cause with excessive promptitude. His last exploit was to get into a personal altercation with a Dublin banker about the right to a seat in a railway car, which all but led to legal proceedings. He would have been thrown out by his colleagues long ago had it not been for the championship of Lord Palmerston. The late premier always prophesied that some day or other Sir Robert would make his mark. But hitherto this hope has not been realized; and I suspect, before long, he will join the Conservatives, and finally be the leader of a Palmerstonian secession from the ministerial ranks. His successor, Mr. Chichester Fortescue, is a pleasant, sensible Irish gentleman, whose chief distinction, perhaps, is, that he was married en quatrièmes noces by Lady Waldegrave, the daughter of Braham, the great English singer. Mr. Kutt also retires from the post of Under-Secretary of the Board of Trade, and is replaced by Mr. Göschen, one of the members for the city. The new secretary is a man of very different calibre from the ordinary run of honorable members. The son of a German merchant, of Hebraic extraction, domiciled in England, he was brought up at Rugby and at Oxford, where he gained high honors and a great academical reputation. On leaving the university he did what is rare with English university men—he went into business. And, what is rarer still with men of that class, he succeeded brilliantly in trade, and acquired not only a large fortune, as a loan-monger, but a very high reputation as a man of high character and honesty. I happen to know that, at the time the Confederate loan was brought out, he was offered the privilege of introducing it on very favorable terms for himself. Though the transaction would, I believe, have been attended with very little if any risk, as far as his part was concerned, and would have put a great many thousands in his pocket, he declined, avowedly because he thought it was not an operation with which a high-minded man should be mixed up. His reputation stood him in good stead when he contested the city some two or three years ago. Though a very young and untried man, he won the seat, and during his short parliamentary career he made several speeches which earned him the attention of the public. At the last city election he was returned at the head of the poll, and his nomination to office was taken almost for granted. In politics, I should think he was a decided Liberal, with fewer prejudices than beset most English politicians; but his chief attention is devoted to finance, and I doubt his taking any very active part in purely political questions.

The most important, however, of the new appointments is that of Mr. William Forster to the Under-Secretaryship of the Colonies. If there is a man in the House who is a Radical, without being a democrat, it is the member for Bradford. A man of shrewd, hard common sense and generous instincts, he has far more influence with the House than Mr. Bright, with whom he agrees in politics. Far inferior to his leader in oratorical, probably also in mental, ability, he has a power of sympathizing with English tastes and feelings in which the member for Birmingham is strangely wanting. If you want to get a man to walk with you, there is no good in beginning your request by treading on his corns; and this is a truth of which Mr. Bright is never mindful and Mr. Forster is always. In the debates about America, the keen, logical arguments of the latter had more weight than the impassioned appeals of the former. Both of them did true service to the cause of freedom. Mr. Forster's father, a member of the Society of Friends, died many years ago while on an anti-slavery mission in Tennessee, and the son has always remained faithful to the anti-slavery creed. There are few men I am acquainted with whose desertion in office of the principles they had professed in opposition, would disappoint me more than if such should prove to be the case with the member for Bradford. I have reason to know he would not have accepted office unless he had believed the Ministry were prepared to deal with the question of reform. On the very eve of his appointment he delivered the most decided pro-reform speech to his constituents which has yet been made since the election of the new Parliament. I have no doubt that Earl Russell intends to introduce some kind of reform bill next session. But there are three points on which I entertain very strong doubts. First, whether the measure will be large enough to effect any real re-distribution of political power; secondly, whether it will be cordially supported by the Ministry; and thirdly, whether, even if so supported, it has any chance of being carried. No valid extension of the franchise is possible unless the country is excited about the matter; and, as yet, I can discover no sign of popular excitement.

My own conviction is that the idea of purely political reform has, to a great extent, lost its hold on the English masses. What is needed to move popular enthusiasm is some proposal of social reform; and, as yet, that is not forthcoming. The real curse of England is the poverty of the agricultural population and of the lower class of working-men, not their exclusion from the right of voting. It is possible the admission of the working-classes to the franchise would bring about the reforms needed to improve heti condition. I believe myself this would be the case, and, therefore, I desire reform. But I say candidly that if I thought the working-classes would remain what they are after being enfranchised, I should oppose any reduction of the suffrage. A case has occurred recently illustrating one of the darkest aspects of English life. A laborer called John Cross was tried before the magistrates of Wimborne, in Dorsetshire, for stealing a hurdle valued at sixpence. For this offence he was sentenced to a fortnight's hard labor in goal. In the course of the evidence it came out that this man, who had worked for one master for four-and-twenty years, and was reckoned a superior laborer, only earned eight shillings a week, on which he had to house, support, clothe, and shelter a sick wife and seven helpless children. It was in order to keep his children from starving of cold that he stole the hurdle in order to light a fire. One of the London papers took the matter up, and forthwith subscriptions came in on every side in shillings and pennies till a sum was raised in a couple of days which will place John Cross in a position to emigrate with his children to some of our colonies, where labor is not a drug in the market. Unfortunately, John Cross is only a type of hundreds of thousands of his fellow-countrymen.

DECEMBER 2.

Our papers will tell you what there is to be said about Jamaica. The subject is a very painful one for an Englishman to write upon at all. I have no sympathy with the habit of mind which causes some persons to assume, invariably, that their own country is in the wrong; and I would feign hope against hope that there is more justification for the bloody vengeance we have inflicted upon the black population in Jamaica than would appear at first sight. As yet not one word of evidence has been forwarded to prove the existence of any conspiracy at all; and, strange to say, Governor Eyre and his colleagues appear to be totally unaware of the necessity for communicating such evidence at all. I am glad to say that the last intelligence from Jamaica has created a most painful impression throughout England, and the attacks in the Governor's speech against the Baptist missionaries have excited the indignation of the "religious" world to an unprecedented degree. My own impression is that, quite apart from any other considerations, the political pressure which the Dissenting communities can bring to bear upon all borough members of Parliament will ensure decisive action on the part of the Government. Governor Eyre will probably be recalled, and a commission of enquiry sent out to Jamaica. Such reparation, God knows, is slight enough. I wish I felt sure it would be granted. In spite of the experience of the last five years, I never realized till now how strongly our educated classes were imbued with a sort of sneaking pro-slavery sympathy. Mr. Carlyle has much to answer for; his influence as a teacher, I am thankful to say, is dying out; he has outlived his literary reputation; and the public has grown weary of his tricks of writing, his constant repetitions, and his stilted style. But the influence of his servile worship of brute force, his brutal contempt for the weak, and his preposterous deification of the one duty of work, has survived his fame. His twaddle about Black Quashee, the "eternal veracities," and the rest of the dreary jargon in which slavery was really held up to honor and abolitionism to contempt, have left an evil leaven in the minds of the present generation of our governing classes. Possibly I write too strongly, but then I feel strongly on this matter. If you could see, as I have seen for years, how deep the sophistries to which Carlyle gave utterance have worked their way into the minds of educated Englishmen, you would, I think, share my feelings. In my judgment, the author of the "Latter-Day Pamphlets" has done as much to pervert the moral sense of his countrymen as he has to degrade their language. More than that I cannot say. To any man endowed with the faculty of reasoning logically, there is something inexpressibly irritating at the sort of arguments which are put forward at the present moment to justify the massacre of the blacks in Jamaica, and which were put forward to defend the cause of the Confederacy. Mr. Henry Kingsley, for instance, writes to the newspapers as the champion of muscular Christianity, to say that the wholesale slaughter of the negroes must be right, because it was sanctioned by Governor Eyre; and because Governor Eyre distinguished himself as an Australian explorer. You may possibly have read the singularly vivid and picturesque account of Eyre's explorations in the Australian deserts, which appeared lately in "Macmillan's Magazine." There is no question, if the account is true, that Eyre is a brave man personally; there is still less question that he is as obstinate as a mule. But to say that a brave, wrong-headed, obstinate man cannot be guilty of gross cruelty, is a statement so absurd that it could not be safely made out of the columns of an English newspaper. Yet this is what Mr. Kingsley and the papers which espouse the pro-slavery side in this discussion call on us to believe. Just in the same way we were lectured by the same authorities, and assured that secession must be right, because Lee was a gentleman, and Stonewall Jackson a man after Carlyle's own heart.

So much for a subject about which I hardly know how to write fairly and calmly. In home matters the political news of the week is small, though important. After many hesitations the Gladstone-Russell Ministry has finally resolved to stand or fall on the question of reform. A bill is to be introduced for the extension of the franchise, and this bill will be made a cabinet measure. Very little is known as yet as to the details of this measure, probably because very little is determined. The common impression is that the Government will recommend a six-pound franchise for the boroughs, and a ten-pound one for the counties. Mr. Bright has taken occasion, at a reform meeting in Blackburn, to express his confidence in the Ministry, and in the sincerity of their political professions. From this fact, and from Mr. Forster's acceptance of office, it is evident that the ministerial programme has met with the approval of the Manchester party. Their support almost involves the secession of the aristocratic Whigs from the ministerial ranks; and it may be doubted whether, in a parliamentary point of view, Earl Russell has not purchased the alliance of the Radicals at too dear a price. As I think I have said before, it will prove impossible even to get the House of Lords, not to mention the House of Commons, to consent to any important reduction of the franchise, except under the pressure of great popular excitement. It is quite possible the voters may grow excited about reform between this time and next February. All I can say is that, so far, there are no symptoms of any widespread agitation on the question of reform.

The proposal of a reform bill will, it is understood, be announced by the Queen herself. For the first time since the death of the Prince Consort Her Majesty will open Parliament in person. And this first state appearance in public is understood to be the signal for the resumption of the ordinary court life which has been so long suspended. It may be difficult for you to understand what practical difference it makes whether the Queen performs her state duties in person or by deputy. As a matter of fact, the difference is considerable; and the news of the Queen's return to public life has been very gladly received by the country. Possibly our enthusiasm would have been greater, if it had not been intimated that the first act of the Queen on her re-appearance would be to request a grant from Parliament for the dowry of her third daughter. It is now officially announced that the Princess Helena is shortly to be married to Prince Christian of Augustenburg, the younger brother of the unlucky prince who still calls himself Frederick VII. of Schleswig-Holstein-Sonderburg-Augustenburg. The bridegroom elect is an officer in the Prussian service, and is the poorest of German princelets. His poverty, however, is his chief recommendation in the eyes of the English court. The Queen, it is said, is extremely anxious to keep her favorite daughter at home, and has therefore married her to the poorest of the princes whose name appears in the "Almanach de Gotha," in the hope that, having neither fortune nor position nor prospects, he may take up his abode in England. It is an odd fact that the three parties to the endless Schleswig-Holstein difficulty have each a representative amongst the members of our royal family. Denmark is represented by the Princess of Wales, Prussia by the Princess Royal, and the duchies by the Princess Helena. It is to be hoped the family may prove a happy one in spite of this state of discord. Rumor, however, says that the chief motive of the Queen's re-appearance before the public is dissatisfaction, whether well or ill founded, with the manner in which her place has been supplied by the Prince and Princess of Wales.

In social topics our chief interest has been centered in the great "bread-and-butter" controversy. A number of the students at Christ Church College, Oxford, have made the notable discovery that they are charged thirty per cent. above the market price for their bread and butter, which is supplied to them by the college authorities, and have written indignant letters to the Times to protest against the over-charge. The papers, being devoid of home news, have taken the question up, and we are, in consequence, presented with an active controversy as to whether bread can be had at Oxford and Cambridge for twopence or twopence farthing. To my mind there is something infiniment petit about the whole controversy. Unless undergraduates are altered very much from what they were in my time, a saving of a penny a day on their bread and butter would make no appreciable difference in the amount of their expenditure. As long as the collegiate system is maintained, the cost of living for students must always be high; and I have very little sympathy for reformers who refuse to recognize patent facts, and hope to unite economy with the advantages incident to a high rate of expenditure. At present both Oxford and Cambridge are admirable training schools for young men belonging to the upper classes. The tuition imparted there is not great, but the genuine advantages of the society to be found there are very considerable. The universities are not national academies, nor are they intended to be so either by the tutors or by the undergraduates. If it is thought expedient to throw open the universities to men without money, the method of so doing is as simple as possible. Let students be allowed to live as they like and how they like, and, making allowance for the difference of prices in England and Germany, living may be made as cheap at Oxford as it is at Heidelberg or Bonn. But, then, the system of college life and discipline must be abandoned; and this is exactly what our university reformers have no idea of doing.

The other night we had, what is an unusual thing with us, a regular row at a public dinner. The occasion was the anniversary banquet of the London Scottish Hospital, an occasion when all the Scotch in London gather together. Dr. Norman Macleod, the editor of "Good Words," and one of the Queen's chaplains, was in the chair, and in his speech made some allusion to the part he has taken in protesting against extreme Sabbatarianism north of the Tweed. Forthwith some of the guests interrupted the chairman's speech with hisses and groans. Sabbatarians and anti-Sabbatarians engaged in personal conflict; and the whole dinner ended in a row which I should have called Irish had not all the combatants been canny Scotch.

THE ITALIAN QUESTION.

PARIS, December 1.

THERE is hardly a cause in Europe which deserves as much sympathy and moral support as the cause of Italy. The Italian war has been the best card played by the Second Empire. It could not fail to throw momentarily on its side the liberal forces of France and Europe. The first great war of Napoleon III., the Crimean war, had only had for its object to break the old alliance of the great powers of Europe against France which had been signed at Vienna after the fall of Napoleon I. It had more of a dynastic than of a national character. France had no real interest in destroying or diminishing the power of Russia; but the new ruler of France had great interest in gaining the alliance of England, in obliging Queen Victoria to visit him and to receive his visits. The Crimean war gave him a sort of respectability which had first been refused to the conspirator of the 2d December. This was distinctly understood by M. de Tocqueville, who wrote, the 20th of January, 1856, to his friend Odilon Barrot, these remarkable lines:

"Russia will come out of this war humbled, but about as strong as she was at the beginning. She will keep her position in the Black Sea and in Asia. Nicolaiew will take the place of Sebastopol. Russia will be, all the same, the hope of the Sclavish and Greek races. She will, all the same, penetrate the heart of civilized Europe by Poland. And the day is perhaps near when, the union formed against her being dissolved, she will be found as threatening as before."

These prophetic words have been fully illustrated by the attitude taken by Russia against England and France during the last Polish rebellion.

If the Crimean war was evidently (and the proofs of it may be found in Kinglake's history, so remarkable in the diplomatic point of view, so weak and unjust in the military point of view) a dynastic enterprise rather than a national one, the same could not be said of the Italian war, at least at its beginning. The alliance of France was offered to a country fighting for its liberty against a foreign tyranny. But the price of the alliance of a despot is always too high. When Cavour struck his bargain with the French Emperor at Plombières, he thought that he would be quits with his ally after abandoning to him the province of Savoy, the cradle of the illustrious house of his own master, and by giving to the cousin of the Emperor, Prince Napoleon, the hand of a daughter of Victor Emanuel. He fully expected that Italy would in return be made free from the Alps to the Adriatic. He was more anxious to deliver Venice and to chase the Austrians from Italy than to annex to the northern kingdom the kingdom of the Two Sicilies. Above all, he did not mean to give a new master to Italy in place of the old ones, to make his own sovereign a vassal and a dependent of France, to bind the new establishment he was about to create in Italy to the uncertain and precarious fate of the second French Empire.

But it is not always easy to foresee the distant consequences of an act. Cavour did not anticipate that after having called all the Italians to the deliverance of Italia from the Alps to the Adriatic, in his famous proclamation of Milan, the Emperor would stop before the quadrilateral of Mantua and leave Venetia in the hands of Austria. The peace of Villafranca has left Italy in a most dangerous and abnormal position. Cavour tried to regain in the south of Italy what he could not gain in the north. The expedition of Garibaldi in the Two Sicilies was the consequence of the disappointment which the Italian cause had suffered in the valley of the Po. Instead of the old war-cry of Italian patriotism, which had been so long "war to Austria," a new one was adopted, which is "Italian unity." But the realization of Italian unity was not possible without the tolerance of Napoleon III., and he became, in consequence, the ruler of Italy and of its destinies. He left the door of Italy open to Austria, and his diplomacy only helped the unitarian scheme in proportion to the subservience he found in the Italian ministers and statesmen. Cavour alone could have successfully resisted this perpetual, slow, and almost irresistible pressure. He would have found the means of putting obstacles in the path of his formidable ally; but, after he died, nobody was found capable of preserving at the same time the French alliance and the dignity of Italy. The spirit of servility and of hypocrisy which has pervaded the political world in France, found a new province in Italy. The Venetian question, which is the most vital question for Italy, was thrown into the background, and the forces of Italy were spent on the reorganization of the Two Sicilies and on the difficulties of the Roman question. The dangerous position kept by Austria in Venetia obliged the newly formed kingdom to make enormous armaments, quite out of proportion with its means. This necessity was also imposed upon it by the hope of winning new favors from the French Emperor, by offering to him a large auxiliary army in case of a war between France and some other power. I have no doubt that if the French Emperor chose to ask to-morrow Victor Emanuel to lend him regiments for the Mexican war, they would be given to him without a moment's hesitation. At the time of the Polish rebellion the Italians were all ready to become our auxiliaries. Thus a feverish state is kept up in the nation by the perpetual prospect of a war out of the Italian boundaries as well as of a new war with Austria. The old Piedmontese army is being transformed into an Italian army, but the new recruits from Sicily and the Neapolitan provinces cannot be compared yet to the soldiers who fought at San Martino. Increased in numbers, the army has lost somewhat in morale, in homogeneity, in solidity. The work of consolidation of the new kingdom has entirely deranged the equilibrium of the Italian budget, owing to the great armaments made, to the creation of a navy, to the necessity of giving schools, roads, railways to the annexed provinces of Central and Southern Italy. Last year the deficit of the budget was equal to 400 millions of francs. This year the minister of finance, Sella, announces that it will equal 300 millions; and he sees no other way of meeting the dangers of the future than by re-establishing unpopular taxes, equally condemned by political economy and by the aversion of the people.

Is it to be wondered if, under the circumstances, the Italian ministry has been obliged to give up the idea of making Rome the capital of Italy? From Turin the capital has been transferred to Florence, and it was hoped Florence would only be an étape on the way to Rome. But the French Emperor did not intend to allow this consummation of Italian unity. By the convention of the 15th September, 1864, he obliged Victor Emanuel to promise not to invade the provinces left to the Pope. To be sure, he bound himself to evacuate the Papal territory in the course of two years, and this promise was interpreted by many Italians as an abandonment of the temporal power of the Papacy; but I doubt if this interpretation is correct. M. Drouyn de Lhuys has assured all the diplomatic agents of the Emperor, in an official note, that the Emperor does not intend to give up the Papal territory to Victor Emanuel; and in the French House, M. Rouher, in answer to M. Thiers, has repeated the same declaration. The Italian ministers were obliged to declare before the Italian Parliament that they did not mean to invade the territory left to Pio Nono, and that they would be faithful to every prescription of the convention of the 15th September. It is on account of this declaration, which betrayed too great a servility to the French Empire, that I attribute the character of the recent elections of Italy; out of four hundred members of the old Parliament only half have been returned, and the places of the defeated members, mostly professed friends of the administration, have been taken by new men, who have no ties with the ministry.

I do not wish to draw too gloomy a picture of Italy; but, if you have followed my reasoning, you must acknowledge that the financial and political difficulties of Victor Emanuel's government are almost overwhelming. They can be traced to three sources: to the presence of Austria in Italy, to the finances, and to the Roman question; but above all these, I do not hesitate to place the difficulties which arise from a forced and close alliance with an unscrupulous, selfish, and hypocritical despotism. Every cause must have its effect; it is impossible that Italy should reap the benefit of such an alliance without feeling any of its dangers; the very morality of history is involved in the attempt of the people which has thought it possible to win liberty with the aid of a tyrant. Nobody can deplore more than I do the dangers which threaten Italian unity and independence; but, at the same time, I am not so blind that I cannot see that these dangers could have been foreseen long ago, and are not without a reason. I am of those who think that a free France ought to give its unconditional support to young Italy; but all men are not impassioned, and I must acknowledge that, by winning the French Emperor to their cause, the Italians have alienated many Frenchmen. The fall of the French Empire would, perhaps, involve the fall of the new order of things in Italy; at any rate, the French liberals would find great difficulty in enlisting the services of a new government in favor of a government which has been, and is, a mere instrument in the hands of Napoleon III.

A. L.

PRESENTS.

"GIFTS" is a better English word. But we beg leave to use the Latinist word, because we believe that gifts and presents are different things, and because it is of presents that we propose to treat. Are there any two words in the English language which are wholly synonymous? Probably not, at least in common everyday use. But presents are very everyday matters indeed, especially about this season of the year; and we use both the words in the sense in which conversation employs them. Gifts, then, are things given for the purpose (real or ostensible) of benefiting the recipient. Presents are supposed to act both ways, and benefit the giver as well. They are gifts which a father gives his son to support him or help him in business; and they are gifts which we give to beggars, and they are gifts which God gives us. Do any of the poets talk of nature's presents to man? no, but of her gifts. "Heaven's last, best gift" is better as an address to one's wife and certainly more Miltonic than "heaven's last, best present" would have been. But those are presents and not gifts that we give each other at Christmas time, even those which parents give children, for the giving is mutual. A gift may disguise itself as a present, but disproves no rule by doing so. If a young lady's papa gives her a cheque, she gives him a pair of slippers; it is an interchange of presents, after all. When we are soliciting or expecting favors—when we go a-courting, for instance—we make presents. When we would express gratitude we send a present. Society does not recognize wedding gifts. Even if the young lady's papa comes on the carpet again and gives her a house, it is a wedding present still. Wait till he marries again and see if it is n't. In all these cases—Christmas presents, wedding presents, presents of gratitude, presents in the way of business, presents in acknowledgment of other presents—the giver has himself in view, confessedly. It is done, as he tacitly acknowledges, not to help the person he gives to so much as to express his own feelings. You sent that young lady friend of your sister a big bonbonnière that Maillard charged you twenty-five dollars for—eh? well, that was done, probably, not because you thought that the young lady's constitution required French bonbons, but because you wanted her to feel, while you were n't ready to say, how warm a regard you felt for your sister's friend. It was to "put yourself on record" that you put those greenbacks into an eatable and tempting form. Possibly you may send some more, and some bouquets and gloves, in the same direction; but, if so, it will be because you have favors to ask, or think you may have, and wish to accumulate items on the credit side of your account.

Now, it has often been remarked that Americans are extremely fond of giving presents. The American Christmas is principally an occasion for giving them. The American wedding is an institution of American devising, with its array of presents to the bride. The donation parties of New England parishes are, perhaps, of the nature of gifts (gift-enterprises would be a name expressive of the amount of respect we feel for them), but the numerous tokens of respect and regard which our clergymen receive at odd times, and the immense number of friendly remembrancers which business-men exchange, are presents all. This last matter of presents passing among business men, continually and not very favorably surprises business men from other lands.

But, in truth, it is inevitable and necessary that we should give presents. We are, of all people, the most disposed to "put ourselves on record." We talk much, not for the purpose of convincing the opponent, but for the purpose of stating our own views. Our stump-speaker cares principally to address people of his own way of thinking, that they may see how thorough a partizan he is. We cultivate newspaper literature, not the persuasive, but the aggressive, caring and hoping for no success in convincing the other party, but aiming to stand right with our own. So the giving of presents, as a pleasant and easy way of expressing one's feelings, is naturally popular with the people who are so unreserved in that expression. A reserved Englishman buys of you and sells to you for years, and is very desirous that you should get no idea from anything in his actions or manner whether he likes you personally or not. But an American cannot have dealings long with a man without longing to speak his mind and express his personal feelings, and so, if his feelings are friendly, he sends in a present on some favorable occasion to speak for him.

And as it is natural that the Americans should give presents frequently, so it is natural that they should give handsome and carefully selected presents, and make a great ado about the choice and presentation. That they do these things there can be no denial in anybody's mind—at Christmas time. We have intimated our view that these presents are not wholly unselfish. But the custom has our hearty sympathy, for all. It does n't pretend to be wholly unselfish. It is a delightful custom, this of mutual expressions of regard, and deserves encouragement. Presents, generally, are delightful to receive, and the giving them is an unmingled pleasure and a noble one, because capable of infinite refinement. All the delicacy of feeling and refinement of fancy and tact and shrewdness and close observation that one is capable of can be used to good purpose in the giving of presents. We know nothing more enjoyable, among minor social matters, than the right choosing of presents, small or great, and the fitting them to those for whom they are intended.

There is one phenomenon attending the yearly or occasional transfer of presents which has often caused remark. Every one has noticed the extraordinary worthlessness of the "articles suitable for presents" which every returning holiday season offers in new abundance. There are many little things which do not pretend to be useful, and which the world is at last finding out are not ornamental, which would have no market but for the annual fever which sets in about the first of December. There is a large class of books, of no intrinsic value whatever, but which take precedence of all other books when Christmas time draws near, and which ought to be called not "gift books," but present books. As we write, the best-lighted tables in our great bookstores are stripped of their seemly covering of books of fair average value, and are crowded with folios and quartos in costly bindings, and containing the least amount of actual worth that will do to bind up and ask money for.

This disposition to give presents of no value seems at first sight a ridiculous tendency enough, and would give us a fine chance to abuse our day and generation if we were so minded. But, absurd as some of its manifestations are, the original feeling is a proper one enough. The present is, indeed, to have no practical use, for it is not to add to the physical wealth of the recipient that it is meant; but presents are always intended to be beautiful. Their main idea is that they shall bear witness to thought and care on the part of the donor. The expression of the donor's admiration or gratitude is complete or not according to the thought and taste manifested in his selection. If one receives a present that is commonplace and inappropriate, bought at a shop where he knows there were thousands like it, and not especially suited to his taste or position, he does not feel that he has been very highly honored. All presents, then, are meant to be beautiful; if they fail in being so it is because the donor failed to find anything beautiful, or could not recognize it when found. And all presents are meant to be, in some way, unusual and rare.

Flowers, for instance, are always in place as a present—the most universally applicable of all. Emerson (vivat ille qui ante nos nostra dixit!) has shown why they are so; because they are an acknowledgment that a grain of beauty weighs down all the utilities in the world. In cities, moreover, and generally when out of season, they argue care and a willingness to take trouble on the part of the giver of the present; for which reason the tight bouquets that the florists sell are certainly less worthy presents than the basket one has arranged in person.

In fact, the individual look about a present—the look as if the giver, and he alone of all men, could have given it—is the best look a present can have. It should be so evidently an emanation from the actual donor that his name need not, for practical purposes, be attached. Here we find Emerson before us again, and are told that presents should be a part of one's self. We agree heartily with this dictum in the sense in which it was meant. Thus it is not a picture only that an artist can give which will be a part of himself; he can have a book bound after a design of his own; he can use his trained judgment to pick the only beautiful bronze of a lot; he can buy cheap brown or buff earthen candlesticks and paint them with his own hands till they are more beautiful than the costliest porcelain. As for the business man, in this as in many other walks of life, he must use the money that he has instead of the leisure and skill that he has not; but he can use it well. There will be one thing only in the great city exactly appropriate to go from him to such a friend; it is his business to find it and get it at whatever cost; advertise for it, if necessary. A person who really enjoys giving presents will watch and wait; will keep a memorandum-book for the purpose of recording wishes hinted at or freely spoken; will draw inferences from what he sees and hears of pursuits and tastes and fancies; and will lay in his Christmas presents at any time during the year when he can best get what he wants.

Literature.

LITERARY NOTES.

A NEW weekly journal will be commenced with the first week of the new year by the house of Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, of Boston. These gentlemen already wield the destinies of one quarterly and two monthly journals, so that they bid fair to become as conspicuous in the periodical world as in the department of belles lettres publishing. Their new venture is entitled Every Saturday: a Journal of Choice Reading. Its contents will be mainly selected from the best English and Continental magazines, not entirely excluding, however, original matter from American sources. It will be under the charge of a gentlemen well known in the poetical literature of the day, Mr. T. B. Aldrich, who leaves New York for Boston in order to undertake the duties of the editorial post. The general appearance of Every Saturday will be modelled on the well-known Chambers's Journal. It will contain thirty-two large octavo pages, and be furnished to subscribers for five dollars per annum.

—The Early English Text Society, recently mentioned in a late number, has appointed as its agents in America Messrs. G. P. Philes & Co., of Nassau Street, who will receive subscriptions and furnish the publications of the society. The society look for aid and sympathy from this country, and unless the prevailing taste for old English literature is merely an affectation and a fleeting fashion, it must obtain both, as never before were the means of acquiring books of the kind it offers put at so easy a rate. A new "Dictionary Series" will be commenced next year with a reprint of the excessively rare work, the first rhyming dictionary known—"Manipulus Vocabularium: A Dictionarie of English and Latin Words, necessary for Scholars that want Variety of Words, and for such as Use to Write in English Metre. By Peter Levens. London, 1570." One or two a year of these rare old word-books or vocabularies of the language will be given, till all are printed. They are all excessively scarce, as they were, no doubt, actually used up in each generation, and copies were rarely thought worthy of preservation in contemporary libraries, although now their value in testifying to the ancient colloquial usages and progressive advance of the language can hardly be overrated. This series will not interrupt the other issues of the society, consisting of hitherto unpublished poems, romances, etc.

—The remarkable success of Mr. Lecky's "History of the Spirit of Rationalism in Europe" has naturally led to enquiries as to his literary antecedents, his history having no marks of a first work, but rather exhibiting the facility and freedom of a long-practised writer. No information, however, has been made public yet beyond what we derive from the author himself when he states that he had endeavored to trace the causes of the deplorable condition of Ireland in a book called "The Leaders of Public Opinion in Ireland." He omits to give any information respecting the publication of this book. It does not appear in the "British Catalogue," so is probably yet unprinted. One of the similarities between the "History of Rationalism" and Buckle's "History of Civilization" that cannot fail to strike every one, is the wide extent of reading laid under contribution to furnish material for either work. Mr. Lecky appears to have read to more advantage, though perhaps he may be familiar with a smaller number of books, than Mr. Buckle, who seems to have devoured everything, down to the trash of circulating libraries, for the purpose of piling up quotations and so-called authorities to confirm things that no one ever doubted. Mr. Lecky's style possesses, to a degree unusual among English writers, the point and finish that characterize the best school of modern French authorship. It is not mentioned in a sense of disparagement that much of the learning and research we admire in his pages is drawn less from an acquaintance with the original springs of information than from a judicious use of the secondary sources made accessible by the scholars of France. With more than German industry, and a precision and vivacity all their own, they have scarcely left a character, an author, or an incident of the mediæval period without an "Essai" or an "Etude" that gives us in an attractive form the highest results of learning and literary application. When a writer speaks of "St. Denis the Areopagite" (instead of St. Dionysius), or refers to "Belgium" in the twelfth century (and a critical examination would detect many little peculiarities of the kind in the book), it shows the writer makes use of the labor of others who have preceded him and smoothed his path. With every exception, however, Mr. Lecky's work manifests a power of assimilating the results of study—his own or that of others—that gives it a very high place among English books of the present decade.

—A new phase of the famous English copyright law has appeared, according to accounts just received of a recent decision lately made in the suit commenced by Messrs. Sampson Low & Co. in vindication of their right of property in a work by the American authoress, Miss Cummins. The authentic report of the decision has not yet reached us, but, according to a newspaper correspondent, it is declared that a copyright is personal property which an alien has as good a right to as any one else. There is no doubt that the tendency of the judges' rulings on the side issues that have come before them of late relating to the copyright question have been in this direction. It is a fact honorable to the breadth of view and liberality that should always distinguish the legal mind. If the doctrine stated above is allowed to prevail, the consequences will be in the highest degree favorable to American authors. Should the rage for their work still prevail in Europe, we must look for our millionaires among the "Orpheus C. Kerrs," "Artemus Wards," and "Petroleum V. Nasbys," who have hit on a style of composition that finds so hearty a response in John Bull's sturdy sense of the humorous. We shall soon have a detailed account of the proceedings that will give occasion for a return to the subject.

—Some weeks since an account was given of the preparations made to do honor to Professor Bopp, the founder of the science of comparative philology, on the anniversary of the fiftieth year since the appearance of the great work—the "Comparative Grammar of the Indo-Germanic Languages"—by which the scope of the science was determined and the rules for its cultivation and future progress defined with the hand of a master. One of the objects of the friends of Professor Bopp, it may be remembered, was, in addition to the testimonial presented to the professor, the collection of a fund to be named after him, and to be applied to the encouragement and furtherance of philological studies. A second circular issued by the committee shows that the proposal has met with a general and hearty response from the several European capitals, and that there is hardly a country in the world where some one is not engaged in forwarding the contributions of scholars for this end. We are happy to learn that America is not behindhand. At the recent meeting of the American Oriental Society, held at New Haven, one hundred dollars were subscribed to the Bopp Fund by the members present, and the corresponding secretary of the society, Prof. Whitney, is authorized to receive and forward any miscellaneous contributions that may be made for the same object.

—The new edition of the "Cyclopædia of American Literature," by E. A. & G. L. Duyckinck, places in the market a book that has been long out of print, and has been in demand proportioned by the growing interest and importance of the subject it illustrates. The new matter that has been rendered necessary by the lapse of ten or twelve years since the original issue of the book has been incorporated into a supplement by the senior editor. A fine steel portrait of Mr. Geo. L. Duyckinck, his fellow-laborer, deceased since the first edition, is given in this supplement, with an appropriate tribute to his acquirements and character. Much skill in compression has been shown in the arrangement of the new matter, and though it would be impossible in any reasonable limits to do justice to the rapidly increasing "mob of gentlemen who write with ease," few literary celebrities of real importance are omitted. The publishers, C. Scribner & Co., take subscriptions for a limited edition, on large paper, that will form a magnificent book for the purposes of illustration, now so popular.

LECKY'S RATIONALISM.*

Mr. Lecky's book came to us so loudly heralded that, on taking it up and reading about midway into the first volume, we were sensible of a feeling of disappointment. We were prepared to find it a work of great philosophical pretension. This it is not. Mr. Leckey is not a profound savant. He is not surpassingly eminent as a thinker on fundamental principles of ethics, metaphysics, or social science. But he is something which, in our speculative and theorizing times, is quite as good; he is an exceedingly intelligent, cultivated, and accomplished man, of quick and true perception, of boundless and well-digested reading, of swift and vigorous reasoning power, of singular liberality and candor. He is intellectual, and, at the same time, enthusiastic; broad without being shallow, and rapid without noise. A man of earnest convictions, he is entirely free from bigotry; a man whose mind is possessed by one controlling thought, there is about him no savor of the theorist or the doctrinaire. If he is not wonderful as a philosopher, as a historian he is almost faultless, and as a critic he is without peer. Mr. Lecky pays a brilliant tribute to Mr. Buckle as "a great writer, whose untimely death has been one of the most serious misfortunes that have ever befallen English literature, and whose splendid genius, matured by the most varied and extensive scholarship, has cast a flood of light upon many of the subjects he is endeavoring to elucidate." But his own purpose in writing is so different from Buckle's that the habit of mentioning them together is wholly unwarranted. Buckle wrote with the deliberate intention to state and maintain a doctrine respecting the social progress of mankind. He had a theory of human development to promulgate, and in the portion of the general introduction to his great work which the public was permitted to see, he occupied himself mainly with laying down his fundamental dogma, that human affairs were rigidly controlled by law, and that the track of law ran undeviatingly along the line of practical knowledge. The influence of the moral sentiments on the movement of human affairs he reduced to the lowest point; the freedom of the human will he denied; and he sternly remanded to the sphere of effects most of the phenomena which have generally ranked among causes. He began, therefore, where Mr. Lecky ends; or, to speak more exactly, he assumed as established results what Mr. Lecky presents as the distant goal towards which modern speculation is obviously tending. The latter is a historian rather than a philosopher of history. The very feeble attempt to touch the problem of free will, in the preface, is almost the only interruption to the stream of narrative that bears us rapidly and charmingly over the whole field of European thought and life.

Not that the book before us is devoid of ideas. It is animated throughout by a vital idea which gave it birth, and which quickens every paragraph to the end; but the idea is too large and luminous to have the character or the effect of a dogma. It is in brief this: that the intellectual and social movements of mankind, as shown in history, are controlled by "certain tendencies or predispositions resulting from causes that are deeply imbedded in the civilization of the age, which create the movement, direct the stream of opinions with irresistible force in a given direction, and, if we consider only great bodies of men and long periods of time, exercise an almost absolute authority." Rationalism, by his definition, is a subtle spirit of thought, an unconscious mental bias, tendency, or principle, an undercurrent of reason, setting with general steadiness in one course, silently sapping the foundations of institutions, systems, laws, creeds, practices, which seemed to be firmly planted in the conviction and reverence of men, and powerfully but quietly compelling them to substitute natural for supernatural causes in explaining the occurrences of history, reason for authority in religion, and the natural conscience for arbitrary systems of ethics in social life.

How this intellectual movement is started we are not told, nor is it of consequence that we should be; the innate curiosity of the mind explaining it sufficiently. Mr. Lecky strikes the current while it is flowing, and describes the way in which it is swollen and accelerated. In this description he exhibits his breadth of view. He allows to every contribution its full value. Knowledge, thought, impulse, feeling, passion, genius, conscience, will, are accepted as agencies in creating and shaping the controlling spirit. The action of special circumstances and of individual characters is indicated. The cunning predispositions of the reason take up all the faculties of the mind, however crossing and recrossing, however colliding and clashing, and turn them with steady pressure towards the point whither it tends itself. The propelling cause lies beneath human consciousness, and the changes it effects by its unseen hand are often so hidden as to seem unaccountable. Vast alterations are wrought, in the face of all expectation and of all probability. One age finds it impossible to believe what another age found it impossible to disbelieve, and it can assign no reason for its scepticism save its presence and power. Arguments follow the causes they appear to lead, and are a part of the conquest that they seem to achieve. The reformer is a feature of his own reformation. The discoverer marches behind his discovery, and the victor does not so much gain his victory as announce it. This is Mr. Lecky's truth; not a new one, but a very vital and suggestive one, and one that is fairly unfolded and illustrated now for the first time. Of the extraordinary intellectual wealth of the book the volumes themselves can alone convey the least idea. We can only suggest the scope of the argument and the character of the illustrations.

In order, we presume, to exhibit his doctrine by the strongest light, Mr. Lecky applies it first to two subjects which once were sustained by authority and belief, which now are almost abandoned by authority and belief, and in regard to which the change from plenary assent to almost plenary dissent is to be explained only by the altered attitude which the human mind has unconsciously assumed under the influence of impressions not immediately connected with the subjects themselves. These are witchcraft and miracles, both treated under the general title, "The declining sense of the miraculous." Two happier illustrations of his idea could not have been chosen; for the material is copious, the facts are abundant and striking, the literature is marked, and the opposite poles of thought are abruptly brought into a surprising conflict. Mr. Lecky presents with great power the force and character of the popular belief in witchcraft; traces it to its sources; follows it in the turns of its history; lays bare its deep, strong roots in the prevailing religious credence, in the spiritual philosophy of centuries, in the Bible; shows how widely spread and how vital it was in the convictions of all men; how implicated it was in the radical faiths of Christendom. He details the arguments by which it was supported, and exhibits in masses the enormous accumulations of evidence that had gathered about it. The wisest men in Europe shared it; the ablest defended it; the best were zealous foes of all who assailed it. To disbelieve it seemed to be impossible. No man of any account disbelieved it for hundreds of years. Lord Bacon could not divest himself of it. Shakespeare accepted it, as did nearly all his most enlightened and gifted contemporaries. Sir Thomas Browne declared that those who denied the existence of witchcraft were not only infidels, but also, by implication, atheists. There were noble protests against the superstition, but they had no effect. Reginald Scott's "Discovery of Witchcraft," published in 1684, was bold, exhaustive, masterly, and popular; but in effect it was powerless. On a sudden the belief declined all over Europe, all over the world of mind. It was not argued down. There stood the piles of testimony unexamined; there were the trains of reasoning unexploded; there were the Bible texts unexplained; there were the parent dogmas far enough from being extirpated. To the expressed beliefs of the mightiest intellects no opinions of anything like equal weight were opposed. Demonstration was still mainly on one side; but people who could give no reasons for their incredulity were stubbornly incredulous. There existed the same reasons for earnestness of faith; but the earnestness could not be excited. Interest in the subject was dead.

* "History of the Rise and Influence of the Spirit of Rationalism in Europe. By W. E. H. Lecky, M.A." D. Appleton & Co. Two vols.

The same fate awaited the promiscuous belief in miracles. For ages universal and inevitable, it has become limited and difficult. Once compelling the mind's assent, it now is retained only by the mind's compulsion. The miracles recorded as performed by the saints of the Romish Church were countless in number—the Bollandist collection containing about 25,000 lives, and each life is a tale of miracle from beginning to end—miracles attested and accredited by solemn oaths of witnesses. Even Edward Gibbon was staggered by the array of proof in their favor. "The implicit, undiscriminating acquiescence with which such narratives were once received has long since been replaced by a derisive incredulity. The very few modern miracles which are related are everywhere regarded as a scandal, a stumbling-block, and a difficulty." Why? Is scrutiny more keen than it was? It is far less keen. Is the evidence less? It is equal, to say the least. Have the books written against miracles surpassed in ability the books written in their defence? On the contrary, they have been fewer and feebler, written with less vigor, less learning, less definiteness of philosophical theory, less intensity of moral conviction. They have nearly all perished; but their cause is gained. It was virtually gained before they were produced, and their production was merely a sign that the human intelligence had silently moved on to another ground, where the natural and not the supernatural held sway.

Having in these crowded and terrible chapters exhibited the revolutionizing powers of rationalism, Mr. Lecky proceeds, in the third chapter, to illustrate the delicacy of its play in some departments of art, science, observance, and social usage. The matters touched on are numerous and infinitely varied; the movement of thought is too rapid to be followed here, and the changes are too sudden to be so much as indicated in so brief a notice; but they are neither too sudden nor too rapid to disturb the continuity of the writer's mental process. The impelling causes are noted with fine discernment. Each ripple of the movement flashes its particular gleam of light, and the closest student of the mediæval mind will get new material for thought from these rich pages. The influence on art of the revival of learning and the unveiling of classic models is especially worthy of attention as here described, cropping out in unexpected places.

From these attractive fields the argument passes to the history of persecution. The philosophy of persecution is given with admirable fidelity. The power of it is conceded. It is explained why in the great conflicts between argument and persecution the latter has been continually triumphant; and it is explained why, in defiance of authority, persecution has been disarmed of its power, and, by common consent, abandoned by the Catholic and the Protestant world. This is all interesting and instructive, but more instructive and interesting still are chapters fifth and sixth, which recount the triumphs of rationalism in the departments of politics and industry. Here the author, with careful step and keen observation, traverses the field which Buckle surveyed, but did not live to explore. The process by which theological interests were worked out of the ruling policies, and a secular principle was substituted for a theological one as the basis of authority, is laid open with fine analytical skill. Some of the brief episodes particularly that at the theatre, are exceedingly curious. The influence of classical literature in encouraging the study of Roman law, in altering the type of heroism; the effect of increasing capital, of growing knowledge; the changes resulting from the invention of gunpowder and the bayonet; the rise and potency of political economy, are mentioned as among the secretly conspiring causes that overturned the old order and supplanted the ancient world for the modern. A few pages show how momentous was the change of opinion respecting usury; a few more describe the origin of the commercial spirit and the consequent revolution of society; a noble tribute to the Jews for service rendered in this department sheds an entirely new lustre on this portion of the story of progress, but before we have fairly accustomed ourselves to the unexpected attitude in which men and affairs are placed, the writer sweeps us on into considerations on the economical effect of luxury, the growth of diplomacy, the drama, the secularization of music, and twenty things beside, all fascinating as well as instructive.

A man could not write a book like this unless he cordially believed in the spirit whose operations he set himself to describe. Mr. Lecky is no doubt a rationalist in his own sense of the term; but we know it only from the atmosphere of sympathy with the movement he describes which pervades the volumes. He does not argue in favor of rationalism—he is its historian, not its advocate; and he does more than justice to the powers that oppose it. A liberal we should judge in religion, he touches the weak side of Voltaire and Rousseau, and brings out the strongest side of the Jesuits. Insisting on the regenerating influence upon the secularization of politics of the great heathen writers, he surpasses Guizot in his testimony to the splendid benefits conferred on mankind by the Church of Rome. Naturally inclined to attribute the progress of society to material and social agencies, he concedes more than any writer of his class to the transforming efficacy of the early Christian religion, especially in regard to the abolition of slavery, that much disputed point.

He is a liberal in politics, of course; but he has a good word for Louis Napoleon; and he has actually succeeded in finding an amiable trait in Nero. He has faith enough to be magnanimous towards his opponents, old and new.

Yet Mr. Lecky is no fanatic, nor even an enthusiast. He sees the dangers that are incidental to rationalism. He deplores eloquently the prevalence of the utilitarian spirit; the depreciation of the moral and religious faculty—"the noblest thing we possess; the celestial spark that is within us; the impress of the divine image; the principle of every heroism." He bewails the departure of enthusiasm, the decline of self-sacrifice, for which no material acquisitions are a fair compensation, and "looking back to the cheerful alacrity with which, in some former ages, they sacrificed all their material and intellectual interests to what they believed to be right," he finds it impossible to deny that we have lost something in our progress.

His book will no doubt be extensively read. The wealth of its contents and the singular grace of its style, always flowing, often picturesque, sometimes burning with suppressed eloquence, will ensure a multitude of admirers. We hope they will. Even they who dread the tendency of the speculations it encourages, must acknowledge the candor with which they are advanced, and must rejoice in the charity with which they are associated. Since the spirit of rationalism is everywhere, and the speculations it excites besiege all minds, it must be a cause of congratulation that the writer who sets them forth most ably also sets them forth most modestly, and, while commending the principles which disorganize church and state, does it in a way to confirm every vital bond of social life.

OUR MUTUAL FRIEND.*

"Our Mutual Friend" is, to our perception, the poorest of Mr. Dickens's works. And it is poor with the poverty not of momentary embarrassment, but of permanent exhaustion. It is wanting in inspiration. For the last ten years it has seemed to us that Mr. Dickens has been unmistakably forcing himself. "Bleak House" was forced; "Little Dorritt" was labored; the present work is dug out as with a spade and pickaxe. Of course—to anticipate the usual argument—who but Dickens could have written it? Who, indeed? Who else would have established a lady in business in a novel on the admirably solid basis of her always putting on gloves and tieing a handkerchief round her head in moments of grief, and of her habitually addressing her family with "Peace! hold!" It is needless to say that Mrs. Reginald Wilfer is first and last the occasion of considerable true humor. When, after conducting her daughter to Mrs. Boffin's carriage, in sight of all the envious neighbors, she is described as enjoying her triumph during the next quarter of an hour by airing herself on the door-step "in a kind of splendidly serene trance," we laugh with as uncritical a laugh as could be desired of us. We pay the same tribute to her assertions, as she narrates the glories of the society she enjoyed at her father's table, that she has known as many as three copper-plate engravers exchanging the most exquisite sallies and retorts there at one time. But when to these we have added a dozen more happy examples of the humor which was exhaled from every line of Mr. Dickens's earlier writings, we shall have closed the list of the merits of the work before us. To say that the conduct of the story, with all its complications, betrays a long-practised hand, is to pay no compliment worthy the author. If this were, indeed, a compliment, we should be inclined to carry it further, and congratulate him on his success in what we should call the manufacture of fiction; for in so doing we should express a feeling that has attended us throughout the book. Seldom, we reflected, had we read a book so intensely written, so little seen, known, or felt.

* "Our Mutual Friend. By Charles Dickens." New York: Harper Brothers. 1865.

In all Mr. Dickens's works the fantastic has been his great resource; and while his fancy was lively and vigorous it accomplished great things. But the fantastic, when the fancy is dead, is a very poor business. The movement of Mr. Dickens's fancy in Mrs. Wilfer and Mr. Boffin and Lady Tippins, and the Lammles and Miss Wren, and even in Eugene Wrayburn, is, to our mind, a movement lifeless, forced, mechanical. It is the letter of his old humor without the spirit. It is hardly too much to say that every character here put before us is a mere bundle of eccentricities, animated by no principle of nature whatever. In former days there reigned in Mr. Dickens's extravagances a comparative consistency; they were exaggerated statements of types that really existed. We had, perhaps, never known a Newman Noggs, nor a Pecksniff, nor a Micawber; but we had known persons of whom these figures were but the strictly logical consummation. But among the grotesque creatures who occupy the pages before us, there is not one whom we can refer to as an existing type. In all Mr. Dickens's stories, indeed, the reader has been called upon, and has willingly consented, to accept a certain number of figures or creatures of pure fancy, for this was the author's poetry. He was, moreover, always repaid for his concession by a peculiar beauty or power in these exceptional characters. But he is now expected to make the same concession with a very inadequate reward. What do we get in return for accepting Miss Jenny Wren as a possible person? This young lady is the type of a certain class of characters of which Mr. Dickens has made a specialty, and with which he has been accustomed to draw alternate smiles and tears, according as he pressed one spring or another. But this is very cheap merriment and very cheap pathos. Miss Jenny Wren is a poor little dwarf, afflicted, as she constantly reiterates, with a "bad back" and "queer legs," who makes doll's dresses, and is for ever pricking at those with whom she converses, in the air, with her needle, and assuring them that she knows their "tricks and their manners." Like all Mr. Dickens's pathetic characters, she is a little monster; she is deformed, unhealthy, unnatural; she belongs to the troop of hunchbacks, imbeciles, and precocious children who have carried on the sentimental business in all Mr. Dickens's novels; the little Nells, the Smikes, the Paul Dombeys.

Mr. Dickens goes as far out of the way for his wicked people as he does for his good ones. Rogue Riderhood, indeed, in the present story, is villanous with a sufficiently natural villany; he belongs to that quarter of society in which the author is most at his ease. But was there ever such wickedness as that of the Lammles and Mr. Fledgeby? Not that people have not been as mischievous as they; but was any one ever mischievous in that singular fashion? Did a couple of elegant swindlers ever take such particular pains to be aggressively inhuman?—for we can find no other word for the gratuitous distortions to which they are subjected. The word humanity strikes us as strangely discordant, in the midst of these pages; for, let us boldly declare it, there is no humanity here. Humanity is nearer home than the Boffins, and the Lammles, and the Wilfers, and the Veneerings. It is in what men have in common with each other, and not in what they have in distinction. The people just named have nothing in common with each other, except the fact that they have nothing in common with mankind at large. What a world were this world if the world of "Our Mutual Friend" were an honest reflection of it! But a community of eccentrics is impossible. Rules alone are consistent with each other; exceptions are inconsistent. Society is maintained by natural sense and natural feeling. We cannot conceive a society in which these principles are not in some manner represented. Where in these pages are the depositaries of that intelligence without which the movement of life would cease? Who represents nature? Accepting half of Mr. Dickens's persons as intentionally grotesque, where are those exemplars of sound humanity who should afford us the proper measure of their companions' variations? We ought not, in justice to the author, to seek them among his weaker—that is, his mere conventional—characters; in John Harmon, Lizzie Hexam, or Mortimer Lightwood; but we assuredly cannot find them among his stronger—that is, his artificial creations. Suppose we take Eugene Wrayburn and Bradley Headstone. They occupy a half-way position between the habitual probable of nature and the habitual impossible of Mr. Dickens. A large portion of the story rests upon the enmity borne by Headstone to Wrayburn, both being in love with the same woman. Wrayburn is a gentleman, and Headstone is one of the people. Wrayburn is well-bred, careless, elegant, sceptical, and idle: Headstone is a high-tempered, hard-working, ambitious young schoolmaster. There lay in the opposition of these two characters a very good story. But the prime requisite was that they should be characters: Mr. Dickens, according to his usual plan, has made them simply figures, and between them the story that was to be, the story that should have been, has evaporated. Wrayburn lounges about with his hands in his pockets, smoking a cigar, and talking nonsense. Headstone strides about, clenching his fists and biting his lips and grasping his stick. There is one scene in which Wrayburn chaffs the schoolmaster with easy insolence, while the latter writhes impotently under his well-bred sarcasm. This scene is very clever, but it is very insufficient. If the majority of readers were not so very timid in the use of words we should call it vulgar. By this we do not mean to indicate the conventional impropriety of two gentlemen exchanging lively personalities; we mean to emphasize the essentially small character of these personalities. In other words, the moment, dramatically, is great, while the author's conception is weak. The friction of two men, of two characters, of two passions, produces stronger sparks than Wrayburn's boyish repartees and Headstone's melodramatic commonplaces. Such scenes as this are useful in fixing the limits of Mr. Dickens's insight. Insight is, perhaps, too strong a word; for we are convinced that it is one of the chief conditions of his genius not to see beneath the surface of things. If we might hazard a definition of his literary character, we should, accordingly, call him the greatest of superficial novelists. We are aware that this definition confines him to an inferior rank in the department of letters which he adorns; but we accept this consequence of our proposition. It were, in our opinion, an offence against humanity to place Mr. Dickens among the greatest novelists. For, to repeat what we have already intimated, he has created nothing but figure. He has added nothing to our understanding of human character. He is master of but two alternatives: he reconciles us to what is commonplace, and he reconciles us to what is odd. The value of the former service is questionable; and the manner in which Mr. Dickens performs it sometimes conveys a certain impression of charlatanism. The value of the latter service is incontestable, and here Mr. Dickens is an honest, an admirable artist. But what is the condition of the truly great novelist? For him there are no alternatives, for him there are no oddities, for him there is nothing outside of humanity. He cannot shirk it; it imposes itself upon him. For him alone, therefore, there is a true and a false; for him alone it is possible to be right, because it is possible to be wrong. Mr. Dickens is a great observer and a great humorist, but he is nothing of a philosopher. Some people may hereupon say, so much the better; we say, so much the worse. For a novelist very soon has need of a little philosophy. In treating of Micawber, and Boffin, and Pickwick, et hoc genus omne, he can, indeed, dispense with it, for this—we say it with all deference—is not serious writing. But when he comes to tell the story of a passion, a story like that of Headstone and Wrayburn, he becomes a moralist as well as an artist. He must know man as well as men, and to know man is to be a philosopher. The writer who knows men alone, if he have Mr. Dickens's humor and fancy, will give us figures and pictures for which we cannot be too grateful, for he will enlarge our knowledge of the world. But when he introduces men and women whose interest is preconceived to lie not in the poverty, the weakness, the drollery of their natures, but in their complete and unconscious subjection to ordinary and healthy human emotions, all his humor, all his fancy, will avail him nothing if, out of the fulness of his sympathy, he is unable to prosecute those generalizations in which alone consists the real greatness of a work of art. This may sound like very subtle talk about a very simple matter; it is rather very simple talk about a very subtle matter. A story based upon those elementary passions in which alone we seek the true and final manifestation of character must be told in a spirit of intellectual superiority to those passions. That is, the author must understand what he is talking about. The perusal of a story so told is one of the most elevating experiences within the reach of the human mind. The perusal of a story which is not so told is infinitely depressing and unprofitable.

THE CYCLOPÆDIA OF BIOGRAPHY.*

THE new edition of this work opens with an "Advertisement"—in lieu of a preface—claiming for it "compactness," "comprehensiveness," and a "combination of accuracy and brevity," and expressing the belief "that the volume, as now published, embodies nearly all that will be looked for" in a manual of this description. A critical glance over it convinces us that these claims are not well-founded.

As regards the first and last of these qualities, our limited space not allowing us to quote largely, we must refer our reader to such articles as "Bayard," "Bayle," "Burger," "Godwin, Wm.," or "Rabelais," consuming full columns, written in a style not sufficiently compact for a cyclopædia in ten volumes, and in their whole tenor strikingly contrasting with such other productions as the following, which we give in full:

"Catullus, Caius Valerius, an elegant but licentious Roman poet. D. 40 B.C."

"Herodotus, called by Cicero the 'Father of History,' was b. at Halicarnassus, in Caria, 484 B.C., and is the most ancient of the Greek historians whose works are extant."

"Richard I., King of England, surnamed Cœur de Lion, was b. in 1157, and ascended the throne on the death of his father, Henry II., in 1189. D. 1199."

"Romulus, the founder of Rome, and brother of Remus, was the son of Rhea Sylvia, daughter of Numitor, King of Alba. D. 715 B.C." Who would suppose, on reading this last paragraph, that it was a fable exploded by Niebuhr?

These few biographies, so eminently distinguished by "brevity," will also convey to our reader a slight idea of what we have to understand by "comprehensiveness." On this point, however, we can give more exact information without wasting too much space. Our cyclopædia is comprehensive enough to give the lives of such men of genius as Aromatri, Arpino, Arriazzi, Arrighetti, Arrighetto, Arrighetti, Arsilla, and Artalis, and of such monarchs as Augustulus, Charles the Simple, Dagobert, Galerius, Gratian, Juba, and Numerian. On the other hand, it is too compact and brief to mention Troy, the Iliad, or the Odyssey, in "Homer;" the wars against the Greeks, the Scythians, and Babylon, in "Darius;" the Peloponnesian war, in "Thucydides;" tyranny or cruelty in "Dionysius;" the Thirty Years' War in "Ferdinand II.;" the wars against Napoleon in "Frederic William III.," or in "Schwartzenberg;" the deposition and banishment of Gustavus IV. in the life of this king; or Brescia or Italy, in "Haynau." It intentionally and consistently omits all the biblical names, but with them also all the post-biblical Jewish Abrahams, Davids, Samuels, and Solomons, not excepting the greatest mediæval philosophers, poets, or scholars of that nation. Of monarchs, it gives all the Artaxerxeses, but no Xerxes; all the German Conrads, but none of the Othos, Maximilians, or Leopolds; all the English Henries, but neither William the Conqueror nor William of Orange; all the French Charleses, but none of the Philips, not excepting Philip Augustus; a number of Spanish Alphonsos, but no Philip, not even the Second; all the Turkish Achmets, but no Mohammed (Sultan), Solyman, or Selim; no Attalus, Herod, Ptolemy, or Seleucus; no Stephen, Ladislas, Vladimir, Ivan, Waldemar, Matthias, or Pedro; nor Attilla, Genseric, Theodoric, Rurik, Piast, or Arpad. It has only one Darius, one Demosthenes, and one Pompey; no Timoleon, no Metellus, no Masaniello, no Savonarola, no Sixtus, and but one Clement; no Hunniades, no Zrinyi, no Aureng-Zebe, no Tippoo-Saib, no Chlopicki, no Niemcewicz, no Pushkin, no Petöfi. The whole letter X, though including Xavier, Xenocrates, Xenophon, and Ximenes, fills only half a page, owing, in part, to what is styled "compactness," and in part to the omission of Xanthippus, Xerxes, etc. Less space is devoted to Robespierre than to Rob Roy; to John Huss than to Giles Hussey; to Kant than to Kean; to Spinoza than to Spontini; to Alexander Hamilton than to Aaron Burr; to George Washington than to Benedict Arnold.

Now for "accuracy." Frederic the Great is given as one of the Frederic Williams. The Pole Jablonowski receives the German title von. We find a Charles VIII. Emperor of Germany. Prince Poniatowski, who was drowned at the close of the battle of Leipzic, is made to participate in the campaign of the following year, 1814. King Sobieski is called the Great. The French Las Cases is entered as Las Casas; Thomas Münzer as Muncer; Malachowski as Malackowski; Priessnitz as Pressnitz; De Kalb, Pulaski, Guyon, and Radetzky without Christian names. Hufeland is designated as "a Prussian counsellor of state, who was also an eminent physician." Field-marshal Schwarzenberg is entered in the main work under "Schwartzenberg;" Prince Felix, in the supplement, once under "Schwartzenberg," receiving a biography of upward of twenty lines, and again under "Von Schwartzenberg," where he is finished in seven, but receives the unmerited honor of a succession, as prime minister, to Prince Metternich. Two other Germans appear in the supplement under "Von," which is quite novel, and the most renowned of Polish poets, Mickiewicz, is introduced, in the same, in this fine English form, Mitzkievitch; which is like giving "Matztzeenee" for "Mazzini," and "Koshshoot" for "Kossuth." But let us return to the main part: The few lines on Maimonides offer us a fine specimen of accuracy: "1131," instead of "1135," is given as the year of his birth; his "Mishneh Torah" is called "Mischna Terah; his "Shemonah Perakim," "Peruschim," and his great philosophical work "Moreh" is designated as "an explanation of obscure places in Scripture." "Blucher, Gebaral Lebrecht, Prince von," stands for "Blücher, Gebhardt Leberecht, Prince of Wahlstadt." George Washington is stated to have been born in Fairfax instead of Westmoreland county, Va. Similar mistakes abound in the greatest possible profusion. Misprints are equally numerous.

The way foreign names are treated throughout is highly amusing. Bürger, Göttingen, and Krüdener are given without, Modlin and Gruber with, marks above the vowels. The Russian final syllable vitch, precisely corresponding to our son in Robertson, Johnson, etc., appears correctly in the surname of Nicholas, as vitsch in that of Peter, as witz in that of Lomonosoff, and as witsch in Paskiewitch, and again and again in all these forms. (Suppose a foreigner should spell our names thus: Jeffer*sohn*, Madi*sonn*, Jack*sonne*, John*soan!*) The Frenchman Mailly's Christian name is John Baptist; Say's, Jean Baptiste; Colbert's, John Baptist; Rousseau's, Jean Baptiste; the Spaniard Munoz's, John Baptist; the Italian Casanova's, Jean Baptiste. Henry and Henri, Ferdinand and Fernando, and twenty other names, alternate in the same way. Some Germans offer a peculiarly interesting mixture of English and Teutonic Christian names, thus: Schadow, Johann Geoffroy; Schiller, John Christopher Frederic; Schlegel, August Wilhelm; Schleiermacher, Frederic Ernest Daniel; Schopenhauer, Johanna; Schubert, Francis; Schumacher, Heinrich Christian. So also in the supplement: Schlosser, Friedrich Christoph, and next to him, Schneider, John Christian Frederick.

No references are given. Marcus Aurelius can be found only under "Antoninus," and he who looks for Hasdrubal, or Hamilcar, must know that our book has these names without an H, though it knows only the form Hannibal.

Living persons are excluded—except Agassiz!

All we can say in praise of the book is that it is neatly printed and bound.

* "The Cyclopædia of Biography; A Record of the Lives of Eminent Men. By Parke Godwin." New Edition. With a Supplement, brought down to the Present Time. By George Sheppard. New York: Hurd & Houghton. 1866.

A SUMMER IN SKYE.*

WE do not think that our hopes of entertainment in opening this book were unreasonable, and we are obliged to summon all the well-known sweetness of the critical temperament to qualify the indignation which the inhospitable disappointment of our hopes has roused. Many years ago we sat down at a florid feast of verse provided by Mr. Smith, and though we have since suspected that the poetic refreshment offered was something like the fare of those > ——"great hotels

> Where they shift plates and let ye live on smells," still we had a lingering belief that there was some veritable relish of poetry in all that glitter of table service; and it was with this conviction in our mind that we turned willingly to a volume of prose by the same author. But summer days are long, in Skye, and they are tedious in the book which Mr. Smith has made about them. In fact, the book is very curiously dull. As you lapse from depth to depth along its drowsy pages, you wake suddenly at times to a sense of the text, and, as in listening to a heavy sermon, remain vexed with a harrowing doubt whether you have or have not been asleep; and again you are brought to grief at times by some passage putting a commonplace severely at you, as when the bore to whom you have been listening long in a pleasant unconsciousness appalls you by asking a question which has to be answered yes or no. Mr. Smith's prose style is that of the editorials in the second-rate English journals, and is all the feebler for a certain air of hysterical jauntiness: it is awkwardly tautological and not always grammatical. With him, those who sell bad gin are "venders of deleterious alcohol;" persons indifferent to foul smells are "gentlemen of obtuse olfactory nerve;" a boy who jeers the magistrates "gives vent to an irreverent observation;" all which seems to us poor fooling, and of but a stale flavor.

Mr. Smith's manner, especially in treating of historical personages and places, is the light and elegant manner of Thackeray, as it may be learned from Mr. George Augustus Sala. He thus comes to wear the fascinating appearance of knowing familiarly everything about everything he mentions, and of keeping back vast stores of detail, while he produces picturesque bits of knowledge; he has the grace of one who has studied the bearing of a gentleman as it is found reflected in a gent. One likes to know that Pope saw Dryden sitting in the easy chair, near the fire, at Will's Coffee-house, and that Scott met Burns at Adam Ferguson's. It is pleasant to know that Dr. Johnson and Flora Macdonald met, with other familiar talk about Bozzy, and Prince Charles, and history in general. Do we not know this genteel air? Many a page of Mr. Smith's book is like a page in "Henry Esmond" or "The Four Georges," seen through the "Temple Bar" on the cover of Mr. Sala's magazine. Our author is very much better when purely and simply Mr. Smith, though he is bad enough then, and we think has hardly his equal for destroying all raciness and character in anecdote, for taking the life out of a landscape, for putting the sea out of countenance, and the hills to confusion. We are not ready to say just how he accomplishes this, but it seems to us that it comes about through too much metaphor, and again through too much violence of epigram, with which, perhaps, the author seeks to correct his symbolic language. Indeed, Mr. Smith seems to have passed most of his summer in guessing nature's conundrums, and to have put down the shrewd result of his guesses, in order that everybody may hereafter know what everything is like in the heavens and on the earth. His whole book may thus be resolved into its elements of questions and answers. What is a bee, with his head stuck into a rose, and fidgeting with its leaves, like? A tailor tired of sitting still. There is no end to quickness of this sort, relieved, certainly, by occasional passages of laborious humor, inspired by such incidents as travelling all day with an idle old horse:

* "A Summer in Skye. By Alexander Smith." Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1865

"At parting I waved the animal, sullen and unbeloved, my last farewell; and wished that no green paddock should receive him in his old age, but that his ill-natured flesh should be devoured by the hounds, that leather should be made of his becudgelled hide, and hoped that, considering its toughness, of it should the boots and shoes of a poor man's children be manufactured."

We can imagine a man's saying something like this in careless talk, and being rather ashamed of it afterwards; but is it not somewhat desolating to find such drollery in print? On the whole, we believe we like the conundrums the best, though they keep us from knowing much of Skye or its people.

The book opens with one of its poorest chapters, which concerns Edinburgh and her renown for beauty, literature, and law; and then it takes you through Stirling and Oban to Skye. There is some anecdote of second-sight, which is agreeable, and there is talk about Ossian which one always likes to read. Mr. Smith believes in the genuineness of the Gaelic MSS. of Macpherson, but thinks that Macpherson's translation fails of justice to the original, and gives some rhythmic versions which are rather harder reading than even Macpherson's. On one occasion our author "drops into poetry" of his own, and makes at least a fine ballad of an old story of remote local feud and fray, which he calls "Danschiach." But where he has to do with people and scenes of this generation, his touch is commonly so feeble and imperfect that the concluding chapters, which are good and strong, seem almost the work of another hand. About the best thing in the whole book is the account of bargaining and fighting at an Irish sheep mart; and in the chapter entitled "The Smoking Parliament" there is very pleasant and excellent discourse upon certain points of Scottish character. Concerning Skye itself, and the peculiar traits of its wild inhabitants and wild scenery, the author tries hard to tell us something in vain. Little remains to his reader after all but a sense that it has been very rainy, and that there were red-haired, bare-legged girls, turf huts, shaggy ponies, prodigious hills, whiskey and sea everywhere. Of course, this happens in spite of considerable information actually set down in the book. But he has so viciously subjectivized the whole matter of his book that it comes to be at last not Mr. Smith's "Summer in Skye"' but a Skye Summer in Mr. Smith.

THE WELSH IN THE UNITED STATES.*

Rev. Samuel Roberts has attracted considerable attention among the Welsh people for the last forty years. Some years ago he bought a large tract of land in Tennessee, with the intention of founding a Welsh settlement there; but the intense antipathy of his countrymen to slavery has rendered the enterprise thus far a total failure. He was violently attacked in the Welsh publications for seeking to induce his countrymen to settle in a slave State; and, as he had written much in his native land against slavery, he was charged with being recreant to the cause of human liberty. About the beginning of the late war he published several articles in the newspapers, condemning the spirit of the North, while not justifying the action of the South. These raised a further storm of indignation against him, and he capped the climax by publishing in the present volume a long essay on the rebellion, reiterating his former opinions, and making himself the "best-abused" Welshman of the present generation.

Mr. Roberts is emphatically a man of "one idea," and that is peace. In his view everything is made subordinate to this. He has a perfect horror of war, and believes there is no evil so great as to justify a resort to arms for its correction. Remembering this, his conduct becomes intelligible; otherwise it is full of absurdities and inconsistencies. Though he has much to say in this volume, as well as in all his other writings, about gentleness and meekness and Christian love, as the correctives that are to reform the world, we fail to discover much of that spirit in his own writings. On the contrary, he is one of the most bitter and vindictive controversialists we have ever read. He is anything but meek in his treatment of those who attack him.

We did not take up his book with the intention of reviewing it, but of saying a few words about the state of Welsh literature in the United States.

Welsh-American publications are neither large in number nor varied in character. But this, perhaps, should not be wondered at, considering that the people themselves are not very numerous. There is at present but one weekly newspaper published in the language, and but three monthlies—all of the latter being denominational. Indeed, all Welsh publications, with but few exceptions, are of a religious character. You will in vain look among this people for sceptical works, though they have not escaped the controversies arising out of the modern discoveries of geology. This is true of Welsh books in the mother country as well as here. We notice, also, the almost total absence of works of fiction. There have been a few novels published, but the Welsh atmosphere does not seem suited for their production, and especially not for their circulation, as the people generally have a decided aversion to books of that class, regarding them as having an immoral tendency.

Attempts have been made at various times to establish the more solid serials, but they have all proved failures thus far. The one that came nearest being a success was a quarterly called "Y Fraethodydd" ("The Essayist"), which was a reprint, with the addition of an American department. Though a publication of acknowledged ability, it failed for want of patronage.

Quite a number of really valuable books have been issued at different times, but they have been mostly reprints. Among these may be mentioned Gurnal's "Christian in full Armor," Hughes's "Commentary on the New Testament," and Charles's "Scripture Dictionary," a large and learned work. The list of original Welsh-American books is so meagre as to be hardly worth mentioning. The most notable, perhaps, of original works, is a volume published by the Rev. W. Rowlands, D.D., of Utica, N. Y., on the "Parable of the Prodigal Son." Ostensibly a commentary on that beautiful parable of our Lord, it is really a body of Calvinistic divinity; and the career of that wayward young man is made use of to expound the whole round of theological dogmas, from original sin to eternal salvation. This is, we think, the ablest Welsh-American book yet issued, and will compare favorably with English books of the same class. We understand that Dr. Rowlands is soon to issue another volume, but have not heard upon what subject.

Any mention of Welsh literature would be incomplete without saying something about poetry. We presume a large majority of the Welsh people believe their poetry excels that of every other nation. While this opinion arises from a species of national vanity, it is, nevertheless, true that the language contains much good poetry, though but little of it is of Welsh-American origin. It is frequently objected to the quality of Welsh poetry, by those unfamiliar with the language, that if it were really good there would be more of it translated into English. In fact, however, this objection has no force, as any one understanding the peculiar character of Welsh metres will readily admit. Most of their good poetry has been written in what are called "Mesuran Caethion," and is, therefore, untranslatable. The adherence to these old metres has done incalculable mischief in fettering the free expression of thought; but we are glad to see of late years a disposition to break through these restraints, and hope, before long, to see Welsh poetry thoroughly emancipated. A few have ventured to write in blank verse, but it will take some time to bring the generality of Welsh people to look with favor upon it, so entirely different is it from what they have been accustomed to read.

Welsh-Americans possess some very striking peculiarities, and those peculiarities furnish us with an explanation why there are so few original works produced among them in this country. They are intensely Welsh. While there is no class of adopted citizens more thoroughly patriotic and American in their feelings, there are none more wedded to the traditions and customs of their native land. This feeling, however, does not include any love of a foreign government. The British Government is not their government, and they have no attachment for it. Hence, there is nothing to interfere with the most earnest loyalty on their part to the Government of the United States. But in literary, religious, and social matters it is quite different. They have these in their own right in their native land, and consider them as national properties to be loved and cherished wherever they may go. Added to these is their love for their language. The reverence which they feel for the old "Gymraeg" is something akin to worship; and they are actively engaged in the hopeless task of making the dear old tongue perpetual upon the American Continent.

* "Pregethan a Darlithian (Sermons and Essays). By Samuel Roberts."

Of course, this is all wrong; and the sooner the attempt is given up, the better it will be for themselves, as well as for their adopted country. Those coming here to live should adapt themselves to the customs and institutions and language of the country. That the contrary conduct is not prompted by any hostility to our people does not make the matter practically any better. We trust that our Welsh fellow-citizens will see the folly of attempting to plant transatlantic ideas and customs on this side of the water.

The Freedmen's Book. By L. Maria Child. (Ticknor & Fields, Boston.)—We know of no one so well qualified as Mrs. Child to address the freed people intelligibly and to their profit. Her whole life has been devoted to their redemption; her sympathy with their past sufferings, her understanding of their present condition, is complete; and her style is as simple, unaffected, and perspicuous as she is by nature frank and democratic, and gifted with uncommon common sense. In carrying out her novel idea, she has prepared a volume to which she herself has contributed chiefly biographical sketches of distinguished colored men and women, such as Banneker, Toussaint L'Ouverture, Douglass, and Phillis Wheatley. The humane poetry of Cowper, Montgomery, Whittier, and Pierpont is interspersed with that of colored authors; and there is a great variety of selections from the writings and sayings of well-known abolitionists. Short paragraphs containing noble sentiments or valuable information fill the interstices of the longer articles. The whole is intended to be read by the more intelligent freedmen to their brethren, in the hope that they all "will derive fresh strength and courage from this true record of what colored men have accomplished under great disadvantages." Mrs. Child receives no compensation for her part in this enterprise, and the book is accordingly sold at its bare cost. It will be circulated as widely as possible, and the surplus receipts, if any, will be turned over to the freedmen's aid associations.

Christian Companionship for Retired Hours. (Alexander Strahan, London and New York. 1865.)—Possibly, if one should take up this book and notice how neat and pretty and well printed it is, and then put it down again without reading a word, it would be better than if he should attempt to read it carefully. For any person with an imaginative turn of mind might, it would seem, conclude from the outside of the volume that the contents were something better than they are. And if the writer, who, for the sake of modesty no doubt, withholds his name, had known in what fine clothes he was to go before the world, it is very possible he would have made himself more worthy of esteem. The book is thin and unsubstantial to the last degree. And, what is worse, its chapters are dilutions or perversions of the text of Scripture, in comparison with which they seem even more feeble than they really are. There are few persons who could not better spend their "retired hours" in solitude than in such "companionship" as this.

Mitchell's New Reference Atlas. For the use of Colleges, Libraries, Families, and Counting-Houses. (E. H. Butler & Co., Philadelphia.)—We have here, printed on thick paper, one map to each leaf, and bound substantially, a combination of the two well-known school atlases of Mr. S. Augustus Mitchell, ancient and modern. The plates are identical in this and in the hitherto separate editions. They are characterized by simplicity and distinctness, in accordance with the scale on which they are drawn and the requirements of the pupils in our public schools. Hence there is an absence of detail, especially in representing the physical features of the several portions of the globe, and an index to names of places, etc., is rendered superfluous. For all ordinary purposes this atlas will be found convenient and trustworthy, and the classical addition will be welcome to many. There are the usual statistical tables at the end.

Meditations. By Henry Alford, Dean of Canterbury. (Alexander Strahan, London and New York. 1865.)—What has been attempted in this book the writer tells us in his preface: "I have taken some of the great familiar truths of our religious belief or life, and, stripping them of accidents and conventionalities, have endeavored to lay them forth in their reality, face to face with our ordinary thoughts and habits." But he seems to have chosen truths which are familiar rather to the lips than the life of men, and it is not strange that, as he says, "the first result of this procedure naturally has been that the two appear incompatible with each other." And the final result, namely, the application of these truths to everyday affairs, seems far-fetched and unnatural. Would it not be better to choose themes not quite so remote from our experience as "Advent" and "Creation," and then to reconcile the two would be less difficult? But the Dean mistakes if he imagines that these sermons will be popular in any sense, even the best. They have too little blood in them for that. They are as cold as ice. They are very chaste and elegant productions, and somewhat florid withal; but "the flowers seem like made flowers" and the elegance is at the expense of freshness and originality. Still the writer rises with his subject, and the sermons on "Providence," with which the volume closes, are much better than the rest. They teach in quite a simple way that God is always present when our hearts are open to receive him; that we need not wait for great events, for "special providences," to reveal him. The book is printed very handsomely.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

The Young Man's Friend. By Daniel C. Eddy, D.D. Graves & Young, Boston.

The Earl's Secret. By Miss Pardoe. T. B. Peterson & Co., Philadelphia.

Sun-Rays from Fair and Cloudy Skies. By Cousin Carrie. D. Appleton & Co., New York.

Life and Times of Joseph Warren. By Richard Frothingham. Little, Brown & Co., Boston.

Little Foxes. By Christopher Crowfield.—Patriot Boys and Prison Pictures. By Edmund Kirke. Ticknor & Fields, Boston.

Work and Win. By Oliver Optic. Lee & Shepard, Boston.

The Letters of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart. (1769-1791.) Translated from the Collection of Ludwig Nohl, by Lady Wallace. Two volumes. Hurd & Houghton, New York.

Melodies and Madrigals. Mostly from the Old English Poets. Edited by Richard Henry Stoddard. Bunce & Huntington, New York.

Record of the Federal Dead. Buried from Libby, Belle Isle, Danville, and Camp Lawton Prisons, and at City Point, and in the Field before Petersburg and Richmond. Philadelphia: by the United States Christian Commission.

Memoir of the Life and Character of Prof. Valentine Mott, Facile Princeps. By Dr. Samuel W. Francis. Second Edition. W. J. Widdleton, New York.

The Political History of the United States of America during the Great Rebellion. By Edward McPherson. Philp & Solomons, Washington, D. C.

Fine Arts.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

The opera has closed after a very successful season. Nineteen operas have been performed, and fifty-six representations have been given in New York, besides twelve in Brooklyn. Two new operas were brought out, and had a very good run. The regrettable death of Rovere, just at the end of the season, has thrown a little shadow over the success. His death, and the defection of Marra will render it almost impossible to perform "Crispino" again, so that in the spring season we shall have some other piece as a substitute for it.

During the last two weeks several fine orchestral concerts have been given, which demand some consideration from us.

First in order is the Second Symphonie-Soirée of Theodore Thomas, which took place at Irving Hall on December 2. The programme included the symphony of Schumann, No. 1, B flat major, Op. 38, the concerto for piano by Liszt, No. 1, E flat, the Leonora overture, No. 3, of Beethoven, two Italian vocal pieces, and the scherzo in B minor, Op. 20, of Chopin.

The orchestral works were all very finely presented. The orchestra was smaller than Mr. Thomas had expected to have, as it had to be made of such musicians as are honorable enough to stand to their engagements, and are not involved in the strike of the Musicians' Protective Union. What was wanting in numbers was made up in carefulness of execution. The leading players are the best in the city, and to our mind Mr. Thomas is the most admirable conductor we have. His perception of musical form and color is very exact, and, being gifted with a fine feeling, he infuses a spirit into his whole orchestra which makes it bend under his baton as though it were one multiple instrument on which he played. The symphony performed was the first attempt of Schumann in that direction. He had previously devoted himself almost exclusively to the piano, which is not always the best school for an orchestral composer. Great, then, was the astonishment of his critics, who had some reasons for predicting failure, when he gave out a work so broad in conception, and so carefully designed in detail. Though the first, it is better and more beautiful than the last, which was played a short time ago both in New York and Brooklyn. We notice that all of Schumann's symphonies appear better when considered in detached movements than when regarded as complete works. In this very one the subjects of the andante, the larghetto, and the allegro are all well treated individually, while the work as a whole is unequal and in some way deficient. Had Schumann written his symphonies as he did the compositions for the piano with which he began his career as a composer, and had he not felt forced to restrict himself to the traditional form of separate movements, he would, we think, have given us works greater by far than these symphonies.

We can hardly use too strong terms to express our admiration of the manner in which Mr. Mills played Liszt's concerto. He has improved very greatly in the last year, both in execution and perception, and is now beyond comparison the most finished and perfect performer that we have in this country. The concerto is one of Liszt's earlier pieces, and was written twelve or thirteen years ago for his son-in-law, Hans von Bülow. In form it is a unit; the treatment varies according to the subject, and quick and slow movements are contrasted throughout, but it is not broken up into parts, and the story is carried through from beginning to end, rising into a final climax, without unnatural breaks. The germs of the present manner of Liszt can be detected in it, but in the treatment of melody it would plainly show that it belonged to his early period, even though we were ignorant of the date of its composition. It is highly dramatic and powerful. We do not wonder that it has never been performed here before, as it is enough to frighten the boldest pianist, so full is it of technical difficulty. The brilliancy of Mr. Mills's rendering gained him a shower of well-deserved plaudits.

Madame Fleury-Urbain is an agreeable singer, with a good and flexible voice, though she has some faults of execution. In spite of the unusual attractions of the opera, the attendance on this occasion was larger than at the first soirée. We hope that it will be still larger next time, for Mr. Thomas deserves to be encouraged in his undertaking to give us the best orchestral concerts of the winter, both in selection of pieces and in performance.

The second concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society took place on Saturday evening, Dec. 9, on a stormy evening, but before a crowded house. The orchestral pieces performed were the fourth symphony in D minor of Schumann, the overture caractéristique, "Columbus," by George F. Bristow, and the "Tannhäuser" overture of Wagner. The vocalists were Misses Phillips and Bosisio and Mr. Massimiliani. The symphony of Schumann was played tolerably well, but the overture to "Tannhäuser" was much better given. The manner in which Wagner's orchestral compositions are always received here, leads us to hope that some impressario will some time give us Wagner's operas, which, if well put on the stage, will not fail to show that American audiences are sufficiently educated to appreciate really good music, in spite of the influence of critics and musicians of the traditional school.

The marked feature of the evening was the performance of Mr. Bristow's overture; not so much on account of any very great excellence in the music as that the Philharmonic Society has at last recognized the fact that our own composers ought to be allowed an opportunity to show of what stuff they are made. Mr. Bristow is one of our most respectable composers, and "Columbus" is one of his best efforts, though not a work of eminent beauty or excellence. We should like to hear Albert's symphony on the same subject in contrast to it.

A concert was given on Thursday last for the Wallace Memorial Fund. It commenced with the funeral march from the "Sinfonia Eroica;" but, with this exception, all the pieces were by Wallace. Misses Kellogg and Phillips and Messrs. Castle and Campbell were all in excellent voice, and their songs were a great part of the performance. The orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Theodore Thomas, also played admirably. It is to be hoped that the amount realized from the concert will be enough to be a suitable offering from the city where Wallace once lived.

On Saturday night the New York Philharmonic Society gave their second concert with an entirely instrumental programme. The eighth symphony of Beethoven, Barziel's overture to "Prometheus," and Mendelssohn's music to the "Midsummer-Night's Dream" were the orchestral pieces. Mr .Jehin Prume, a nephew, we believe, of the great Prume, recently arrived from Europe, played one of Mendelssohn's concertos and a fantasia. His tones are good, but his manner of playing is very nervous and disagreeable.

On the same evening Mr. Alfred H. Pease gave his first orchestral concert, and on Sunday both the Arion and the Liederkranz societies gave concerts, with a very fine selection of pieces.

BE SURE AND EXAMINE

OUR LARGE AND CHEAP STOCK

OF

HOLIDAY BOOKS AND ALBUMS

BEFORE PURCHASING.

TIBBALS & WHITING,

37 Park Row and 145 Nassau Street, N. Y.

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT!

Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia, respectfully announce that, in addition to their general business as hitherto conducted, they have recently entered into extensive arrangements with leading European Houses for the Importation and Republication of the most desirable English Works, which they feel confident they are able to offer at prices that will be both advantageous to the dealer and satisfactory to the public.

The following are among their more important Foreign and American Issues:

TROLLOPE'S NEW WORK.

Just Published,

THE BELTON ESTATE.

By ANTHONY TROLLOPE. One Vol. 12mo. $1 50.

ROBERT DALBY AND HIS WORLD OF TROUBLES.

Being the Early Days of a Connoisseur. 12mo. $1 75.

FROST AND FIRE.

NATURAL ENGINES, TOOL MARKS, AND CHIPS. With Sketches taken at Home and Abroad. By a Traveller. Two Vols. 8vo, with numerous illustrations, $15.

"To read a book like the volumes before us is one of the highest privileges that can attach to the student of science. To the general public it cannot fail to be a rich treat. Never in the course of our scientific reading have we met with a work more thoroughly sterling. The manly good sense and earnestness of purpose exhibited in one thousand pages of the very best matter have quite disarmed us. * * * * Rarely has it been our good fortune to meet with a work at once so original and so mindful of the cherished opinions of the accepted leaders of thought in its particular department. In these volumes we not only meet, what is so rare now-a-days, 'science founded on practical observation, but, what is rarer still, science hand in hand with modesty."—London Times.

WORKS OF JAMES MADISON.

Now First Published.

LETTERS AND OTHER WRITINGS OF JAMES MADISON, Fourth President of the United States. In four volumes. Price $16.

From the Hon. George Bancroft.

NEW YORK, Oct. 24, 1865.

My Dear Mr. Lippincott:—I will not delay another day thanking you for the early copy of the writings of Washington's youthful friend, Virginia's wisest statesman.

The volumes of Madison which you have just published are the most valuable contributions to the history of the country that has been made in my day. They are a beautiful reflection of the purity and sincerity and patriotism of Madison's own soul. A history of the formation of our federal institutions, of early parties, of the struggles of the nation in its infancy to obtain justice and due consideration from foreign powers, all are here illustrated from the primal sources. I would not part with the volumes on any account.

I remain, my dear sir, very truly, your obliged, GEO. BANCROFT.

J. B. Lippincott.

KITTO'S BIBLICAL CYCLOPÆDIA.

NEW EDITION.

A CYCLOPÆDIA OF BIBLICAL LITERATURE. Originally edited by JOHN KITTO, D.D., F.S.A. Third edition, greatly enlarged and improved; edited by Wm. Lindsay Alexander, D.D., F.S.A.S., etc. In three volumes royal 8vo, $7 per vol. Elegantly printed and beautifully illustrated with Maps and Engravings.

Volumes I. and II. already published.

Volume III. will be published February 1.

Published in connection with Messrs. A. & C. Black, of Edinburgh.

SYME'S SURGICAL WORKS.

NEW AND COMPLETE EDITION.

THE PRINCIPLES OF SURGERY. By JAMES SYME, F.R.S.E., Surgeon in Ordinary to the Queen, of Scotland, etc., etc. To which are appended his Treatises on the "Diseases of the Rectum," "Stricture of the Urethra and Fistula in Perineo," the "Excision of Diseased Joints," and numerous additional contributions to the Pathology and Practice of Surgery. Edited by his former pupil, DONALD MACLEAN, M.D., L.R.C.S.E., Professor of the Institute of Medicine, and Lecturer on Clinical Surgery, Queen's University, Canada. One vol. 8vo., $7.

A NEW WORK, BY JOHN STUART MILL.

JUST PUBLISHED.

AUGUSTE COMTE AND POSITIVISM. By JOHN STUART MILL, M.P. One vol. 8vo, $1 50.

CHARLES DICKENS'S WORKS.

ENGLISH EDITION.

An Illustrated Library Edition, carefully revised by the author, and beautifully printed, in post 8vo. With the original Illustrations. Price $3 per vol.

ALREADY PUBLISHED:

PICKWICK PAPERS, 43 Illustrations, 2 vols., $6.
NICHOLAS NICKLEBY, 39 Illustrations, 2 vols., $6.
MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT, 40 Illustrations, 2 vols., $6.
OLD CURIOSITY SHOP, 39 Illustrations, 2 vols., $6.
BARNABY RUDGE, 36 Illustrations, 2 vols., $6.
SKETCHES BY BOZ, 39 Illustrations, 1 vol., $3.
OLIVER TWIST, 24 Illustrations, 1 vol., $3.
DOMBEY AND SON, 39 Illustrations, 2 vols., $6.
DAVID COPPERFIELD, 40 Illustrations, 2 vols., $6.
PICTURES OF ITALY, and Am. Notes, 8 Illustrations, 1 vol., $3.
BLEAK HOUSE, 40 Illustrations, 2 vols., $6.
LITTLE DORRITT, 40 Illustrations, 2 vols., $6.
CHRISTMAS BOOK, 17 Illustrations, 1 vol., $3.
TALE OF TWO CITIES, 16 Illustrations, 1 vol., $3.
GREAT EXPECTATIONS, 8 Illustrations, 1 vol., $3.

ALSO

A CHEAP EDITION OF DICKENS'S WORKS, in 17 volumes, including, besides the above, HARD TIMES, and AN UNCOMMERCIAL TRAVELLER, each illustrated with a frontispiece. Price per vol., $2.

(The Jacksonian Prize for the Year 1864.)

BY SURGEON ANNANDALE.

NEARLY READY.

THE MALFORMATIONS, DISEASES, AND INJURIES OF THE FINGERS AND TOES, AND THEIR SURGICAL TREATMENT. By THOMAS ANNANDALE, F.R.C.S., Assistant Surgeon Royal Infirmary, Edinburgh. On volume 8vo. With illustrations.

GLOBE EDITION OF SHAKESPEARE.

NEARLY READY.

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE. Edited by WILLIAM GEORGE CLARKE and WILLIAM ALDIS WRIGHT, of Trinity College, Cambridge. In one compact cap 8vo volume, including the Plays, Poems, and Sonnets, and a complete glossary.

A NEW VOLUME BY SAMUEL SMILES.

NEARLY READY.

LIVES OF BOULTON AND WATT.

Comprising a History of the Invention and Introduction of the Steam Engine. By SAMUEL SMILES. Illustrations. 8vo. Being a continuation of "The Lives of the Engineers."

"Mr. Smiles has had full access to the Soho papers, and to the extensive original correspondence between Boulton and Watt, so that an authentic history may be looked for. Mr. Percival Skelton has been making drawings of many objects of interest connected with the Soho firm, one of the most curious of which is an accurate representation of Watt's private workshop at Heathfield, as it was left at his death forty six years ago, the room having been opened only for the third time, a few weeks since, to enable the drawing to be made."—Birmingham Daily Post.

THE HOLY LAND.

By WILLIAM HEPWORTH DIXON. With illustrations from original drawings and photographs. In two vols. Elegantly printed on tinted paper. $10.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., PUBLISHERS, PHILADELPHIA.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,

LONDON,

Have for sale at their American Agency,

129 GRAND STREET, NEW YORK,

A general stock of their

BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED AND ELEGANTLY BOUND BOOKS FOR LIBRARIES, PUBLIC AND PRIVATE.

Also for Presentation Books for the Holidays. Among others,

MOXON'S OLD DRAMATISTS.
9 vols. royal 8vo, half calf, $60.

LANE'S ARABIAN NIGHTS.
3 vols. 8vo, cloth, $15.

BULWER'S (Sir E. L.) NOVELS AND TALES.
23 vols. crown 8vo, cloth, $35; or the 23 vols. bound in 20, half calf, extra, $60; half Roxburgh, $62 50.

——WITH THE DRAMAS AND POEMS.
25 vols., full calf, $110.

DISRAELI'S (Isaac) WORKS.
In 7 vols. crown 8vo, half calf, $22 50; consisting of The Curiosities of Literature, 3 vols.; The Amenities of Literature, 2 vols.; The Quarrels and Calamities of Authors, 1 vol.; The Literary Character of Men of Genius, 1 vol.

BOSWELL'S LIFE OF DR. JOHNSON.
Including the Tour to the Hebrides. With numerous illustrations. 5 vols. 12mo, cloth, $6 50; half calf, extra, $15.

WOOD'S ILLUSTRATED NATURAL HISTORY.
With many hundred engravings by Harrison Weir and others, 3 vols. royal 8vo, cloth, $22 50; half calf, $27 50; full calf, $32 50; full morocco, $35.

STAUNTON'S MAGNIFICENT EDITION OF SHAKESPEARE.
With many hundred illustrations by John Gilbert. 3 vols. royal 8vo, cloth, $22 50; half calf, $27 50; full calf, $32 50; full morocco, $35.

——A new library edition, printed in a large new type on toned paper, but without the illustrations, 4 vols. 8vo, cloth, $17 50; half calf, $25; full calf, $30; tree calf, $35.

KNIGHT'S PICTORIAL SHAKESPEARE.
With all the illustrations, etc., of the original edition, upwards of 1,000 in number. 8 vols. royal 8vo, cloth, $50; half calf, extra, $70.

A ROUND OF DAYS.
Described in original poems by some of the most celebrated poets, and in thirty-eight pictures by eminent artists, engraved in the very highest style of art by the Brothers Dalziel. 4to, cloth, $10; full morocco, $15.

HOME THOUGHTS AND HOME SCENES.
In original poems by the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," Amelia B. Edwards, and others. Illustrated in a series of thirty-five exquisite pictures from drawings by A. B. Houghton, engraved by the Brothers Dalziel. 4to, cloth, gilt edges, $10; full morocco, $15.

THE PARABLES OF OUR LORD AND SAVIOUR JESUS CHRIST.
Illustrated in forty-seven pictures from drawings by John E. Millais, engraved by the Brothers Dalziel. 4to, cloth, gilt edges, $10; full morocco, $15.

BIRKET FOSTER'S PICTURES OF ENGLISH LANDSCAPE.
Containing thirty elaborate illustrations, engraved by the Brothers Dalziel. 4to, cloth, gilt edges, $10; full morocco, $15.

 Send for a copy of new complete catalogue.

F. LEYPOLDT,

646 Broadway,

Has in progress arrangements for presenting to the American public an authorized translation, edited by an eminent American scholar, of

THE HISTORY
OF THE
UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.
By DR. CARL FRIEDRICH NEUMANN.

In 3 vols. octavo.

The reviews of this history, which have attracted the attention of intelligent readers throughout the world, render praise superfluous.

Particulars in future advertisements.

READY DECEMBER 21.

THE CATHOLIC WORLD,

FOR JANUARY, 1866.

CONTENTS:

I.—LEIBNITZ AND BOSSUET.
II.—SAINTS OF THE DESERT.
III.—BETTER LATE THAN NEVER.
IV.—CONSTANCE SHERWOOD.
V.—THE SIEGE OE MALTA.
VI.—A SONG OF THE YEAR.
VII.—THE RELIGIOUS STATISTICS OF THE WORLD.
VIII.—BOOKS.
IX.—THE ANCIENT FACULTY OF PARIS.
X.—ALL-HALLOW EVE; OR, THE TEST OF FUTURITY.
XI.—MALINES AND WURZBURG (Concluded).
XII.—ST. ELIZABETH.
XIII.—DR. PUSEY ON THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.
XIV.—IRELAND BEFORE CHRISTIANITY.
XV.—THE COLOSSUS OF RHODES.
XVI.—PUBLIC LIFE OF ST. CATHARINE OF SIENA.
XVII.—A CHRISTMAS CAROL.
XVIII.—LAW AND LITERATURE.
XIX.—MISCELLANY.
XX.—NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Single Copies, 50 Cents; $5 per year in advance.

LAWRENCE KEHOE, PUBLISHER,
7 Beekman Street, New York

JUST PUBLISHED,

THE LIFE AND SERMONS
OF THE
REV. FRANCIS A. BAKER,
OF THE CONGREGATION OF ST. PAUL.

EDITED BY REV. A. F. HEWIT.

1 Vol., 504 pp., Crown Octavo, Cloth, $2 50; Cloth, bevelled, $3; Half Morocco, $4 50.
Illustrated with a fine portrait of FATHER BAKER, engraved on steel.

CONTENTS:

Life of Father Baker. Sermons: The Necessity of Salvation; Mortal Sin; The Particular Judgment; Heaven; The Duty of Growing in Christian Knowledge; Mission of St. John the Baptist; God's Desire to be Loved; The Failure and Success of the Gospel; The Work of Life; The Church's Warning to the Individual Soul; The Negligent Christian; The Cross the Measure of Sin; Divine Calls and Warnings; The Tomb of Christ a School of Comfort; St. Mary Magdalene at the Sepulchre; The Preacher the Organ of the Holy Ghost; The Two Wills in Man; Intercession of Mary the Highest Power of Prayer; Mysteries in Religion; The Worth of the Soul; The Catholic Certitude Concerning the Way of Salvation; The Presence of God; Keeping the Law not Impossible; The Spirit of Sacrifice; Mary's Destiny a Type of Ours; Care for the Dead; Success the Reward of Merit; The Mass the Highest Worship; Lessons of Autumn.

A SPLENDID CHRISTMAS GIFT:

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF ARCHBISHOP HUGHES.

2 Vols. 8vo, 1,500 pages, cloth, bevelled, fine edition	$8 00
" " " ½ mor., " "	10 00
THE CATHOLIC WORLD, Vol 1, 860 pages, cloth	3 50
" " " " bev. cl	4 00
" " " " ½ mor	5 00

☞ Any of the books sent by mail or express, free of charge, on receipt of advertised price.

LAWRENCE KEHOE, PUBLISHER,
7 Beekman Street, N. Y.

Announcement Extraordinary.

THE WONDERFUL TALE ENTITLED

H E R M A N;

OR,

YOUNG KNIGHTHOOD,

Which sent an electric thrill through every reader, as it appeared, from week to week, in the National Era, is in press, and will soon be published in two handsome 12mo vols., by

LEE & SHEPARD,
149 Washington Street, Boston.

Advance orders from the Trade solicited.

TO WHOLESALE BUYERS OF

BOOKS AND STATIONERY.

D. APPLETON & CO.,

443 and 445 Broadway, New York,

HAVE NOW READY THEIR

CHRISTMAS STOCK OF FINE BOOKS AND STATIONERY.

To which a tention is invited.

AMONG THE BOOKS DESERVING OF SPECIAL MENTION ARE:

LIFE OF MAN SYMBOLIZED BY THE MONTHS OF THE YEAR. Accompanied by a series of 25 full-page Illustrations, and many hundred Marginal Devices, Initial Letters, etc.

THE NEW TESTAMENT. With Engravings on Wood from Designs of Fra Angelico, Pietro Perugino, and others. 1 vol. 4to, elegantly bound in morocco, $65.

CHRISTIAN BALLADS. By the Right Rev. Arthur Cleveland Coxe. Superbly Illustrated with Original Designs. By John A. Hows. Cloth extra, $6.

NEW TESTAMENT OF OUR LORD AND SAVIOUR JESUS CHRIST. Illustrated by a Plain Explanatory Comment, and by authentic Views of Places mentioned in the Sacred Text, from Sketches and Photographs taken on the spot. Edited by Edward Churton, M.A. 115 beautiful Illustrations. Cloth, $12; morocco antique, $20.

We have a superb assortment of

ILLUSTRATED STANDARD ENGLISH BOOKS,

And we would call attention to the stock of

ENGLISH JUVENILE WORKS,

which are offered at unusually Low Prices.

IN THE STATIONERY DEPARTMENT, WE HAVE JUST RECEIVED

PAPIER MACHE DESKS,

LADIES' WORK-BOXES, PORTFOLIOS, ETC.,

From the manufacturers in Europe.

PIRIE'S CELEBRATED NOTE PAPERS,

And Envelopes to match.

FRENCH NOTE PAPERS,

The newest and best styles, with Envelopes to match.

PARLOR CROQUET,

In the same style as the FIELD CROQUET.

PRESSES FOR STAMPING INITIALS FOR THE TRADE,

With Colors and every requisite.

Bibles and Prayer-Books from fifty cents upwards.

MASTER FOX!

NOW READY:

THE WOOING OF MASTER FOX.

BY

SIR EDWARD BULWER LYTTON, BART.

ARRANGED FOR CHILDREN BY O. D. MARTIN.

It is most elegantly illustrated with designs by White, superbly printed in six oil colors, bound in fine morocco-muslin by Pauson & Nicholson, making it altogether the prettiest book for children yet issued. Price $1 50. Mailed on receipt of price.

Published by

ASHMEAD & EVANS, PUBLISHERS,

724 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

MONUMENTS TO

WASHINGTON AND LINCOLN,

built with twenty-four neatly finished blocks, upon which are the faces of all the Presidents, the coats-of-arms of all the States, and a variety of printed matter. In a substantial box. Price $2.

"A beautiful HOLIDAY PRESENT and a neat PARLOR ORNAMENT."—N. Y. Evangelist.

THE PALACE OF SANTA CLAUS, AND DOMINOES.

Nine games and fifty puzzles. Price $1 25.

For sale by all booksellers and dealers in toys. On the receipt of $3 25 the two boxes will be sent by express, free of charge, to any place east of the Mississippi, by

OAKLEY & MASON,

21 Murray Street, N. Y.

The Most Tasteful and Elegant

BOOKS FOR HOLIDAY PRESENTS

ARE THE VOLUMES OF THE

GOLDEN TREASURY SERIES,

Affording from their variety of character a great choice for different tastes and ages. They are all printed in the most elegant style at the University Press, and are bound in a neat vellum cloth, gilt tops.

THE SERIES COMPRISES:

I. THE GOLDEN TREASURY
of the best Songs and Lyrical Poems in the English Language. Selected and arranged by FRANCIS TURNER PALGRAVE. 16mo, vellum cloth, price $1 75. One of the best selections in the language.

II. THE CHILDREN'S GARLAND.
From the best poets. Selected and arranged by COVENTRY PATMORE. 16mo, vellum cloth, price $1 75.

III. THE BOOK OF PRAISE.
From the best English hymn-writers. Selected and arranged by ROUNDELL PALMER. 16mo, vellum cloth, price $1 75. A very choice collection of sacred poetry.

IV. THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS
From this world to that which is to come. By JOHN BUNYAN. With illustrations by Stothard. 16mo, vellum cloth, price $1 75.

V. A BOOK OF GOLDEN DEEDS
of all Times and all Lands. Gathered and narrated by the author of the "Heir of Redclyffe." 16mo, vellum cloth, price $1 75. A most delightful book.

VI. THE JEST BOOK.
The choicest Anecdotes and Sayings. Selected and arranged by MARK LEMON. 16mo, vellum cloth, price $1 75.

VII. THE BALLAD BOOK.
A selection of the choicest of British ballads. Edited by WILLIAM ALLINGHAM. 16mo, vellum cloth, price $1 75. Just published.

VIII. THE SUNDAY BOOK OF POETRY.
Selected and arranged by C. F. ALEXANDER. 16mo, vellum cloth, price $1 75. Just published.

For the Young Folks.

IX. DREAM CHILDREN.
By the author of "Seven Little People and Their Friends." 16mo, vellum cloth, price $1 25. The most charming juvenile that has been issued for years; full of individuality.

All the above sold separately or together, as a set, in a neat box. They are also for sale in all varieties of calf and morocco bindings.

AN IMPORTANT WORK FOR EVERY AMERICAN!

DE TOCQUEVILLE'S DEMOCRACY IN AMERICA.

Translated by HENRY REEVE, Esq. Edited, with Notes, the translation Revised and in great part Rewritten, and the Additions made to the recent Paris Editions now first translated, by FRANCIS BOWEN, Alford Professor of Moral Philosophy in Harvard University. Elegantly printed on linen paper at the University Press. Maroon vellum. 2 vols. post 8vo, price $6; half calf, $10; full calf, $12.

For sale by all booksellers, or sent free by mail on receipt of price by the publishers,

SEVER & FRANCIS,

CAMBRIDGE, Mass.

JANUARY NUMBER NOW READY.

Oldest, Cheapest, and Best!

MERRY'S MUSEUM FOR 1866.

TWENTY-SIXTH YEAR OF PUBLICATION.

This YOUNG PEOPLE'S FAVORITE having passed a QUARTER OF A CENTURY with the children and youth, commences a NEW VOLUME WITH THE JANUARY NUMBER, with increasing attractions for the little folks. Every number will be beautifully illustrated with choice Engravings, and will contain instructive Articles and entertaining Stories from some of the best writers for children in America.

A NEW STORY OF THRILLING ADVENTURES, by SOPHIE MAY, the charming writer for youth, entitled

"WILD OATS,"

will commence in the January number, and be continued through the year.

THE BOYHOOD OF LIEUT.-GEN. GRANT, by WILLIAM M. THAYER, in the January number, is worth the price of the Magazine.

THE MERRY OPTICIAN, by "M. E. D.," FRANK'S CONUNDRUM, by CATHERINE M. TROWBRIDGE, and other stories, will be found in the present number.

THE PUZZLE DRAWER, by FLETA FORRESTER, the Queen of Puzzlers, will be filled with Riddles, Anagrams, Prize Trials, Hieroglyphics, Labyrinths, etc., etc. Valuable prizes given every month for the solution of puzzles.

A FINE STEEL ENGRAVING OF LIEUT.-GEN. GRANT will be sent in the January number to all new subscribers. Splendid Premiums given for obtaining new subscribers, and liberal inducements to Agents.

$1 50 A YEAR IN ADVANCE. SINGLE COPIES, 15 CENTS.

NOW is the time to subscribe. Address

J. N. STEARNS, PUBLISHER,

111 Fulton Street, New York.

GET READY! GET THE BEST!

A New Volume! Look out for January Pictorial Double No. of the Illustrated PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, with Physiognomy, or "Signs of Character;" Ethnology, or the Races of Men; Physiology, the Laws of Life and Health; Phrenology and the Temperaments, with choice of pursuits; Psychology, the Science of the Soul; Our Social Relations, including Love, Courtship, and Marriage; Education and Self-Improvement, with such other matters as all ought to know, and can be found in no other publication. It is the best and cheapest work of its size and price. Terms—$2 a year; single numbers 20 cts. Subscribe at once. Address Messrs. FOWLER & WELLS, 389 Broadway, New York.

E. P. DUTTON & COMPANY'S

NEW BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.

CUSHIONS AND CORNERS;

OR, HOLIDAYS AT OLD ORCHARD.

16mo, illustrated, $1 25.

All who have examined this agree that it is one of the best Juveniles, both for boys and girls, which they have seen. The "Cushions" (the kind and obliging children) are very entertainingly contrasted with the "Corner" (the selfish and irritable one), and through a variety of experiences the "Corner" is turned at last into a "Cushion."

"An agreeable and fascinating story by Mrs. R. J. Greene, the moral of which, not so emphatically urged as to spoil the enjoyment of its readers, is expressed in the motto, 'Be kindly affectioned one to another, in honor preferring one another.'"—Advertiser.

CHILDREN'S SONGS FROM THE HILLSIDE.

A beautifully illustrated volume of Poetry for Children.

Bevelled boards, gilt edge, $2.

"This book of songs will be warmly welcomed by a multitude of households all over the land. These verses were written for children, but old age and youth will read them with delight."—Christian Times.

"A charming collection of songs, poems, and charades for the little ones. Illustrated by Kilburn in admirable taste, printed on satin paper at the 'Riverside Press,' and bound in bright colors and gold, it is, every way, a perfect thing."

OTTALIE'S STORIES FOR THE LITTLE FOLKS.

Translated from the German of MADAME OTTALIE WILDERMUTH.

16mo, 308 pages, 4 fine wood-cuts, $1 50.

"Three very cheerful stories, full of exquisite fancies, as all German stories are, very gracefully written, and illustrated with some very well drawn and finely executed wood-cuts."—Advertiser.

CHRISTMAS HOLIDAYS AT CEDAR GROVE.

A new edition, 16mo, $1 25.

"This is the third edition of a Juvenile book the sterling merits of which seven seasons of uninterrupted popularity have fully proven. It has two illustrations."—Advertiser.

Besides our own Publications we have an endless variety of Children's Books from other Publishers.

Any American book sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of advertised price.

☞ Our complete catalogue sent free on application.

E. P. DUTTON & CO., PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS,

135 Washington Street, Boston.

OAKLEY & MASON,

PUBLISHERS AND BOOKSELLERS,

21 MURRAY STREET,

(NEAR BROADWAY,)

In addition to their well-selected stock of

SCHOOL AND MISCELLANEOUS BOOKS,

have a fine assortment of

Illustrated Books for the Holidays.

Also the

STANDARD HISTORIES, NOVELS, AND POETICAL AND THEOLOGICAL WORKS,

in half calf, half turkey, full calf, and full turkey bindings, to which SPECIAL ATTENTION is invited.

BIBLES, TESTAMENTS, AND PRAYER-BOOKS

of all sizes and every variety of binding.

NEW JUVENILES AND BOOKS OF ADVENTURE FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Photographic Albums,

all prices, from fifty cents to twenty-five dollars.

THE PUBLICATIONS OF ALL THE LEADING PUBLISHING HOUSES IN THE COUNTRY constantly on hand, and for sale at publishers' prices.

Any book forwarded by mail, postage paid, upon receipt of the advertised price.

STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS OF THE WAR,

obtained at great expense, and forming a

COMPLETE PHOTOGRAPHIC HISTORY

OF THE

GREAT UNION CONTEST.

Bull Run,	Dutch Gap,	Strawberry Plains,
Yorktown,	Pontoon Trains,	Deep Bottom,
Gettysburg,	Hanover Junction,	Belle Plain,
Fair Oaks,	Lookout Mountain,	Monitors,
Savage Station,	Chickahominy,	Chattanooga,
Fredericksburg,	City Point,	Fort Morgan,
Fairfax,	Nashville,	Atlanta,
Richmond,	Charleston,	Mobile,
Petersburg,	Etc., Etc.	Etc., Etc.

Everybody is interested in these memorable scenes.

Just published by

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

501 Broadway, New York.

☞ Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.

THE BEST HOLIDAY GIFT

FOR

BOYS AND GIRLS

Is a Year's Subscription to

THE LITTLE CORPORAL.

Acknowledged by the leading papers to be the Best Children's Paper in America!

Published Monthly by

ALFRED L. SEWELL,

Chicago, Illinois.

PRICE ONE DOLLAR A YEAR, IN ADVANCE,

Including a

BEAUTIFUL STEEL ENGRAVING AS A PREMIUM TO EVERY SUBSCRIBER.

SAMPLE COPY, TEN CENTS.

CIRCULARS SENT FREE.

Every person who shall send six subscribers, and six dollars, will receive as a premium one extra copy for one year, and also a copy of the Engraving.

Other inducements for larger clubs.

All pages are electrotyped, and back numbers can always be furnished.

READ WHAT THE PAPERS SAY:

"It already excels every children's paper that we know of in this country."—Chicago Evening Journal.

THE LITTLE CORPORAL.—The Pittsburg Christian Advocate says: "The best paper for children published in this great country of ours, is The Little Corporal. It is a gem in the catalogue of monthlies."

Forney's Philadelphia Daily Press says of it: "The Little Corporal is destined to become the great children's paper of America."

"We cannot say too much in favor of this beautiful paper."—Bryan [O.] Press.

"The Little Corporal sparkles all over with vivacity and entertainment. It is, without doubt, the best and cheapest children's gazette published anywhere."—Marshall [Mich.] Statesman.

"THE LITTLE CORPORAL.—Though modestly calling itself by a subordinate title, it is really a very major-general among the children's magazines."—Chenango Telegraph [Norwich, N. Y.]

"The Little Corporal is the most interesting and instructive monthly in the Union."—Louisville Democrat.

"The Little Corporal is universally admitted to be the best juvenile paper now in existence."—Dubuque Daily Times.

"We like it better than ever."—N. W. C. Advocate.

"It strikes the right key, and is admirable—neither heavy nor silly, but simple, fresh, buoyant, and earnest."—Adams [N. Y.] Visitor.

"Its influence for good can never be estimated."—Grand Haven News.

"Indeed, there is no paper of the kind published that approaches it as a juvenile journal."—Poughkeepsie Daily Press.

"Of all the children's papers which are competitors for the patronage of the public, we know of no one which so nearly approximates to our standard of what such a paper should be. The terms are most liberal."—Batavia [N. Y.] Republican Advocate.

"The children will be better and happier from reading it."—Henry [Ill.] Courier.

"The Little Corporal really excels any child's paper we have seen. The premium picture is of itself worth a year's subscription."—Sandusky [O.] Reg.

"We consider it the best, decidedly the best, journal of the kind for children that we ever saw."—Star of the Valley [Newville, Pa.]

"We have the first two numbers of The Little Corporal, which are edited with unusual ability. They sparkle with originality, and are attractive on every page."—Worcester [Mass.] Palladium.

"The Little Corporal is the most readable and interesting and instructive paper for children we have ever perused."—Farmington [Maine] Chronicle.

"It is the cleverest thing of its kind yet realized in America."—Roxbury [Mass.] Journal.

"THE LITTLE CORPORAL.—Certainly, we have seen nothing in the shape of a child's paper which could compare with this, which comes to us from over the prairies."—Portland [Maine] Daily Press.

The above are only a tithe of the many beautiful notices our young soldier has received.

Address ALFRED L. SEWELL,

Care of Dunlop, Sewell & Spalding,

CHICAGO, ILL.

SEND IMMEDIATELY FOR OUR

HOLIDAY GEM,

A little book containing—

Calendar for 1866;
Post-office Regulations, and how to send money safe;
A Doctor's experience in Cholera in 1840, '55, and '65, and Receipt for Cure;
Fourteen Reasons for not engaging in Stock Speculations;
The kind of Books we want in this age for our Children.
It will tell you where to get your Books and other articles good and cheap for the Holidays.

Sent for 5 cents, post free.

TIBBALS & WHITING,
37 Park Row, and 145 Nassau Street, New York.

SUPERB NATIONAL GIFT-BOOK.

THE HOME OF WASHINGTON

AND

ITS ASSOCIATIONS,

HISTORICAL, BIOGRAPHICAL, AND PICTORIAL.

New Edition. Revised, with Additions.

BY BENSON J. LOSSING.

Illustrated with 150 Engravings, mainly from Original Drawings by the Author, embracing numerous Views of Mount Vernon, various interesting objects upon the Grounds, Copies of Famous Pictures, Portraits of Washington and Other Members of the Family, as well as Distinguished Personages of his Time, etc.

This new edition of this popular National work has been carefully corrected, and very interesting additional matter, with new engravings, introduced. It contains very much valuable information, first published in this volume, relating to the Washington Family, which Mr. Lossing's extensive acquaintance and superior facilities have enabled him to collect. This superb work is acknowledged to be one of the most important contributions to our historical literature, presenting a complete memorial of the private and domestic LIFE OF THE FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY. It is printed by Alvord on superfine paper, delicately tinted, and elegantly bound in heavy beveled boards, in new styles of binding, designed for the boudoir, parlor-table, and home library.

OPINION OF EDWARD EVERETT.

"This very interesting memorial of the home of Washington is a fit companion to Irving's valuable history, and should be included with it to make the library complete."

Small quarto, extra cloth, new designs, gilt side and edges, $6 50. Morocco antique and gilt sides and edges, $10 50.

Published by

W. A. TOWNSEND,
55 Walker street, New York.

☞ For sale by all Booksellers.

"The best illustrated volume of the season."—Round Table, December 9.

A ROUND OF DAYS.

DALZIEL'S FINE ART GIFT-BOOK FOR 1866.

WIDDLETON, Publisher, 17 Mercer Street, New York,

Has a supply of this superb book, which will be disposed of at Retail. Also, an assortment of the leading

ILLUSTRATED GIFT-BOOKS OF THE YEAR,

together with a stock of our own Standard Works, suitable for Presents, in fine bindings, such as DISRAELI'S WORKS. 6 vols., half calf.

LAMB'S WORKS. 5 vols., half calf.
BYRON. (A fine Library Edition.) 4 vols., half calf.
EDGAR A. POE'S WORKS—Prose and Poetical—in a variety of styles and bindings.
PROF. WILSON'S WORKS. NOCTES AMBROSIANÆ.
DOCTOR DORAN'S WORKS. 9 vols., half calf.
HALLAM'S WORKS.
SYDNEY SMITH.
PRAED'S POEMS.
INGOLDSBY LEGENDS.

And many other leading and popular authors.

WIDDLETON, 17 Mercer, nearly opposite Howard St.

READY DECEMBER 15,

With 12 Photographic Illustrations by Willingale.

O MOTHER DEAR, JERUSALEM!

The old Hymn: its Origin and Genealogy.

EDITED BY

WILLIAM C. PRIME.

One Vol. small 4to. Only 300 Copies printed.

A. D. F. RANDOLPH,

770 Broadway, Cor. Ninth Street.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS OF PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL,

501 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

In addition to our main business of PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS, we are Headquarters for the following, viz.:

STEREOSCOPES AND STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS.

Of these we have an immense assortment, including War Scenes, American and Foreign Cities and Landscapes, Groups, Statuary, etc., etc.; also, Revolving Stereoscopes, for public or private exhibition. Our Catalogue will be sent to any address on receipt of

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS.

We were the first to introduce these into the United States, and we manufacture immense quantities in great variety, ranging in price from 50 cents to $50 each. Our ALBUMS have the reputation of being superior in beauty and durability to any others They will be sent by mail, FREE, on receipt of price.

☞ FINE ALBUMS MADE TO ORDER. ☜

CARD PHOTOGRAPHS.

Our Catalogue now embraces over FIVE THOUSAND different subjects, to which additions are continually being made of Portraits of Eminent Americans—viz., about

100 Major-Generals,	100 Lieut.-Colonels,	550 Statesmen
200 Brig.-Generals,	250 Other Officers,	130 Divines,
275 Colonels,	75 Navy Officers,	125 Authors,
40 Artists,	125 Stage,	50 Prominent Women.

3,000 Copies of Works of Art,

including reproductions of the most celebrated Engravings, Paintings, Statues, etc. Catalogues sent on receipt of stamp. An order for One Dozen PICTURES from our Catalogue will be filled on the receipt of $1 80, and sent by mail FREE.

Photographers and others ordering goods C. O. D., will please remit twenty-five per cent. of the amount with their orders.

☞ Soldiers' Pocket Albums for 18 pictures, 75 cents.
☞ The price and quality of our goods cannot fail to satisfy.

VALUABLE HOLIDAY GIFT-BOOKS!

The only Authentic and Official History of the Great Campaign.

I.

THOROUGHLY REVISED BY GEN. SHERMAN, AND PUBLISHED UNDER HIS SANCTION,

60,000 COPIES ALREADY SOLD,

SHERMAN AND HIS CAMPAIGNS.

By Col. S. M. BOWMAN and Lieut.-Col. R. B. IRWIN. 1 vol. 8vo, 512 pages, cloth, $3 50.

WITH SPLENDID STEEL PORTRAITS OF

Major-Gen.	SHERMAN,	Major-Gen.	SCHOFIELD,
"	HOWARD,	"	SLOCUM,
"	LOGAN,	"	BLAIR,
"	DAVIS,	"	KILPATRICK,

And Maps, Plans, etc.

II.

PUBLISHED UNDER GEN. GRANT'S SANCTION.

GRANT AND HIS CAMPAIGNS.

By HENRY COPPEE, A.M.,

Editor of the "United States Service Magazine."

WITH SPLENDID STEEL PORTRAITS OF

Lieut.-Gen.	U. S. GRANT,	Major-Gen.	SHERMAN,
Major-Gen.	MCPHERSON,	"	THOMAS,
"	MEADE,	"	SHERIDAN,
"	ORD,	"	RAWLINS,

And Maps, Plans, etc., etc.

1 vol. 8vo, 500 pages, $3 50.

C. B. RICHARDSON, PUBLISHER,
540 Broadway, New York.

English Magazines, Newspapers, and Periodicals.

WILLMER & ROGERS,

47 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

(ESTABLISHED 1844),

Supply on Subscription every Magazine, Newspaper, or Periodical published in Great Britain or on the Continent of Europe.

PRICE-LIST FOR 1866 NOW READY.

DORE'S ILLUSTRATED DANTE.

This Day is received, per late steamer,

THE INFERNO.

(VISION OF HELL.)

By DANTE ALIGHERI.

Translated by H. F. CARY, and illustrated with the designs of M. GUSTAVE DORE, with Critical and Explanatory Notes, Life of Dante, and Chronological View of his Age.

Complete in one volume, Imperial folio, cloth, extra gilt.

This magnificent edition contains the 70 illustrations of M. Gustave Doré, executed with a power, grandeur, and mastery over every element of terror and piety that places the artist almost on a level with the poet whose "world-renowned" work he illustrates. The resources of wood engraving were never before illustrated by any designer, the effects produced by this wonderful artist being altogether novel and unprecedented. As an illustrated volume of the highest graphic art it has never been equalled.

For Sale by SCRIBNER & CO.,

Importers and Agents for English Publishers,

124 GRAND ST., BROOKS' BUILDING, CORNER BROADWAY.

SCRIBNER & CO. have also received a small supply of

THE HOLY BIBLE,

(La Saente Bible), with GUSTAVE DORE'S Illustrations, consisting of

TWO HUNDRED AND THIRTY FULL PAGE DRAWINGS AND SEVEN HUNDRED ORNAMENTAL DESIGNS.

The production of these wonderful designs has occupied M. DORE for a period of four years. The cost of the designs and engraving alone is upward of $150,000.

A CHOICE COLLECTION of FINE ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED and EMBELLISHED BOOKS, including many now first offered, for sale by SCRIBNER & CO.

Catalogue on application.

Take the Best!

MOORE'S RURAL NEW YORKER,

THE GREAT AGRICULTURAL, LITERARY, AND FAMILY WEEKLY.

Ably conducted and finely printed and illustrated. Adapted to the whole country. Largest circulating journal of its class in the world. Only $3 a year; $2 50 to clubs. Great inducements (Cash Premiums, etc.) to Club Agents, and one wanted in every town. Now is the Time to Subscribe and form clubs for Vol. XVII., 1866. Webster's New Illustrated Dictionary (price $12) given to every person sending 20 new subscribers at club rate! Specimens, Bills, Premium Lists, etc., sent free.

Address

D. D. T. MOORE,

Rochester, N. Y.

FINANCIAL REVIEW.

NATION OFFICE, Monday Morning, Dec. 18, 1865.

THE importations of foreign goods at this port last week were again over six million dollars in gold—so far in excess of the exports of produce and merchandize that the specie export advanced to nearly $1,500,000. Exchange advanced ¼ per cent., and, though bankers' bills are still quoted from ¼ to ⅜ per cent. below the figure at which importers can remit specie in payment of their liabilities, it is obvious that a few more weeks of steadiness in the gold market will lead European manufacturers to press for settlements, and in that event a marked advance in exchange and a liberal export of bullion would be sure to follow. A large class among the importers believe in the ability of the Treasury Department to reduce the premium on gold, and are using their credits instead of paying their debts to the other side. As soon as these parties become convinced that no material decline in the price of specie is to be expected, they will enter the market as buyers, and it may be expected that exchange will rule at 109¾ to 110, and that specie will go out at the rate of over two millions per week.

Money is abundant at the financial centres, the rates being 6 to 7 per cent. for call loans. Mercantile paper is not easy of sale. Bankers and financial men are generally unwilling to let their money pass out of their control until Congress has determined the policy of Government. Fair paper is selling at 15 per cent. per annum. At the West, the announcement of the Secretary of the Treasury to the effect that contraction is to be his policy has already begun to bear fruit; three heavy failures at Chicago and one at St. Louis were announced last week. Private letters announce that further failures will ensue during the winter if money should become scarcer than it is. The grain speculators of the West have undertaken an enterprise which the entire banking capital of the United States would hardly suffice to carry to a successful issue; with the limited resources of the Western banks alone to rely upon, they can hardly hope to escape failure. They will succeed in making bread dear for the people of the seaboard States throughout this winter. But when the spring comes, let them look to themselves. Produce paper is already selling at 20 per cent. in Wall Street. The pork crop promises to be both large and excellent in quality; a little increased activity in money would operate severely on the price.

The following table will show the course of prices during the week in the stock, money, gold, and exchange markets:

	Dec. 9.	Dec. 16.	Advance.	Decline.
United States Sixes of 1881	107⅜	107⅞	⅜	....
5-20 Bonds, old	102⅜	103⅞	1½	....
5-20 Bonds of 1865	99⅝	100	⅜	....
10-40 Bonds	91¼	91⅞	⅝	....
7-30 Notes, second series	96⅞	97¾	⅞	....
New York Central	96¾	96⅜	....	⅜
Erie Railway	92½	93¾	1¼	....
Hudson River	108¾	109½	1¼	....
Reading Railroad	117¼	107ex d.	....	....
Michigan Southern	74⅜	75⅝	1¼	....
Cleveland and Pittsburg	93¼	92⅝ex d.	3⅛	....
Chicago and North-Western	35¼	36½	1¼	....
" " " Preferred	63¼	62⅝	....	⅝
Chicago and Rock Island	105¾	108	2¼	....
P., Fort Wayne and Chicago	105⅛	105¾	⅝	....
Canton	45⅛	45⅛	....	....
Cumberland	43⅛	44¾	1¼	....
Mariposa	14¼	15⅜	1⅛	....
American Gold	144¾	145⅞	1⅛	....
Bankers' Bills on London	109⅛	109⅜	¼	....
Call Loans	7	7	....	....

The course of prices was uniformly upward last week, the only exceptions being New York Central, which was unfavorably influenced by the report elsewhere mentioned, and which sold down at one time to 95¾; and North-west Preferred, which was depressed to 91½ by the official announcement of the passage of the fall dividend. Governments of all classes were in active demand. Five-Twenties, old, sold as high as 104, and 92 was at one time paid for Ten-Forties. Speculators in Governments affect to discredit altogether the Treasury Department scheme of contraction, and predict that, under the influence of the steadily expanding volume of national currency, Seven-Thirties will command a premium within sixty days. The issue of national bank paper last week was over $4,000,000, swelling the aggregate issue to $230,000,000. The largest advance among the railway shares was in Pittsburg, which is being manipulated with a view to corner the "shorts;" it sold on the closing of the books at 88, dividend off; rose rapidly to 93, and closed on Saturday at 92⅝. As a 4 per cent. stock it is, of course, not worth any such price; but if the short interest be large enough, it may be forced ten or even twenty per cent. higher. Erie rose last week to 94, in spite of some receipts from abroad. This stock is also in good demand among the bears; it is generally lent "flat." Rock Island has been taken in hand by a new bull clique, and has been handled with considerable vigor; sales were made on Saturday at 108¼. The earnings of the road, as of most Western lines, show a decline as compared with those of last year. Among practical railway men a general decline in prices is looked for, on the ground that receipts are likely to fall off, and expenses to advance, or, at least, to remain stationary. It is commonly asserted that for four or five years to come the leading lines will not do as well for their shareholders as they did in 1864. But, on the other hand, the current of Wall Street speculation is unmistakably set toward higher prices, and all experience teaches that when speculation sets in a given direction, considerations of intrinsic value seldom avail to resist the tendency. In the first two months of 1858 a rampant bull speculation was witnessed in Wall Street, though the earnings of the railways were steadily declining, and many of the leading roads were gravitating toward bankruptcy.

Four railway dividends were announced last week: the Reading 10 per cent. in cash or stock, at the option of the stockholder; the Michigan Central and Illinois Central, 5 per cent. each; and the Fort Wayne, the usual quarterly dividend of 2½ per cent. Litigation can hardly fail to ensue from the terms of the Reading dividend. No limit of time is fixed by the company to the option granted to stockholders. The latter in part enjoy a perpetual "call" on the company for stock at par. In April, 1864, Reading sold at 160. It may sell at that figure again. Under the circumstances, stockholders who can afford to wait will probably decline to exercise their option, and will hold it over the head of the company for an indefinite period. An attempt is being made by the two Boards of Brokers to compel buyers of Reading on options to make their election, when they receive their due-bills, whether they will take their dividend in stock or cash. But it is clear that no man can be compelled to part with a valuable privilege against his will, and this pretension of the brokers will be overset the moment it appears in the courts. The Michigan Central dividend is 1 per cent. less than usual.

The annual report of the New York Central Railroad has been published. It shows the capital stock and debt to stand as follows, as compared with the corresponding period of last year:

	Oct., 1864.	Oct., 1865.	Increase.
Capital Stock	$24,386,000	$24,591,000	$205,000
Debt	13,211,341	14,627,442	1,416,101

The cost of the property has thus been increased $1,621,101 during the year. The earnings, gross and net, compare as follows for the past two years:

	1864.	1865.	Increase.	Decrease.
Gross Earnings	$12,997,889	$13,975,524	$977,635	....
Expenses	9,346,184	10,882,358	1,536,174	....
Net Earnings	3,651,705	3,063,166	....	$558,539

The report has discouraged many holders of the stock. In some quarters it is alleged that the figures have been "cooked," with a view to further applications to the Legislature for a removal of existing restrictions on passenger fares. But the advance in the cost of labor and materials within the past two years is so notorious that the request, unfavorable as it is, may still be quite honest. Everything has increased in price in this country except railway travelling; no wonder that the railways begin to show Flemish accounts.

Attention is directed to the extraordinary decline in Nevada—or Washoe—gold mining stocks. These stocks are, for the most part, held in the Atlantic States. During the war, when they paid their dividends in gold, many capitalists in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia put money in them as a hedge against the currency. According to the best information which could then be obtained, the mines were in a reliable productive condition, and no material diminution of their monthly dividends was to be apprehended. At that time Gould & Curry was about $2,000 per foot in gold—it had sold at $7,000 per foot—Yellow Jacket $2,400, and so on. Three months ago the mines suspended dividends, and a decline began, which has gone on until Gould & Curry has been quoted at $650, Yellow Jacket at $250 per foot, and so forth with the other stocks. Considerable irritation is felt among holders in the Atlantic States, and the conduct of the California managers of the mines has been the subject of severe comment. A meeting of parties concerned in Washoe stocks will probably be called at an early day, with a view to the appointment of a commission to visit the property, and report whether or no the mines are a total swindle.

CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD

STATE AID BONDS.

Interest at the rate of

SEVEN PER CENT. PER ANNUM IN GOLD,

Payable Semi-Annually.

GUARANTEED AND PAID BY THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA.

The Bonds are secured by a mortgage on 160 miles of road, from Sacramento to the California State Line, forming part of the great Pacific Railroad Route, adopted and aided by the United States Government. They are further secured by a Sinking Fund of $50,000 in gold per annum, reserved from the earnings of the road, and pledged for their redemption. They are a first-class security in every respect, and a limited amount will be offered upon terms which render them a very attractive and desirable investment.

For further particulars inquire at our Office, No. 5 NASSAU ST.

FISK & HATCH, BANKERS.

THE

MORRIS FIRE AND INLAND INSURANCE COMPANY

COLUMBIAN BUILDING, 1 NASSAU STREET.

JUNE 1, 1865.

AUTHORIZED CAPITAL, $5,000,000.

CASH CAPITAL, PAID IN, AND SURPLUS, $885,040 57.

POLICIES OF INSURANCE AGAINST LOSS OR DAMAGE BY FIRE
Issued on the most Favorable Terms.

WM. M. WHITNEY, Secretary. B. C. MORRIS, President.

GIFTS FOR CHRISTMAS AND NEW YEAR'S.

The interchange of presents among friends is the very surest cement of friendship. To confer a gift proves forethought, a desire to please, to serve, to be useful to a friend. Every one desires to be thought of by his or her friends when absent. To provide a present for a friend who is at a distance, is the most certain proof that you are thinking of that person.

If to think of our friends' present tastes, when at a distance from them, is to show a sincere concern for them, how much more strongly would this concern be manifested if we showed that our interest in them extended away into the future, and provided not for their mere personal gratification, but for their permanent welfare.

No better time could be chosen for advancing the generous principle of Life Insurance as applied to a provision for a wife or family.

If you stand in the relation of parent, can you manifest your affection for a married son or daughter better than by presenting him or her, as a gift, with the means of effecting a Life policy, for the protection of the young family?

If you stand in the relation of a wealthy brother or friend, can you not find an opportunity of making such a gift in a manner that will render it an acceptable compliment and an enduring benefit?

THE UNION MUTUAL

is one of those well-established and prudently managed Life Insurance Companies which distinguish this nation for enlightened benevolence, practical wisdom, and disinterested philanthropy. It offers superior advantages to the life-insuring public. It is based upon fundamental principles of soundness, and gives abundant security in large accumulated funds. Through the admirable economy of its management large dividends are secured to policy-holders. It is prompt in payment of losses, and accommodates the assured in the settlement of their premiums in life policies, by receiving a note for one-half, when the premium amounts to over $30.

THE UNION MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

This is one of the oldest wholly Mutual Life Insurance Companies in the United States, and has been uniformly successful, having always made large returns in Cash dividends to all the policy-holders.

NEW YORK OFFICE, 151 BROADWAY.
J. W. & H. JUDD, GENERAL AGENTS.

HOME
INSURANCE COMPANY
OF NEW YORK,
OFFICE, 135 BROADWAY.

Cash Capital, - - - - - - -	$2,000,000 00
Assets, 1st Jan., 1865, - - - -	3,765,503 42
Liabilities, - - - - - - - -	77,901 52

FIRE, MARINE, and INLAND
INSURANCE.

Agencies at all important points throughout the United States.

CHAS. J. MARTIN, PRESIDENT.
A. F. WILMARTH, VICE-PRESIDENT.
JOHN McGEE, Secretary.
J. H. WASHBURN, Assistant Secretary.
W. C. NICOLL, Superintendent Marine Department.

Marine and Fire Insurance.

METROPOLITAN INSURANCE COMPANY,
108 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Cash Capital, - - - - - - - - - - - -	$1,000,000
Surplus, over - - - - - - - - - - - -	400,000

This Company ensures at customary rates of premium against ALL MARINE AND INLAND NAVIGATION RISKS on CARGO or FREIGHT; also, against LOSS or DAMAGE by FIRE.

IF PREMIUMS ARE PAID IN GOLD, LOSSES WILL BE PAID IN GOLD.

The Assured receive 75 per cent. of the net profits without incurring any liability, or in lieu thereof, at their option, a liberal discount upon the premium.

All losses equitably adjusted and promptly paid.

SCRIP DIVIDEND, declared Jan. 10, 1865, FIFTY per cent.

JAMES LORIMER GRAHAM, President.
ROBERT M. C. GRAHAM, Vice-President.
JAMES LORIMER GRAHAM, JR., 2d Vice-President.
HENRY H. PORTER, Secretary.

Where I Can Ensure,

WHAT I CAN ENSURE AGAINST,

AND

WHAT IT WILL COST ME.

I CAN ENSURE IN THE

NATIONAL LIFE AND TRAVELLERS' INSURANCE CO.,

243 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

OPPOSITE CITY HALL PARK,

Authorized Capital, - - - Half a Million,

AGAINST EVERY DESCRIPTION OF ACCIDENTS that can happen to me on Sea or Land.

I can ensure my life on the purely Mutual Plan, either by an Endowment, or a Life Policy, or a Ten-year Non-forfeiture Policy.

$25 secures a General Accident Policy for $5,000, with a Weekly Compensation of $25.

$10 secures a Marine Policy for $10,000 for a voyage to any European port, covering loss of life at sea from accident.

$167 35 per annum secures an Endowment Policy for $5,000, with profits payable at the age of 50, or at death to a person 25 years of age.

$96 90 per annum secures a Life Policy for $5,000, with profits, to a person 25 years of age. A Loan of one-third of the Premium, or Life, or Endowment Policy will be given, if required, without note.

POLICIES ISSUED AT ONCE.

NO MEDICAL EXAMINATION REQUIRED for General Accident Policies.

FIRST CLASS FIRE INSURANCE

ON THE PARTICIPATION PLAN.

MARKET FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY,

37 WALL STREET, CORNER OF JAUNCEY COURT.

CONDITION OF THE COMPANY.

ABSTRACT OF THE ANNUAL REPORT OF DEC. 31, 1864.

TOTAL ASSETS	$414,729 18
Viz.—Bonds and Mortgages	$134,672 00
Temporary Loans	92,630 00
Real Estate	10,000 00
100 Shares Mer. Ex. Bank	5,000 00
Government Sec., value	144,514 00
Cash on hand	18,042 34
Interest due	3,085 58
Premiums due	6,785 26
PRESENT LIABILITIES	$15,995 92
NET SURPLUS	198,733 26

This Company will continue, as heretofore, to insure respectable parties against DISASTER BY FIRE

At fair and remunerating rates; extending, according to the terms on its Policies, the advantage of the

PARTICIPATION PLAN OF THE COMPANY,

pursued by it for several years past, with such great success and popularity, and profit to its customers: whereby

(75) SEVENTY-FIVE PER CENT. (75)

of the Profits, instead of being withdrawn from the Company in Dividends to Stockholders, is invested as a "SCRIP FUND," and held for greater protection of its Policyholders; and Scrip, bearing interest, is issued to Customers therefor: thus, IN THIS COMPANY, those who furnish the business, AND PAY THE PREMIUMS, derive the largest share of advantages; and when the accumulations of the SCRIP FUND shall exceed

FIVE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS,

the excess will be applied to PAY OFF the Scrip IN CASH in the order of its issue.

☞ The liberal and prompt adjustment of Claims for Loss, WHEN FAIR AND SQUARE, is a specialty with this Company.

NOTE.—This Company does not insure on the hazards of RIVER, LAKE, or INLAND NAVIGATION; confining itself strictly to a legitimate FIRE INSURANCE BUSINESS.

ASHER TAYLOR, President.

H. P. FREEMAN, Secretary.

BROWN, BROTHERS & CO.,

56 WALL STREET,

Issue, in New York, Circular Credits for Travellers, available in any part of the world

NIAGARA FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY,

OFFICE, 12 WALL STREET.

CASH CAPITAL INCREASED TO	$1,000,000
SURPLUS, JAN. 1, 1865,	275,253

Losses equitably adjusted and promptly paid.

CHARTERED 1850.

Cash Dividends paid in fourteen years, 248 per cent.

P. NOTMAN, Secretary. JONATHAN D. STEELE, President.

PHENIX INSURANCE COMPANY,

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

OFFICES, 1 COURT STREET, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

" 139 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

CASH CAPITAL	$1,000,000 00
ASSETS	1,500,000 00

Insurance against Loss by Fire, Marine, Lake, Canal, and Inland Transportation.

STEPHEN CROWELL, President. EDGAR W. CROWELL, Vice-President

PHILANDER SHAW, Secretary.

Insurance Scrip.

WILLIAM C. GILMAN,

46 PINE STREET, NEW YORK,

BUYS AND SELLS INSURANCE SCRIP.

E. W CLARK & CO.,

BANKERS AND BROKERS,

35 SOUTH THIRD STREET, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS AND TREASURY NOTES, CERTIFICATES OF INDEBTEDNESS, QUARTERMASTERS' VOUCHERS, COMPOUND INTEREST NOTES.

STOCKS and BONDS of all kinds BOUGHT and SOLD on COMMISSION.

HOFFMAN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Office, 161 Broadway, New York.

Cash Capital, - - - - - - - - - - $200,000

JOSEPH W WILDEY, Secretary. WILLIAM B. DIXON, President.

FOURTH NATIONAL BANK,

27 & 29 PINE ST., NEW YORK,

Has for sale U. S. 7 3-10 Notes, all sizes; also, One Year Certificates and all other Government Loans.

P. C. CALHOUN, President.

ANTHONY LANE, Asst. Cashier. B. SEAMAN, Cashier.

SERPENTS DE PHARAON,

OR,

SERPENTS' EGGS.

The scientific Miracle of the Age! On lighting the cone, a small snake uncoils itself.

"They are truly marvellous and apparently inexhaustible."—London Times.

Wholesale and Retail by OLDEN & SAWYER, 246 Canal Street, New York.

Price 50 cents a Box, mailed free. A liberal discount to the trade. Agents wanted.

Economical Housekeepers Use

PYLE'S SALERATUS. | PYLE'S O. K. SOAP.
PYLE'S CREAM TARTAR. | PYLE'S BLUEING POWDER.

Articles designed for all who want the best goods, full weight. Sold by best Grocers everywhere. Each package bears the name of JAMES PYLE, Manufacturer, New York.

The Scientific Miracle of the Age.

PHARAOH'S SERPENTS.

"The lovers of the curious will be highly amused at its appearance."—Scottish American.

TWO IN A BOX. 50 CENTS. (Mail free.)

London Stereoscopic and Photographic Company, 579 Broadway.

JAMES L. WARNER, Manager.

Liberal discount to the Trade.

BOYNTON'S FURNACES.

Boynton's Brick and Portable Furnaces, Fire-place and Parlor Heaters, Kitcheners, Ranges, Parlor and Office Stoves, are warranted o give satisfaction. Send for circular.

RICHARDSON, BOYNTON & CO.,

234 Water Street, near Beekman, New York.

KEYS'

AMERICAN UNION WRITING FLUID,

AND COPYING INKS.

THE CHEAPEST AND THE BEST.

Always clean, and flowing freely from the pen, these inks are rapidly taking the place of all others, and merit the special attention of the penman.

On trial they will be found superior in every respect to the imported inks now in use.

REEVES & CO.,

(Successors to J. G. Keys,)

MANUFACTURERS AND SOLE PROPRIETORS,

303 Washington Street (near Reade), N. Y.

The Fourth Exhibition in New York

of FRENCH, ENGLISH, and FLEMISH PICTURES is open daily from 9 A.M. to 5 P.M., and on Monday and Thursday evenings from 7 to 10, at the Studio Building, 15 Tenth Street. F. J. PILGERAM, Secretary.

E. GAMBART, Director.

WILLIAM KNABE & CO.'S

Celebrated Gold Medal

GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT

PIANOS.

These instruments have been for thirty years before the public, in competition with other instruments of first-class makers. They have, throughout that long period, maintained their reputation among the profession and the public as being unsurpassed in every quality found in a first-class Piano.

650 BROADWAY,

AND

CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE, CHICAGO, ILL

J. BAUER & CO., Agents.

SPECIAL GOLD MEDAL.

(From Watson's Weekly Art Journal.)

AWARDS TO MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—A Gold Medal was awarded, at the late Fair of the American Institute, to CARHART, NEEDHAM & CO., for the best Reed Instrument on exhibition—a most just testimonial.

"They are an exceedingly good substitute for an Organ, and I can speak of them in the highest terms."
GEO. W. MORGAN.

"I have found them to be the finest Instruments of the class I ever saw." GEO. F. BRISTOW.

"They are entitled to be ranked as the first and best among instruments of their class." WM. A. KING.

"The tone is incomparable, and they are far in advance of any other instrument of a similar kind."
CHARLES FRADEL.

THE PARLOR ORGAN,

with the recent improvements of Mr. J. Carhart, is, without exception, far superior in QUALITY, POWER, SWEETNESS, VARIETY and EXPRESSION OF TONE, DURABILITY OF CONSTRUCTION, ELEGANCE OF CASE—POSSESSING IMPROVEMENTS APPLIED BY US ONLY.

A Descriptive Catalogue and Price List sent by mail.

CARHART, NEEDHAM & CO.,
97 East Twenty-third St., New York.

PIANOS.

RAVEN & BACON'S PIANO-FORTES.

(ESTABLISHED 1829.)

A full assortment of these Instruments, which have been well known in the New York market for more than thirty years, constantly on hand. We are continually adding improvements to our Pianos, and our facilities enable us to furnish them at terms and prices satisfactory to purchasers. Pictorial circulars sent by mail.

Wareroom, 135 Grand St., near Broadway, New York.

The Horace Waters

Grand, Square, and Upright PIANOS, MELODEONS, HARMONIUMS, and CABINET ORGANS. Wholesale and retail, at reduced prices. To let, and rent allowed if purchased. Monthly payments received for the same. Second-hand Pianos at bargains, prices $60, $75, $100, $125, $150, $175, $200, and $225. Factory and Warerooms, 481 Broadway. Cash paid for second-hand Pianos.

COOKING AND HEATING BY GAS.

EAGLE GAS COOKING STOVES AND RANGES,

GUARANTEED TO BAKE PERFECTLY.

HEATING STOVES, GUARANTEED TO HEAT ROOMS PERFECTLY.

Also,

KEROSENE OIL COOKING STOVES,

The best in market, have regular SIDE OVENS, and guaranteed to BAKE PERFECTLY, and not to Smoke or Smell.

EAGLE GAS STOVE MFG. CO.,
474 Broadway, N. Y.

☞ Illustrated Catalogues sent free.

ESTABLISHED IN 1823.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT PIANOS.

At the Great Mechanics' Fair, held in Boston in October, 1865, Messrs. CHICKERING & SONS were awarded

THE FIRST GOLD MEDAL

For the BEST GRAND PIANOS.

The FIRST SILVER MEDAL
For the BEST SQUARE PIANOS.

The FIRST SILVER MEDAL
For the BEST UPRIGHT PIANOS.

This Fair called forth an UNUSUAL COMPETITION—35 Pianos being represented. The report of the judges is very thorough and very decided on the merits of the CHICKERING PIANO.

THE MICHIGAN STATE FAIR, of 1865, awards Chickering & Sons THREE FIRST PRIZES.

THE INDIANA STATE FAIR, of 1865, awards Chickering & Sons THREE FIRST PRIZES.

THE IOWA STATE FAIR, of 1865, awards Chickering & Sons TWO FIRST PRIZES.

THE WISCONSIN STATE FAIR, of 1865, awards Chickering & Sons TWO FIRST PRIZES.

FOURTEEN FIRST-CLASS GOLD AND SILVER MEDALS IN THE MONTHS OF SEPTEMBER AND OCTOBER, 1865.

Making a total of FIFTY-FIVE PRIZE MEDALS awarded to CHICKERING & SONS, as

FIRST PREMIUMS OVER ALL COMPETITION for the SUPERIORITY OF THEIR PIANOS.

OPINIONS OF EMINENT ARTISTS.

THALBERG.

"I consider Chickering & Sons' Pianos, beyond comparison, the best I have ever seen in America."

GOTTSCHALK.

"I consider Chickering & Sons' Pianos superior to any in the world."

WEHLI.

"I believe that, in every particular, your Pianos are superior to any I have ever seen in this country or in Europe."

SATTER.

"For volume and fine quality of tone, with nicety of articulation, the Chickering Pianos are unequalled."

BASSINI.

"I always use and always recommend your Pianos to my pupils and friends."

MUZIO.

"I consider your Pianos the finest I have ever played upon."

Watson's Art Journal, of November 11, in its criticism of Mme. Abel's concert, says: "Madame Abel performed on the new Chickering Grand, which took the Gold Medal at the Fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanics' Association, held at Boston last month.

"IT IS THE NOBLEST INSTRUMENT WE EVER HEARD IN A CONCERT-ROOM.

"Grand in power, without noise; capable of sustaining any amount of forcing, without losing the rich purity of its tones; clear, bright, and beautiful throughout the entire range, every tone is a pearl of sound, sympathetic and vocal as the finest human voice cultivated to the highest point of perfection."

AGRAFFE BRIDGE.

Pianos with or without the Agraffe Bridge, which we have constantly used for the past twelve years.

WAREROOMS.

652 BROADWAY, N. Y.
246 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.
914 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

GROVER & BAKER'S

SEWING MACHINES

WERE AWARDED THE HIGHEST PREMIUMS
At the State Fairs of

New York,	Illinois,	Virginia,
New Jersey,	Michigan,	N. Carolina,
Vermont,	Wisconsin,	Tennessee,
Pennsylvania,	Iowa,	Alabama,
Ohio,	Kentucky,	Oregon,
Indiana,	Missouri,	California,

And at numerous Institute and County Fairs, including all the Fairs at which they were exhibited the past three years.

The GROVER & BAKER ELASTIC-STITCH SEWING MACHINE is superior to all others, for the following reasons:

1. The seam is stronger and more elastic than any other.
2. It is more easily managed, and is capable of doing a greater variety and range of work than any other.
3. It is capable of doing all the varieties of sewing done by other machines, and, in addition, executes beautiful embroidery and ornamental work.

GROVER & BAKER S. M. CO.,
495 Broadway, New York.

THE BEST SEWING-MACHINES IN THE WORLD.

THE WEED MACHINES,

With all their valuable improvements, entirely overcome all imperfections. They are superior to all others for family and manufacturing purposes, simple in construction, durable in all their parts, and readily understood. They have certainty of stitch on all kinds of fabrics, and are adapted to a wide range of work without change or adjustment, using all kinds of thread. Will hem, fell, bind, gather, braid, tuck, quilt, cord, and, in fact, do all kinds of work required by families or manufacturers. We invite all persons in search of an instrument to execute any kind of sewing now done by machinery to inspect them, and recommend all parties engaging in the sale of sewing-machines to make sure they secure the best by examining the WEED before purchasing. They make the shuttle-stitch, which cannot be excelled for firmness, elasticity, durability, and elegance of finish. They have received the highest premiums in every instance where they have been exhibited in competition with other standard machines. The company being duly licensed, the machines are protected against infringements or litigation.

Reliable agents wanted, to whom we offer great inducements. Every explanation will be cheerfully given to all, whether they wish to purchase or not. Descriptive circulars, together with specimens of their work, will be furnished to all who desire them by mail or otherwise.

WEED SEWING-MACHINE CO.,
STORE, 506 BROADWAY, N. Y.

FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE CO.,

505 BROADWAY, N. Y.

THE BEST FAMILY MACHINE IN THE WORLD.

Wonderful REVERSIBLE FEED MOTION. SELF-ADJUSTING Tension. No Snarling and Breaking Threads. FOUR distinct Stitches.

WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES,

625 BROADWAY, N. Y.,

MAKE THE

LOCK-STITCH,

and rank highest on account of the elasticity, permanence, beauty, and general desirableness of the stitching, when done, and the wide range of its application.—Report of American Institute.

FINKLE & LYON'S

IMPROVED

LOCK-STITCH SEWING-MACHINE.

N. B.—Money refunded if the Machine is not preferred to any in market for family use.

AGENTS WANTED. 538 Broadway, N. Y.

Lock-Stitch Sewing Machines

FOR FAMILIES AND MANUFACTURERS.

THE HOWE MACHINE COMPANY,

ELIAS HOWE, Jr., Pres.,

629 BROADWAY.

Agents wanted.

SCHOOL FURNITURE!

Lecture-Room and Sabbath-School Settees

IN EVERY STYLE,

MANUFACTURED BY

ROBERT PATON,

24 GROVE STREET, NEW YORK

DEMULCENT SOAP,

FOR CHAPPED AND TENDER HANDS,

FOR TOILET AND BATH USE.

MANUFACTURED ONLY BY

J. C. HULL'S SON,

32 PARK ROW, N. Y.

Upwards of 100 styles of Toilet and Staple Soaps. For sale by all Dealers.

Pacific Mail Steamship Company's

THROUGH LINE

TO CALIFORNIA,

TOUCHING AT MEXICAN PORTS,

AND CARRYING THE U. S. MAIL,

Leave Pier No. 42 North River, foot of Canal Street, at 12 o'clock noon, on the 1st, 11th, and 21st of every month (except when those dates fall on Sunday, and then on the preceding SATURDAY), for ASPINWALL, connecting, via Panama Railroad, with one of the Company's steamships from Panama for SAN FRANCISCO, touching at ACAPULCO.

DECEMBER.

1st.—HENRY CHAUNCEY, Captain Gray, connecting with CONSTITUTION, Captain Farnsworth.

11th.—ATLANTIC, Captain Maury, connecting with GOLDEN CITY, Captain Bradbury.

21st.—NEW YORK, Captain Horner, connecting with COLORADO, Captain Watkins.

Departures of 1st and 21st connect at Panama with steamers for SOUTH PACIFIC PORTS. Those of 1st touch at MANZANILLO.

Through Passage Rates, in Currency.

	First Cabin,	Second Cabin,	Steerage,
On Steamers....	$325.	$225.	$100.

Panama Railroad ticket invariably $25 additional, in currency.

A discount of ONE-FIFTH from steamers' rates allowed to second-cabin and steerage passengers with families.

One Hundred Pounds Baggage allowed each adult. Baggage-masters accompany baggage through, and attend to ladies and children without male protectors. Baggage received on the dock the day before sailing, from steamboats, railroads, and passengers, who prefer to send down early.

An experienced Surgeon on Board. Medicines and attendance free.

A steamer will be placed on the line January 1, 1866, to run from NEW ORLEANS to ASPINWALL, via HAVANA.

For Passage tickets or further information apply at the Company's ticket office, on the wharf foot of Canal Street, North River.

F. W. G. BELLOWS, AGENT.

Improvements in Piano-fortes.

One of the simplest and most truly valuable improvements yet made in the Piano-forte is that invented and patented by

DECKER BROTHERS, 91 BLEECKER STREET,

in this city. By correcting the only imperfections arising from the use of the full iron-plate, and that, too, by not detracting in the slightest degree from its many positive advantages, the Messrs. DECKER have developed in their instruments a tone at once admirable for its purity, fulness, prolongation, and sweetness, and the high estimation in which their improvement is held is well shown in the rapidly increasing business of their firm.—Tribune.

MARVIN'S

PATENT FIRE AND BURGLAR SAFE.

Superior to any others in the following particulars
They are more fire-proof.
They are more burglar-proof.
They are perfectly dry.
They do not lose their fire-proof qualities by age.
Manufactured only by

MARVIN & CO., 265 Broadway.
721 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

Send for a descriptive Circular.

ONE PRICE ONLY.

Writing Paper cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Envelopes cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Blank Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Memorandum Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street
Pens and Pencils cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Pocket-Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Portfolios cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Cash Boxes cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Stationers' Tinware cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Account Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Black, Blue, and Red Ink cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau St.
Arnold & Boss's Fluid cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau St.
Scrap Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.

EDWARDS'S WHITE SUGAR-CURED

WASHINGTON HAMS

w ready for sale.

Name branded in full.

ALSO ALL KINDS OF SMOKED MEATS.

GEORGE W. EDWARDS,
227 and 229 Christie Street, N. Y.

AMERICAN WATCHES.

J. H. JOHNSTON & CO., 150 BOWERY, N. Y., sell at lowest rates

American Gold and Silver Watches,
English Lever Watches,
Fine Swiss Watches.

The handsomest Detached Lever Watch in the market for $25.

PURE GOLD WEDDING RINGS.

Fine Jewelry, diamonds, silver ware, and best quality silver-plated ware of our own manufacture.

Articles sent free of expense to all parts of the country, and satisfaction guaranteed.

Bradbury's Pianos "the Best."

Pronounced "THE BEST" by the most renowned artists. "SUPERIOR in tone, touch, power, DURABILITY, and elegance of finish." Warerooms 425 and 427 Broome Street, corner of Crosby. Call or send for circular.

WM. B. BRADBURY.

WILLIAM SELLERS & CO.,

1,600 HAMILTON STREET, PHILADELPHIA,

MACHINISTS', FOUNDERS', SMITHS' and BOILER-MAKERS' TOOLS.

SHAFTING, with Ball and Socket Bearings and Double Cone Vice-Couplings, admitting of the easiest possible adjustment.

A complete assortment of PULLEY and WHEEL PATTERNS, from which Castings or finished work will be furnished.

RAILWAY EQUIPMENTS, TURNING and TRANSFER TABLES, and PIVOT BRIDGES.

Sole Manufacturers and Licensees of
GIFFARD'S INJECTOR,
For Feeding Boilers.

WILLIAM SELLERS. JOHN SELLERS, JR.

MAKE YOUR OWN SOAP WITH

B. T. BABBITT'S
Pure Concentrated Potash,
OR READY SOAP-MAKER.

Warranted double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other saponifier or lye in the market. Put up in cans of one pound, two pounds, three pounds, six pounds, and twelve pounds, with full directions in English and German for making Hard and Soft Soap. One pound will make fifteen gallons of Soft Soap. No lime is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest Potash in market.

B. T. BABBITT,
64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington st., N. Y.

PHELPS, DODGE & CO.,

Importers and Dealers in

TIN-PLATE, SHEET-IRON, COPPER, BLOCK-TIN, WIRE, AND METALS GENERALLY;

Manufacturers of

COPPER, BRASS, and WIRE,
19 and 21 Cliff st., New York.

COLLEGE HILL MILITARY SCHOOL,

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.

OTIS BISBEE, A.M., PRINCIPAL.

"The Poughkeepsie College Military School paid a visit to this city yesterday (April 3). The pupils were uniformed in blue military style, and numbered between fifty and sixty in line. It was a beautiful affair, witnessed by thousands, many of whom are of the opinion that the cadets are under better discipline, and, in the military exercise, far superior to the celebrated Chicago Zouaves who visited our city some years ago."—Albany Express.

"Yesterday afternoon (April 3) the College Hill Cadets, of Poughkeepsie, visited our city on a pleasure excursion, and for the purpose of paying their respects to the Governor. After the review the Governor briefly addressed them. He said he was glad of the opportunity to welcome the company to the Capital of the State, and thank them for their visit. He was glad of this evidence of the success of the teachers, and the proficiency of the taught."—Albany Evening Journal.

JOHN V. FARWELL & CO.,

WHOLESALE

DRY GOODS AND NOTIONS,

42, 44 & 46 WABASH AVENUE,
CHICAGO,

AND NO. 5 COLLEGE PLACE, NEW YORK.

DECKER & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS OF PIANO-FORTES,

419 BROOME STREET,

One Block East of Broadway, N. Y.

These Pianos stand unrivalled in regard to their singing quality; volume and purity of tone; sympathetic elastic, and even touch; and durability of construction, which enables them to remain in tune much longer than ordinary Pianos.

JESSUP & MOORE,

27 NORTH SIXTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
128 WILLIAM STREET, NEW YORK,

PAPER MANUFACTURERS,

Have on hand, or make to order at short notice, all qualities of Book and News Printing Papers at current market prices.

UNITED STATES STEEL PEN WORKS,

FACTORY, CAMDEN, N. J.

R. ESTERBROOK & CO.,

STEEL PEN MANUFACTURERS,

WAREHOUSES, { 403 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia. / 42 JOHN STREET, New York.

Samples and prices on application. Lots made to order of any pattern or stamp required.

CAUTION.

These Pens are of genuine American manufacture, and equal in finish, elasticity, and fineness of point to the best imported. They are, therefore, sure to gain the confidence of the American public. The fac-simile of our signature is sufficient security against foreign imitation.

R. ESTERBROOK & CO.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

OF THE OLD STANDARD QUALITY.

TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Warranted.

or Descriptive Name, and Designating Number.

New Series, Good and Cheap, from No. 700 to No. 761.

TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Birmingham. With Designating Numbers.

For sale by

JOSEPH GILLOTT & SONS,
91 John Street, New York.

HENRY OWEN, Sole Agent.

FRANCIS & LOUTREL,

45 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK,

STATIONERS, STEAM PRINTERS AND BLANK-BOOK MANUFACTURERS,

Supply everything in their line at lowest prices. Every kind of Writing Paper, Account Books, Fancy and Staple Stationery, Diaries for 1866, Expense Books, etc. Orders solicited.

The Nation.

VOL. I.—NO. 26. THURSDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1865. { SIX DOLLARS PER ANNUM / SINGLE COPIES, 15 CENTS

CONTENTS.

THE WEEK 801
MINOR TOPICS 804
Is the President Mistaken? 806
Mr. Sumner on "Whitewashing" 806
The West Point Military Academy 807
Ymir: Poetry 809
CORRESPONDENCE:
Ireland's Wrongs 809
The Sovereignty of the States 810
The South as It Is 812
England 813
The English of the Newspapers 814
LITERATURE:
Literary Notes 815
Bosh for Boys 816
Brownell's War Lyrics 816
FINE ARTS:
American Pictures on Exhibition 819
Music.—Musical Talk 820
FINANCIAL REVIEW 823

Six Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Four Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, PUBLISHER, 130 NASSAU STREET, N. Y

The Week.

SENATOR WILSON has introduced a most important bill for the enforcement of the second clause of the Constitutional Amendment, providing for the protection of all inhabitants of every State without distinction of race or color. If this should be passed, and made operative as regards Chinese and Indians in California and other frontier States, not only would a great deal of outrageous cruelty be prevented, but one most potent promoter of barbarism in new communities, the presence of a large body of outlaws, on whom robbery and murder may be perpetrated not only without punishment, but without even public reprobation, would be removed.

MR. THADDEUS STEVENS made an elaborate speech last Monday in favor of treating the States lately in revolt as Territories, until such time as the rest of the country shall consider it safe to re-admit them to the Union; in favor of which plan Mr. Stevens said much, and said it well. But then his rhetoric is often rather strong meat for babes, as when he compares the Southern States to "the conquered cities of Latium." Upon the sentence at the close, in which he expressed his belief that the late Chief-Justice Taney was condemned for the Dred Scott decision "to everlasting fire," we can hardly trust ourselves to comment. Many people will be ready to believe that a person who uses such language in a debate is hardly in a fit state of mind to legislate either for "the conquered cities of Latium" or of any other state or territory.

MR. SUMNER made last week an attack on the President, which was to say the least in very bad taste. We have commented on it at some length elsewhere. Mr. Sumner, when facing the "lords of the lash," in the Senate, did not like being disposed of by epithets and abuse. Has he lost that love of the propriety of debate for which he was then so great a stickler?

THE announcement of the ratification of the Constitutional Amendment was most important as an official proclamation to the world that slavery had de jure as well as de facto ceased to exist in the United States. But it would have been very much more welcome to a large portion of the public if it had not contained an acknowledgment of the legal standing in the Union of the States lately in revolt. No harm would have been done by waiting till Congress had fairly passed on this question before issuing the proclamation, for Congress has certainly something to say about it.

MR. WASHBURNE'S bill to create a new military grade for the benefit of Gen. Grant, suggests many objections that might be urged against it. It is an unnecessary compliment or reward to one who is already facile princeps. It involves the promotion of some subordinate who may neither by merit nor popularity deserve to be made Lieutenant-General. It is opposed to public economy, inasmuch as it provides, without sufficient cause, for a salary quite equal to that of the Commander-in-chief. And, lastly, it offers a perpetual temptation to merge the two offices, if only out of parsimony, and convert the General into a President. Without abating one jot of the gratitude or admiration which the great captain has fairly won, we cannot persuade ourselves that the republic has failed to honor him sufficiently in both respects.

MR. DOOLITTLE has introduced a most sensible bill with regard to the qualifications of jurors in the United States courts, abolishing the absurd rule which makes an intelligent and honest man incompetent to try a prisoner if he has, in this age of newspapers, heard of his crime, or expressed any opinion about his guilt.

THOMAS CORWIN died on the 18th. He was one of the best and brightest of that wonderful race of big-brained men whom the West is now contributing to the national politics, and who may be fairly said to constitute a new and most potent agent in shaping the national destinies. They are the first real apostles of democracy the world has seen.

THE Tribune, though usually a sober-minded paper, and remarkable for plain, vigorous, and unadorned English, seems to have been completely upset by the news of the ratification of the Constitutional Amendment, and allowed some wild scribe, in an article on the "End of Slavery," to call Christmas "the great anniversary of the human soul," to make slavery "fetters on the commerce and industry of the South," which first "corroded her religion" and then "ate out her manhood like a canker." "Fetters" like these are not often met with. "Slavery," according to the same authority, has "died violently of its own venom"—one of the oddest deaths we ever heard of; and what makes the occurrence all the stranger is, that we are told in the same sentence that "the garment" of the defunct "is pollution." The condition of the South, as described by the writer, is, we confess, to us inexplicable, for he says, "The past is a wall to her and a Golgotha; the future is illimitable and full of life, unless she strives against her own soul to lead a life of oppression in the suicide of virtue." The behavior of "the past" to her in being both "a wall and a Golgotha" is certainly very embarrassing; but there is clearly much for her to look forward to in the future if she avoids that singular "life in the suicide of virtue." Under all the circumstances, however, we confess we hardly know what to advise.

THE Postmaster-General has addressed a circular to the railroad managers, calling their attention to delays which occur on the various lines, owing to the practice of loading passenger and mail trains with freight. We doubt if it will make much impression. Railroad managers are used to mere remonstrances. If the Postmaster-General could and would impose a penalty for all avoidable delays in mail trains, some good might be accomplished; but what chance is there of this?

A REIGN of terror appears to have begun in West Tennessee; at least notices to quit have been served on ex-officers of the Union army, threatening horrors dire in case of refusal. The recipients have called Governor Brownlow's attention to the matter. If anything of this kind is attempted, there could not be a more effectual remedy than to quarter troops in the district in which the outrage is committed, at the expense of the inhabitants. The incident suggests some dismal forebodings as to the future position of Northern men in the "reconstructed South."

RECONCILIATION of the Emperor of the French and his cousin, the Prince Napoleon, is one of the early probabilities. The prince has written a very friendly letter to M. Rouher about general politics, and saying nothing of that unhappy speech at Ajaccio, in Corsica, which caused all the trouble; and an interchange of affectionate letters has taken place between the Empress and the Princess Clotilde.

A CONVENTION representing France, Belgium, Switzerland, and Italy has met in Paris, to promote a monetary unity between those countries. In all the franc is already the standard piece, but it is now proposed to coin in the different countries francs of the same intrinsic value; and it is said that France will make overtures to other countries to establish the franc as the universal standard. With the United States little difficulty is apprehended, the dollar being already so nearly a piece of five francs; and the adhesion of America once obtained, that of England and other countries of Europe would soon follow, it is expected.

Two French engineers are about to leave Paris for Judea, where they are about to direct the construction of a railway already commenced there. Think of a railway in the Holy Land, says the Indépendance Belge; of Bethlehem station, and the Golgotha refreshment rooms!

VERDI is in Paris, and is said to be writing a new opera for the story of the drama, "Marion Delorme." Now it is declared that Madame Ristori has not consented to come to America, as reported, but has, decidedly, refused the most tempting inducements.

THE publication of the second volume of Napoleon's life of Cæsar will probably be delayed until April, the author desiring to make some important modifications according to fresh documents.

THE party in Spain most favorable to the war against Chili is that of absolutist and clerical principles. The complaints of this party (according to the Journal des Débats) against the republics of South America are much the same as Lamartine's against the United States. The Chilians are "proud, brutal, demagogic, and, worse than all, ungrateful to Spain, who has taught them to know the true God, and the benefits of civilization."

PRUSSIA continues to bully the smaller German States. Having failed to secure the co-operation of Austria in her purpose of restricting the right of meeting in the free city of Frankfort, it is now declared that she will proceed alone to carry it out, and will act without respect to the Federal Diet.

THE Gazette of Bavaria makes official announcement of the early recognition of the kingdom of Italy by the Bavarian Government. Bavaria is moved to this step by the fact that nearly all the European powers, except Austria, have already taken it, and by the wish to protect and foster the numerous commercial and industrial relations of the Bavarian and Italian peoples. It is said that a treaty of commerce between Italy and the Zollverein will soon be concluded.

AUSTRIA seems to enjoy a momentary tranquillity in the possession of Venice, if we may judge from the fact that she is reducing her army in Venetia. This, however, was to be expected as soon as Austria began to feel secure in Hungary.

IT is rumored that, after the coronation of the Emperor of Austria as King of Hungary, he will nominate his brother, the Archduke Charles Louis, as Palatine.

WHILE the Federal Council of Switzerland is considering important changes of constitution, the Swedish Diet is discussing projects of reform, which tend to modify the whole internal polity of the realm. The Diet is now composed of four orders, representing the nobility, inheriting their places; the clergy, hereditary legislators in part and in part elective; the burgesses, elective; and the peasants, elective. It is proposed to abolish this system of representation, and reduce the number of houses in the Diet one half. The burgesses and peasants favor the change; the nobles are nearly divided; the clergy is flatly opposed, because the right to clerical representation will be denied by it.

ON the 10th of January, the Swiss people will vote for or against the changes proposed in the federal constitution. At Bâle a public meeting of those opposed to the amendment has been held, and has passed a Bundesverfassungsverwerfungsvolksversammlungsbeschluss, or resolution of the people's assembly rejecting the revision of the federal constitution.

ONE of the questions of public interest which will come before the Hungarian Diet is the emancipation of the Jews in Hungary from the political disabilities under which they now labor. They are nearly a million in number, monopolize the important commerce, and have always been noted for their patriotism and fidelity to the cause of Hungarian nationality.

ACCORDING to the Nazione, of Florence, the chief features of the clerical reform in Italy will be the sale of all ecclesiastical property, and the conversion of the proceeds into rents, from which the archbishops, bishops, canons, and priests will receive fixed incomes. The colleges, dioceses, and parishes will be diminished.

A MASONIC lodge in Palermo has excommunicated the Pope! This action was taken in retaliation for the fulminations against freemasonry launched from the Vatican. The brothers of the Palermo lodge declare that "a man named Mastai Ferretti once received the Masonic baptism, and swore love and fraternity to the Masons, and that afterwards this man was created pope and king under the title of Pius IX."

IT is rumored, upon fair authority, that Prince Humbert, heir-apparent to the Italian throne, will espouse Maria, Princess of Russia.

THE Turkish Government has responded favorably to the French proposition for assembling a congress at Constantinople to consult as to the best means of preventing the inroads of the cholera hereafter. It is probable, however, that the Dervishes, and the more fanatical of the population, will oppose any sanitary measure which shall interfere with the annual pilgrimage to Mecca.

CONGRESS.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 23, 1865.

THE third week of Congress closes with little actual legislation accomplished, but with much light thrown upon the temper and principles of the legislators. It is already apparent that there is a clear and reliable majority of both Houses who will resist any re-admission of the late rebel States to representation in Congress until firm security for the rights of the freedmen is obtained. Much has been said and predicted of the "conservative" temper of the Senate, as a check upon the more pronounced "radicalism" of the House. But there are not so many as ten out of the thirty-eight Union Senators who manifest any tendency to accept anything short of absolute certainty on this point. Enough votes have already been taken to be decisive of this.

Two most important measures have already passed the House. One was the bill of the Committee on Commerce guaranteeing to all railway companies equal rights to carry freight and passengers from one State to another, thus ensuring freedom of transit and destroying such odious monopolies as the Camden and Amboy tax upon through travel. This owes its speedy passage partly to a happy suggestion in the President's message, and partly to the fact that one-half the present House are new members, upon whom the powerful lobby influence has as yet had no effect. The same measure, now carried by a majority of 42, passed the House last session by the narrow majority of six, and was lost in the Senate by postponement. It will go through this time, however. The other decisive vote had in the House was that adopting a proposed Constitutional Amendment prohibiting the United States, or any State, from paying any debt incurred in aid of rebellion. Although this strikes a hard blow at the State-rights heresy, it passed by a vote of 150 to 11, the majority of Democratic members manifesting, by voting aye, either a hopeful sign of political regeneracy, or else a hopeful respect for the force of public opinion.

Besides these formal acts of legislation, several declaratory resolutions of great significance have passed the House. One of these reaffirms the validity of the test oath and pronounces against its being dispensed with. It passed by the heavy majority of 93. Another, declaring it to be the duty of Congress to "realize and secure the largest attainable liberty to the whole people of the Republic, irrespective of color or race," was adopted by 71 majority. A third, declaring against the power of Congress to extend the elective franchise, was voted down by 65 majority.

The speeches of Messrs. Stevens and Raymond upon reconstruction were neither so comprehensive nor so able as was expected from the previous reputation of the speakers. It is manifest that neither gentleman can claim to be decisively the leader of any considerable portion of the House.

Mr. Sumner's exposé of the outrages perpetrated upon the freedmen and the disloyal spirit that prevails so widely in the South, was chiefly documentary, and, for that reason, the more effective. But the unskilfulness of his exordium, dealing so liberally in hackneyed epithets and slang phrases, was fairly amenable to criticism. The gauntlet is now thrown down between the champions of the "reconstructed" South and those who believe that regeneration should go before reconstruction. To the dictum of the President, "We must trust the South," the firm answer is returned by Mr. Sumner and many others, "The South cannot yet be trusted."

Some of the more advanced in opinion among Congressmen express themselves warmly against the President's action in withdrawing provisional governments and restoring complete civil power into the hands of recently elected rebel officials in several States. That this is done by the President and his Secretary of State pending a solemn official investigation by Congress, through its joint committee of fifteen, into the whole question of the condition and rights of the Southern States, is complained of as a close approach to usurpation. Some members say that Congress might just as well adjourn sine die and go home, if this policy is to be the order of the day.

The passage of the bill conferring suffrage upon the colored men in this District is regarded as certain. The "election," yesterday, to take the sense of the white people of the District upon it, resulted in the polling of 6,603 votes, out of a population of 100,000. As the friends of equal suffrage did not vote at all, the result was a foregone conclusion, and will, of course, have no influence upon Congress.

DIARY.

Monday, Dec. 18, 1865.—In the House, Mr. Baker's resolution declaring that, in restoring the States lately in rebellion, the largest attainable liberty should be secured to the whole people, irrespective of color, was referred to the Joint Committee on reconstruction, the House having previously refused to lay it on the table by 35 ayes to 106 nays. Mr. Washburne offered a bill to repeal the fishing bounties. Referred. A resolution declaring against any extension of the elective franchise by act of the President or of Congress was laid on the table—ayes 111, nays 46. A resolution that the test-oath of July 2, 1862, is of binding force and should in no case be dispensed with, was adopted, the House previously refusing to table it by a vote of 32 to 125. The House passed the Senate resolution to devote the 12th of February to a commemoration of Abraham Lincoln, an address to be delivered before both Houses by E. M. Stanton. Also passed a bill to pay Mrs. Mary Lincoln the sum of $25,000, previously rejecting an amendment for $100,000. The Judiciary Committee reported bill extending the right of suffrage in the District of Columbia; made a special order for January 10. A resolution pledging the House to the contraction of the currency and resumption of specie payments as soon as the business interests of the country will permit, was passed—yeas 144, nays 6. A bill to enable loyal citizens in late rebel States to form a constitution and State government preparatory to admission to the Union, was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

In the Senate, a bill appropriating half a million dollars for the relief of destitute Indians was passed. House bill, appropriating $30,000 for refitting the President's house, was passed. A resolution was passed looking to protection of manufactures in cases where the internal revenue tax exceeds the duty, exchange, and expense of importation on the foreign article.

Dec. 19.—In the Senate a message from the President was read, giving a highly favorable account of the attitude of the late rebel States toward the general Government, and enclosing reports from Carl Schurz and Lieutenant-General Grant of their own observations in the South. Mr. Sumner compared the message to that of President Pierce "whitewashing" the enormities in Kansas, in 1856, whereupon Senators Dixon and Doolittle warmly defended the President from the charge of "whitewashing" the South. The President also submitted the report of Major-General Howard, Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau.

In the House Mr. Banks offered a resolution as to the expediency of establishing military and naval schools in every State. Referred. The House passed a bill authorizing all railroad companies in the United States to convey freight, passengers, etc., on their way from any State to another State, thus virtually repealing all monopoly of transit granted by existing State laws. The vote was ayes 93, nays 51. A resolution submitting to the States a constitutional amendment, prohibiting the payment, either by the United States or by any one of the States, of debts incurred in aid of rebellion against the United States, was passed, ayes 150, nays 11.

Dec. 20.—In Senate, House bill appropriating $25,000 for Mrs. Mary Lincoln was passed. Mr. Wilson's bill to maintain the freedom of the inhabitants of the States lately in rebellion was taken up, when Mr. Sumner spoke at length in its favor, declaring the necessity of protection to the freedmen, speedy and effective, at the hands of the federal Government. He quoted numerous testimonies from travellers, etc., in the South to prove that great outrages and abuses exist. Mr. Cowan replied, asserting that Mr. Sumner's authorities were ex parte and prejudiced, as well as isolated instances, while the testimony of General Grant and of the President was on the other side. The bill was laid over.

In the House a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint Assistant Assessors of Internal Revenue was passed. Mr. Jenckes offered a bill establishing a Civil Service Commission, whose duty it shall be to examine and judge of the qualifications of candidates for office under the federal Government. Referred. Mr. Banks offered a resolution that the reporters of the official proceedings of the House in the Congressional Globe be declared officers of the House, to be appointed or removed only with the Speaker's approval. The House refused to order the previous question on the resolution, ayes 53, nays 74. Credentials of G. H. Kyle, a representative from Arkansas, were referred to the Joint Committee on Reconstruction. Mr. Stevens offered a bill doubling pensions of sufferers by the war, and to pay them, as well as damages done to loyal men, out of the confiscated property of the enemy. Referred. Mr. Stevens presented credentials of H. C. Warmuth, as delegate from the "Territory" of Louisiana, backed by 19,000 voters. Referred to Joint Committee on Reconstruction. The Senate bill for relief of destitute Indians was passed. The Senate concurrent resolution looking to reduction of internal revenue tax on manufactures whenever such tax exceeds the duty, exchange, and freight upon similar articles imported, was adopted. Mr. Stevens's resolution was adopted directing the Superintendent of the Freedmen's Bureau to report whether lands confiscated and allotted to freedmen have been restored to rebel owners, and by what authority; also, under what authority traitors' property vested in the United States under the confiscation act was taken from the United States and bestowed on conquered enemies. The decease of O. Kellogg, representative from New York, was announced, and eulogies pronounced.

Dec. 21.—In the Senate, the following were appointed as members, on the part of the Senate, of the Joint Committee on Reconstruction: Messrs. Fessenden, Grimes, Harris, Howard, Johnson, and Williams. Mr. Sumner presented a petition from 280,000 colored citizens of Tennessee against the admission of Senators and Representatives from that State as now organized. Also, a petition from colored citizens of the District of Columbia, in presenting which Mr. Sumner said, "The whites of the District of Columbia, in respect to the colored people, are no better than squatters, and it is our duty to dispossess them." Mr. Howard presented a petition of 3,740 colored men of South Carolina, asking for the elective franchise. All these petitions were referred to the Joint Committee. Mr. Wilson offered a bill to carry out the second clause of the Constitutional Amendment. It declares void all laws maintaining inequality of civil rights, and entitles all inhabitants of every State, without distinction of color, to make and enforce contracts, sue and give evidence in courts, hold property, and be secured in person and estate. Referred to Judiciary Committee. Mr. Howard's resolution, asking the President to inform the Senate upon what charges Jefferson Davis is imprisoned, and why he is not put upon his trial, was adopted. Mr. Wilson made a speech in defence of his bill annulling the cruel and oppressive laws of late rebel States regarding freedmen. He declared that the President had acted differently from his own views, but had done nothing which should prevent Congress from going straight on, securing the results of the war, and putting their feet on all reaction and conservatism. Adjourned until January 5.

In the House, Mr. Alley offered a resolution looking to the establishment of a national system of telegraphing, to be, like the mails, under exclusive control of the Post-Office Department. Referred. Mr. Voorhees (Dem.) offered resolutions approving the President's message and policy. Postponed to January 9. Mr. Raymond spoke at length in reply to Mr. Stevens's views on reconstruction. He said the late rebel States are and always have been in the Union, and did not forfeit their State existence by rebellion; that the conquest we have achieved is a conquest over the rebellion, and not over the States concerned in it; that he would exact from them all needful guarantees for future loyalty and protection of the freedmen, but would not visit confiscation or other penalties upon them.

Adjourned until Jan. 5.

THE FREEDMEN.

GEN. HOWARD'S report falls naturally into the four main divisions of the Bureau, and treats of lands, records, finance, and medicine. The number of acres, cultivated and uncultivated, now in possession of the Bureau is 768,590, while the number restored to the original owners after pardon or on proof of loyalty is 88,170. Out of the 1,596 pieces of town property held at one time, 1,177 have been likewise restored. Only about one five-hundredth of the entire amount of land in the insurrectionary districts has ever been controlled by the Bureau, and if it had been partitioned as was proposed among the freedmen, less than an acre would have been the share of each family. The Commissioner's special visit to the Sea Islands, by order of the President, was unproductive of results, except constituting boards of supervisors, each representing the Government, the planter, and the freedman, for the adjustment of contracts and cases of difficulty. In his report of Nov. 24, Gen. Howard recommended the purchase of the lands embraced in Sherman's S. F. O., No. 16, with a view to their rental and subsequent sale to the freedmen; and in that of Sept. 4 he had suggested that the pardon of rebels worth more than $20,000 should be on express condition of their giving in fee-simple to each head of family among their former slaves a homestead of from five to ten acres, to be secured against alienation during the lifetime of the grantee.

Under the title of "records" the report narrates what has been done by the Bureau towards encouraging and regulating free labor at the South; describes its own schools and those of the various benevolent associations of the North; and accounts for quartermasters' supplies, transportation, etc. The receipts of the Bureau, from various sources, have amounted to $907,396, and the expenditures to $478,363. The available balance on hand on the 1st of November was $313,796. The estimates for the ensuing year, should the Bureau be continued, are $11,745,050, of which the largest items are commissary stores, sites for school-houses and asylums, transportation, and clothing.

In discussing the steps which have been taken by the Bureau to secure justice to the freedmen, either by separate courts under its special supervision, or by making the civil courts also freedmen's courts, with the consent of the judges, Gen. Howard favors some provision of law extending United States jurisdiction to the freedmen, while they remain wards of the Government. His course has been, without meddling much with subjects like marriage, pauperism, apprenticeships, etc., to apply the State laws for the whites, as far as practicable, to the blacks. "In fact," he adds, "it is the easiest and best way possible to solve every troublesome problem proposed relating to negroes by the time-honored rules established by wise legislation for other people."

Gen. Howard's résumé of his conclusions is as follows:

He believes in the ultimate success of free labor, but urges that every effort be made by the officers of Government and all others concerned to establish confidence between property-holders and the freedmen, or to restore it where it has been impaired. The prejudices of the former, and their want of acquaintance with any other system of labor than that under which they were brought up, have caused quite as much disturbance as the ignorance and suspicion of the laborer. Equality before the law, time, and education, will remove the present obstacles.

The Bureau, or a similar organization, will have to be continued in order—

First, to settle its land business, and keep the national pledges to lessees and contractors.

Secondly, to make the freedom of the blacks an undisputed fact:

"Some guarantee beyond any existing ordinance in any State I visited is essential to secure the actual and continuous protection of life and property to the freedmen. Where legislation is constrained, as it now is in the Southern States, for the most part, from several causes, there is danger of the statute law being in advance of public sentiment, so that where there is the most liberality, ill consequences would be likely to result, if Government protection should be immediately withdrawn."

Thirdly, to promote mutual confidence between planters and laborers, as has already been extensively done through the agency of the Bureau.

Fourthly, to ensure the education of the negroes, to which the majority of the white people are utterly opposed.

Fifthly, to prevent a panic among the freedmen, likely to arise in case the Bureau is discontinued.

Sixthly, to care for the orphan, the aged, and the infirm and sick.

Seventhly, to effect a re-distribution of the colored population, now unnaturally collected in certain localities.

Eighthly, to aid the white refugees through the winter.

Ninthly, to keep Congress and the Executive accurately and constantly informed of the condition of the South.

Tenthly, to encourage immigration thither, and to sustain the Northern men already there who stand in fear of their safety.

The Commissioner is content with the present organization of the Bureau, except in the matter of civil courts and the employment of civil agencies. Some legislation will be needed to provide for the helpless, who no longer have any claim on the support of their masters, and whose natural protectors it would be difficult to determine, owing to the exceeding looseness of the marriage relation. Education for whites and blacks should be placed on a firmer basis than it now is, by using the funds raised during the war, under the Treasury laws, for the benefit of the freedmen to purchase school-sites and buildings, until the people shall be able to re-purchase them. Joint companies ought to be approved which seek to aid the blacks and poor whites in the rental, purchase, and settlement of land. "The rights of the freedmen to rent and purchase real property should be guaranteed to them beyond question." In case the Bureau is continued, its powers and domain ought to be explicitly defined, and the law by which its existence is now limited to one year after the close of the war be thoroughly remodelled.

—Gen. Fullerton's report of his administration of freedmen's affairs in Louisiana will attract much attention. It is in the nature of a defence against the charges of unfriendly, not to say unfeeling and hostile action, which were laid at his door by many at the North. Premising that he found there had been gross mismanagement in the department to which he had been ordered, in consequence of an undue partiality for the freedmen, the general states that the key of his entire conduct is his resolve to obliterate distinctions of color, and to bring both white and black, as far as possible, under the same laws and civil regulations. He found the negroes refusing to work at a critical season, when there was great demand for their labor, under the delusion that land was to be given them by the Government. Mr. Conway's circular to the contrary had little effect, and the general followed it up with one plainer spoken, which was respected. The vagrant law of the State was directed to be enforced in New Orleans against colored idlers, but its application was revoked when it appeared to have been abused. Several colonies which were badly governed and dependent were concentrated in one with the necessary reforms. A pseudo orphan asylum was constrained to dissolve itself. The special freedmen's courts were abolished, because, by State law, all free persons may testify in the State courts. The provost-marshal and other agents of the Bureau were to attend the trial of freedmen, and protect their rights as witnesses. Gen. Fullerton thinks that the freedmen of Louisiana are in a better condition than those of any other State. No able-bodied person need be unemployed, and the disposition of the whites toward them is rapidly improving. Violence is not nearly so frequent as has been represented.

Minor Topics.

THE objective tendencies of our age and country now and then receive amusing illustrations from popular criticism. The last of these has been educed by the re-publication of Swinburne's "Atalanta," and is neither more nor less than an attempt to bring poetry to the practical standard of science, or generalship, or public life. Several discriminating critiques assume that Mr. S. must "get rid of his old classical rubbish" before he can do justice to himself or his readers; and one, on the appearance of "Chastelard," congratulates him upon having taken a step nearer to the present day, as if the treatment of his subjects must grow better in proportion as the subjects themselves grow more modern.

In one sense this is natural enough, for the poet was evidently not speaking to the sagacious in the case of his critics. Yet it is singular, too, that they could talk so with the immense evidence before their eyes how utterly incompetent proximity (even when combined with grandeur) of subject is to furnish poetic inspiration. To say that our recent war, whether considered in its military, its moral, or its political aspect, was one of the grandest series of events the world ever witnessed, is but the merest truism. How much of the "numerous verse" called forth by the occasion has even a remote chance of surviving?

Abroad we find a similar result—or want of result. What lyre did the Crimean war awaken? Of France nothing need be said, for her only real poet is in exile, and her verses, like her pictures, are made to order for the glory of the Emperor and his myrmidons; but England had Tennyson. And Tennyson produced the "Charge of the Six Hundred," one of his least satisfactory efforts. Such parts of "Maud" as had reference to the war were notoriously the worst, while the beauties of that unequal poem celebrate the common accidents of humanity, the joy of meeting a living love, the grief of missing a dead love. But do not contemporary circumstances call forth the poet's genius into activity? Certainly, and it is well worth noting how commonplace, ordinary, trivial—yea, low—these circumstances sometimes are. Burns, riding home from market, stops at an inn and amuses himself with the bar-maid. Multitudes of men riding home have stopped at inns to flirt with bar-maids; probably not a few had flirted with that identical one. Burns quits his Anna to write a delicious love-song. Shelley goes out into the fields and hears a bird sing. How many hundreds and thousands of Englishmen had walked in the fields and heard birds sing! Shelley goes home and composes the most magnificent lyric in the language.

To blame Swinburne for writing about old Greeks is as wise as to blame Shelley for writing about a small bird. Poetry is eminently subjective. The poet looks into his heart and writes. It is because he is a poet, a man with a creative imagination, that small things appear large to him and distant things near, and common things take uncommon aspects. Any other appreciation or explanation of him must end in infinite rubbish. Why did not Goethe write patriotic poems like Körner, instead of laying himself out on all manner of paganism? Because he was Goethe and not Körner; and we may well suspect that, had he undertaken Körner's work instead of his own, he would not have made so much of it. Why does not Swinburne write about Garibaldi and Florence Nightingale instead of Atalanta and Meleager? Because the bent of his genius did not go that way. Why did not our own Longfellow compose war-songs like the Lelands, instead of dipping into the dry bones of Scandinavia? We must still give the same answer; we cannot get behind it; it is like asking quare opium facit dormire, or why John is John and not Peter.

Of course this holds good of true poets only, not of mere versifiers. Probably every man with a fair education, and a certain amount of taste, can hammer out very passable verses; indeed, we may almost say that verse-making is a part of liberal education, like speech-making for men and piano-playing for women. And such a man will be moved to write verse by striking contemporary events, just as he is moved to write prose—a newspaper article, for instance. But we are speaking of real poets.

Rev. Mr. Frederick Theodore Winkelman, professor of languages in a New Jersey institution of learning, died the other day, leaving effects of which the examination accounted for the mysterious disappearance of the jewelry, watches, and best clothes of many of the pupils. Pawn-tickets for most of these things were found among the professor's papers, and proof in his own handwriting that he had purloined them. In fact, he kept a diary, in which he set down, with great minuteness, the dates and circumstances of the thefts committed, and stated what disposition he had made of his prey in each case. By means of this journal the police were able to go to the pawnbrokers' and recover part of the stolen goods.

Altogether, Prof. Winkelman seems to have been a remarkable man, not only in the constitution of mind which enabled him to commit thefts and conceal them, for that is common enough; but in the peculiar candor and freedom with which he wrote, from day to day, the story of his rascalities. No doubt there must have been a kind of terrible satisfaction to him in contemplation of the fact that such an infamous reprobate as he could so skilfully present himself to the world as never to provoke suspicion, and we can fancy the learned professor taking an almost objective interest in his rogueries, and enjoying the study of a character so anomalous as his own. The perusal of the occurrences recounted in his diary might have had for him the flavor and excitement of a Spanish picaresque novel. Indeed, is not the spectacle delicious? A Lutheran minister of the Gospel, employed to teach the humanities in a college, filches the trinkets and fine clothes of the boys and pawns them, continuing in this course unsuspected for a year, and yet keeping about him, in writing, the means of instant discovery and disgrace! There is a fine spirit of adventure in the thing, and, on the whole, we cannot wonder that it should have amused the reverend professor. After stealing certain waistcoats and watches, he writes in his journal: "They have sent a policeman to search for the watches; he will find them: oh yes—perhaps!" At another time he records: "Half-past nine o'clock P. M., drank a bottle of wine;" adding, with exquisite satisfaction, "stole it!" Here is all the lawless delight for the Rev. Mr. Winkleman which the minister in the "Scarlet Letter" pictured to himself when tempted to pop into the ear of the poor old dame, desiring to talk with him about heaven, some atheistic blasphemy, or when counselled by the Evil One to rap out a wild seafaring oath in the presence of the godly Puritan children. Is it not human to exult in a fine misdeed for a while?

Yet, in writing a diary, it must have required a vast degree of moral force to set down the facts which Mr. Winkelman states so simply and nakedly; for every one who has attempted to keep one of those foolish and lying records of his daily life knows how difficult it is to tell the truth in them. The wonder is that Mr. Winkelman, instead of saying, on such a night, "Drank a bottle of wine; stole it," should not have written: "Reflected, after drinking a bottle of wine, upon my life since this night last year, and regretted that but slight improvement had taken place in my character. (Mem.—To take some religious newspaper.) The wine which I found in the cellar was, doubtless, placed there, with a number of other bottles, for my use by the good principal of the institute. Read a chapter in the 'History of the Reformation.'" Instead of the fact concerning the watches and waistcoats as he has set it down, it is almost superhumanly strange that he did not put it: "They tell me that the police are looking for the time-pieces which the former owners evidently intended me to have regulated at the pawnbroker's. I most earnestly hope that no innocent person will be suspected of stealing these watches."

Few men, indeed, can be expected to arrive at Winkelman's terrible sincerity. We cannot suppose that a skilful financier will ever come to jot down in his note-book: "Sold Jones those worthless Honolulu oil-shares; a most shameful swindle;" or that a merchant shall record: "Got rid of those moth-eaten upholstery goods at twice their original cost. Transaction worse than a highway robbery." A capitalist will hardly write, "Grinding the faces of the poor all day;" nor a physician, "Committed a horrible piece of malpractice on Smith in setting his leg. He thinks he may be able to use it; oh, I wish him luck of it!" Suppose a young lady described what base artifices she used to wheedle her papa out of money; or that a wife should betray to her diary the awful secret of the stratagems she used to make her husband buy her a fifty-dollar bonnet! Suppose that a clergyman should confess how slightly his Sunday's sermon differed from one of Blair's; or that a journalist should keep a diary testifying to his consciousness of writing the vilest rubbish every day; or that a politician should daily record his knowledge that he was a ridiculous humbug!

Clearly, the whole thing is impossible, and we do not know that so great truthfulness as the Professor Winkelman's is even desirable. Society is held together by illusions which men cannot safely dispel. A certain amount of self-deception and deception of others seems to be the normal condition. Besides, it is not by any means certain that all of us could have the fortitude to contemplate such witness to our daily meanness and wickedness as Professor Winkelman kept about him. An unwritten conscience is bad enough, heaven knows, and we want no staring black and white one, lest some weak brother be maddened by the history of his iniquity and go about seeking to assuage his pain by the accusation of others. We shudder to think, for example, of Robinson collaring Brown on Broadway, and yelling at him: "Brown, you scoundrel, I am the vilest thief and liar on the face of the earth, and so are you, sir, and so are all these miserable swindlers and backbiters and slanderers about us!"

Consider the effect of such a proclamation in such a place! We should all fall upon Brown and tear him to pieces.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

IS THE PRESIDENT MISTAKEN?

THE President, in his message of Tuesday week, assured the nation that in nearly all of the lately rebel States "measures have been adopted, or are now pending, to confer upon the freedmen the privileges which are essential to their comfort, protection, and security." He also testified to the gradual development of systems "under which the freedman will receive the protection to which he is justly entitled, and by means of his labor make himself a useful and independent member of the community in which he has his home." General Howard, on the contrary, informs the Secretary of War that "some guarantee, beyond any existing ordinance in any State he has visited, is essential to secure the actual and continuous protection of life and property to the freedmen."

This rose-colored view from the White House has been applauded and defended by all newspapers and politicians whose business it is to sneeze when the President takes snuff. They have reminded his critics, with a show of indignation, that he knows all the facts, and entertains presumptively the only correct opinion about the condition of the South. Of course, having seconded his plan of reconstruction, they are bound to see nothing but the most admirable results achieved by it. Of course they partake of the confidence with which civil government has been completely restored to Alabama, Georgia, and South Carolina. But men who are not interested in the success of a personal experiment, nor concerned to apologize for every act of the Administration, and are able to balance testimony which is not wholly confined to official channels, will fail to agree with Mr. Johnson in what they will readily admit to be his sincere conviction. The point at issue is not whether progress has not been made in the re-adjustment of society at the South—whether things in that quarter are not better than they were at Johnston's surrender—but whether there exists that laudable desire to be loyal and law-abiding which the President discerns, to a degree which makes it safe for white and black to withdraw the military protectorate from the States; whether "disorders" there are "occasional" and "local," and due to "the demoralizing effects of the war," or whether they belong to the spirit of slavery and rebellion not yet exorcised amongst any considerable part of the population. Though the President is, in theory, the best-informed man in the country, the public, in deciding this question, will attach greater weight to the conclusions of Generals Howard and Grant, who concur in remonstrating against the proposed withdrawal of troops, if only for the sake of the Southerners themselves. The public will even trust its own intelligence, derived from ten thousand private, yet not therefore despicable sources, and will prefer it inevitably to the asseverations of the score or two of pilgrims to Washington in whom the President may be supposed to confide. Gov. Perry's word, for example, in what relates to the present feeling of his fellow-citizens, will be held, deservedly, inferior to that of a commercial travelling agent. Newspaper correspondence excepted, the public are far more likely than the President to receive information that is not "cooked;" and, if they have not all the facts, it is safe to say that they have enough to arrive at a tolerably correct judgment in the premises.

We have only to look at a few of the codes for the freedmen adopted or proposed at the South—codes in themselves odious, because perpetuating an iniquitous civil and social distinction—to differ very materially from the President in his judgment of them. In North Carolina, the Legislature has just adjourned without so much as a bill having been presented for the modification of the State code in favor of the freedmen; and on the same day we were informed by telegraph that two negroes were sentenced to be sold into servitude for larceny, for a period not exceeding seven years! "This sentence," it is naïvely added, "is agreeable to the laws of the State in relation to freedmen before the war." But it is far from agreeable to the Constitutional Amendment which the State had already ratified, and which was certain to become law in a period abundantly short of seven years. With this instance may be fitly collated two similar cases disposed of in the mayor's court at Wilmington, Delaware, on the 12th of October; and, still more recently, the selling of two colored girls in Maryland for two years within the State, and a colored woman for six months out of it.

South Carolina has furnished some of the most atrocious cruelties to the list of those perpetrated upon the freedmen. Her Legislature passed a code for this class by which, when employed, they are to be styled "servants," and their employers "masters." A master "may moderately correct a servant under eighteen years of age;" but if older, the judge may order the sheriff to perform the whipping. Strict regulations for the daily conduct, polite behavior, and locomotion of servants are enacted. The system of written passes is restored. It shall be an infamous crime to hire or harbor servants without their masters' consent. No person of color shall earn his living at a trade, or keep a store, without a license from the district court. A black man or woman convicted before a justice of failing to support self or children, shall be sold to the prosecutor on terms agreed upon by the latter and the magistrate.

Similar provisions about enticing servants are contained in bills introduced in the Alabama Legislature on the 1st inst. It is also provided that, in cases where white persons lease or rent their lands to freedmen, the lessors shall be liable for taxes assessed upon the freedmen, and in all respects the former be responsible for the latter as a principal for his agent. The same body have passed a very stringent vagrant law, establishing houses of correction in every town, where chain-gangs, "reasonable correction," and solitary confinement on bread and water are in order. In case of a second offence, thirty-nine lashes may be visited by a magistrate on the offender. Vagrants may also be hired out for a month for the benefit of the county treasury. Color is not specified in this statute, but must be inferred.

It is needless to cite Mississippi, since the President himself has set aside her legislation by which, among other provisions, the freedmen were absolutely prohibited from holding real estate. She competes with South Carolina in barbarity to the emancipated blacks, and shares with every other Southern State in refusing to admit them to her courts on even terms with the whites.

Such are some of the open manifestations of the mood of "our Southern brethren" in circumstances when they would have been tempted to make a show at least of complete acquiescence in the will of their magnanimous conqueror. If the President sees in them a ripeness for democratic self-government and a social change conferring "essential privileges" upon colored natives, with "protection" to them and to white immigrants, whether capitalists or laborers, we do not. If these disgraceful statutes were more specious than they are—nay, if they both looked fairer and were of fairer intent—we should still be incredulous. There would still remain, as Gen. Howard has pointed out, the "danger of the statute law being in advance of public sentiment," and we should still insist on delay in political rehabilitation.

MR. SUMNER ON "WHITEWASHING."

No explanation that can be found in any dictionary, or offered by Mr. Sumner himself, would render the accusation of "whitewashing" which he brought against the President anything but a charge of moral turpitude. To "whitewash" anything is to cover up dark and dirty places with a thin covering of white, and anybody who does this is unquestionably guilty of a certain kind of deceit, the precise nature of which, however, is to be determined by the result. Ordinary whitewashing of walls, though it undoubtedly involves making things seem clean which are not clean in reality, still wards off disease and delights the eye. But when one "whitewashes" a man, or a cause, or a state of things, he simply endeavors by falsehood or misrepresentation to make impurity seem pure, dishonesty seem honest, violence seem peaceful. Anybody who does this does an essentially base thing, and the results of his baseness are not confined to the particular case in which it is displayed, but are felt through the whole field of morals by confusing men's notions of right and wrong. And yet this is the very thing Mr. Sumner has accused Mr. Johnson of doing. He has asserted, in other words, that Mr. Johnson, knowing well that order was not restored at the South, that the desire for peace and tranquillity did not exist, has declared that they do; that being very well assured that there was no general desire at the South to submit to the laws, has asserted that there was; that he has sought to deceive the Senate and the Northern public upon a matter of such vital moment that it would be difficult to express in words the consequences that may possibly flow from any mistake that may be made in dealing with it.

There is certainly nothing in Mr. Johnson's antecedents to justify anything so unseemly as Mr. Sumner's outburst—for unseemly it was. If there be anything for which the President has acquired an honorable reputation, it is for his truthfulness. He owes almost all the hold he has upon public esteem to the singular frankness and candor with which he has been in the habit of speaking his mind. And what gives this virtue of his a new lustre is, that he has distinguished himself in almost as great a degree as Mr. Sumner himself by speaking his mind before hostile audiences. His career ever since 1860 has certainly not been that of a popularity-hunter. He said disagreeable things, and nothing but disagreeable things, in the Senate in 1860, and down to 1864 led a life in Tennessee which no man would think of leading to whom the expression of his honest convictions was not dearer than all else in life. The idea of a Southern hypocrite playing the loyalist in Tennessee during the first two years of the war is simply ridiculous. And Mr. Johnson's sincerity and truthfulness since his accession to the presidency have been fully as remarkable as before. There have been several things in his policy towards the South open, in our opinion, to exception, but not for any want of good faith revealed in them. In so far as we have taken the liberty of finding fault, it has not been for deceiving, but for being too readily deceived; not for moral but for mental obliquity; not for loving crooked ways, but for sometimes, through what we considered want of perception, getting off the right track. When Mr. Sumner rises in his place in the Senate, therefore, to accuse him of deceit, he is guilty of something worse than indecorum.

How men like Mr. Sumner come to make slapdash charges of this kind, and to treat everybody who differs from them as to the means of reconstruction as morally base, seems to us tolerably clear. During the anti-slavery struggle, the issues involved were almost all moral issues. It was impossible to resolve the question of the abolition or preservation of slavery into a political question simply. There was, no matter what anybody may say, moral guilt in slaveholding, and the slaveholders knew it. The doctrine of the innocence of those who, having been "brought up" to slaveholding, did not see it as Northerners saw it, would convert Thugs into pious and respectable oddities. Upon this point nobody who believes that there is a standard of right and wrong in the world can feel much doubt.

The anti-slavery men were, therefore, quite justified in considering their political opponents as deserving of moral censure, and in looking on the warfare they carried on at the polls or elsewhere as a moral warfare, and their enemies as offenders against the moral law. But when they attempt, as Mr. Sumner and others clearly do, to treat the efforts which are now being made to secure the freedmen in the enjoyment of their rights at the South as simply a continuance in all its incidents of the struggle to secure their emancipation, they are apt not only to do gross injustice to others, but to stultify themselves. The whole question of the reconstruction of society at the South is, as far at least as members of the Republican party are concerned, a question of expediency. All are agreed as to the objects in view. We doubt if there are many to be found in its ranks who do not desire peace and order at the South, and who are not anxious to see the freedman secured in the enjoyment of everything which can conduce to his happiness and moral and mental development. But as to the means of accomplishing these results there is a great variety of opinions; and we make bold to say that there is not one of them which a man may not hold, and be just as honest as Mr. Sumner or Mr. Thaddeus Stevens. A perfectly upright citizen may believe that wholesale confiscation will not subserve to the happiness of either white or colored men at the South. As pure patriots and as good Christians as ever stood upon a platform may, without any loss of purity, hold, with General Grant, that the time has come to restore civil government at the South; and others just as righteous and high-minded may be of opinion that negro suffrage will have to come from the States and not from the general Government; nay, a man may be in every way fit company for the best in the land, and not believe that negro suffrage would be a good thing at all for either blacks or whites. The attempt to make these questions moral questions will, like many other attempts of the same kind, simply injure the cause it is intended to serve, and, while damaging morals, will not help politics.

What makes Mr. Sumner's attitude all the more inexcusable is the variety and multiplicity of the ways in which Mr. Johnson's views on reconstruction may be accounted for without impeaching his honesty. He may, for instance, be as sanguine as Mr. Sumner is desponding. He may have a vast quantity of information regarding Southern temper which Mr. Sumner does not possess, and it may be of a more varied character, or, let us add, he may have much less skill in sifting it. In short, there are a score of ways of accounting for the late message without accusing the writer of dishonesty, and it seems to us that a very ordinary estimate of the force of language, and of the respect due to the personal character even of enemies, ought to be sufficient to save far humbler people than Mr. Johnson from being charged with deceit even by persons as high placed as Mr. Sumner.

THE WEST POINT MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. Banks has carried a resolution for a fresh enquiry into the system of education pursued at our naval and military schools, and the Committee on Military Affairs is charged with the duty as regards West Point. Before the enquiry commences, we wish once more to say an earnest word on this subject to all concerned, and to call the attention both of the committee and the public to certain defects in the school which are patent, some of which the Visitors' last report has touched upon, and all of which ought to be remedied if the school is really meant to be kept up.

Its history has been a strange one. While almost everything else in this country has changed, it has stood the one thing stable. What Colonel Thayer, its real founder, made it fifty years ago, it has since remained. Nor are its merits or defects ever the subject of honest, intelligent criticism. It is rarely spoken of without unqualified blame or unqualified praise. Fiercely and blindly assailed by some, it is as fiercely and blindly defended by others. The failure of McClellan, of Buell, and of a host of subordinates, has never been able to shake the faith of its supporters that every one it educates must necessarily be a master of the art of war. Nor, on the other hand, has all the lustre shed upon it by the successes of Grant and Sherman and Sheridan shaken the conviction of its opponents that it is a useless and expensive burden upon the national treasury. At the beginning of the rebellion, the one side was grievously distressed because some of the graduates went over to the South; the other seemed as greatly distressed because all of them did not go the same way.

It is not the purpose of this article to discuss the effect of West Point training upon the management of our military affairs; or whether the exclusive spirit nurtured by it, which has practically turned the army into a close corporation, has been productive of more good than evil. Its influence controls all the higher appointments in the service; and since this is so, it is desirable to make the best of it by making the school as perfect as possible. There now exist in it grave defects, which must be reformed altogether before it can truly accomplish the objects for which it was founded. These defects exist in the qualifications required for entrance, the system of instruction, and the method of admission.

The first great defect in the management of the Military Academy is the lowness of the standard of qualifications required for admission.

It is a common opinion that West Point is the great mathematical and engineering school of this continent. The assertion is constantly made by the graduates of the Military Academy themselves, and as constantly re-echoed by men everywhere who hardly know enough of mathematics to tell the difference between the cube and the cube root of a quantity. In extent and thoroughness of instruction it ought certainly to have no superior. Its course is longer than that of most scientific schools. It is not dependent upon pupils for support. Its wants are freely and fully supplied by a generous people. Entrance into it is regarded as a privilege. It can and does enforce a discipline which cannot be enforced anywhere else. And in certain special branches of study it is unrivalled; for it has no competitor not laboring under insurmountable disadvantages. But in many others, equally important, the lowness of the standard of admission places it behind some of the most unpretending scientific schools of this country. No clearer idea can be given of the absurdity of the present system and the mischief springing from it, than by a comparison of the Military Academy, on this very point, with either Yale or Harvard, the two leading classical institutions of the United States.

West Point requires of its candidates for admission a knowledge of reading, writing, of the four ground rules of arithmetic, vulgar and decimal fractions, and proportion. This standard was fixed by the Act of 1812, and has never since been changed. An examination upon such a list of studies might, perhaps, have been deemed formidable in the ninth century; in the nineteenth it bears a close resemblance to a farce. The actual number rejected each year rarely exceeds half a dozen; the wonder is how any one, not a natural born fool, can manage to be rejected at all.

Yale requires of its candidates for admission a knowledge of the Greek and Latin languages, which demands at the very least two years of thorough, special, and almost exclusive preparation; in addition to this, a knowledge of English grammar, geography, arithmetic, algebra as far as quadratic equations, and the first two books of geometry. A large number are thrown out every year.

At West Point the candidate must be over sixteen years of age and under twenty-one. The average age of entrance is about eighteen. At Yale the candidate must be over fourteen years of age. The average age of entrance is about seventeen.

The consequence of this low standard of preparation required for the course pursued at the Military Academy is that the first year there is taken up with learning what any industrious, intelligent school-boy knows before reaching the age of admission. The great evil is that, with the exceptions of the tactics and military discipline, those special studies which West Point was founded to teach are crowded into the latter half of the course, and, of necessity, are rapidly hurried over, if not omitted altogether. Yale and Harvard, which are, professedly, classical schools, which devote to mathematics a bare one-third of the time, nevertheless carry their students as far in it the first two years as the professedly mathematical school of West Point. This, it is to be remembered, is in the undergraduate course. But in the special post-graduate schools attached to both of those institutions, the scientific course is carried to an extent that would make a cadet just about to graduate stare and gasp. In fact, the assertion so constantly made of the superior mathematical and engineering education furnished by the Military Academy is the merest twaddle. It is sometimes made by persons who know something about other institutions and nothing about West Point; more frequently by persons who know something of West Point and nothing at all of other institutions; and more frequently still by persons who know nothing of mathematical or scientific education at all.

The Board of Visitors for this year recommend that the standard of admission be raised by the addition of English grammar, descriptive geography, and the history of the United States. The real reform demanded is to make the preparatory studies required for admission at least as high as at other scientific schools. These are, in most, arithmetic, algebra, geometry, and trigonometry. Even to these others should be added, if an acquaintance with some modern language beside the English is not exacted.

The only defence for the present standard of admission is, that a higher one will have the tendency to shut out the children of the poor. This might be an argument, were the Military Academy an almshouse; but even then it would be a worthless one. The literary institutions of our country not only admit their pupils younger, but examine applicants in studies which require years of special preparation for their mastery. Yet there never has been any complaint that the standard of previously acquired knowledge is so high as to exclude the sons of men belonging to the lowest class in life. In fact, the majority of students in our colleges are the children of men in moderate, and many of them the children of men in indigent, circumstances. There is no young man in this country so poor, so friendless, that, if honestly desirous of gaining an education, he cannot master the studies required for entrance into any institution. Better, indeed, that he should wait one year or two years for admission than that the national military school should turn its attention from its special work to give him the elements of a common-school education. Nor even would the occasional rejection of a young man, whose poverty of preparation has arisen from his poverty of pecuniary resources, be any real objection to the reform. The Military Academy was not founded as a grand beneficiary institution for the poor of the United States, but to train first-class officers for the United States army.

The second reform demanded is a more thorough and extensive study of language in the system of instruction pursued.

In the examinations of this year the Board of Visitors remark particularly the want of distinctness and precision of expression, and the abundance of gross errors in grammar and pronunciation. They have not been the first to notice this. Censure on this point has been the one thing which has relieved the general monotonous adulation of these reports. That of 1859 dwells upon the matter with equal grief, surprise, and simplicity. "As stated by former committees," says that report, "there still remain great defects in elocution. A clear and distinct enunciation of well-chosen words, added to the knowledge the cadets now have of the subjects they study, would add more to the reputation of the institution than anything we can now suggest. Nothing is more painful than to see a young man who understands his subject well undertake to demonstrate with his lips almost sealed, and his words unfitly chosen. While the professors and instructors generally are good elocutionists, and express themselves clearly, it increases our surprise that the pupils should be so defective in this respect."

It need not have surprised the committee, had they borne in mind the fact that power of expression is the direct result of the training given by the study of language. The experience of the Military Academy only adds one more proof to the truth of the saying of Goethe, that "he who knows not other tongues, knows nothing of his own."

Unfortunately, the effects of this neglect of the study of language do not confine themselves to the cadets while at the Military Academy. The officers of our army, especially those in high positions, are obliged to write much. The productions of most of them, both before and during the late war, have added no reputation to the service or to the school at which they were educated. So long as they confine themselves to the bare statement of facts and opinions, they are usually respectable, if eminently dry and dull. But when they leave the level ground of simple narration, and venture on more ambitious movements, their failure is conspicuous. With few exceptions, their productions will scarcely stand the fire of five minutes' criticism.

French and Spanish are down in the course at West Point, but the latter is not studied until the last year. German, the language of some of the greatest masters of the art of war, has no professorship there. During the first year English is taught at; it can hardly be said to be taught. Latin and Greek are necessarily excluded from a school where general culture is not so much aimed at as excellence in special departments of knowledge. But there is no reason why the critical study of the tongues named, and more especially of English, should not be carried on so as to secure most of the advantages springing from classical education. But a parrot-like repetition of phrases is not a study in this sense of French or Spanish, nor recitations in Sargent's "Elocution" and Blair's "Rhetoric" a study of English. The whole course should be reformed altogether, for the only real education in the use of their mother tongue the officers of our army now gain at the Military Academy is in the line of profanity.

But the crowning folly, by means of which laborious mediocrity has so long been enabled to usurp the control of our army, lies in the system by which students gain admission to West Point.

By the act of March 1, 1843, the custom hitherto prevailing of appointing one cadet from each Congressional district was made a law. Whenever a vacancy occurs, the representative from the district nominates the candidate for admission, and his nomination is equivalent to an appointment. No other country of Christendom, however despotic, would tolerate for a moment a system so essentially undemocratic, so admirably fitted to defeat the object for which a military establishment exists. No other country, indeed, could afford to tolerate such a system. It is the perfection of the art of "how not to do it."

The idea that the military talent of the country exists in the ratio of one man to a Congressional district merits a patent for novelty. Under the present system, even if the right person were always selected, the objection to it would be no whit removed. But this is notoriously not the case. It is a well-known fact that, nine times out of ten, the appointment is controlled by political influences solely. And were it not, were the representative honestly desirous of selecting the best man, equally in nine cases out of ten he would be unable to do it. He has not the time, the opportunity, and, too often, not the ability to make the investigation required. As it is now, a young man with a natural taste for military life and pursuits has to encounter, in order to gain a military education, a series of unnecessary difficulties, any one of which may, perhaps, be easily surmounted, but which in the aggregate are appalling. He must, in the first place, live in a district where there happens to be a vacancy. In the second place, he must be of the same political faith as the representative. In the third place, he must be a friend of the representative or the friend of his friends. In the fourth place, there must be no competitor the political influence of whose friends the representative dare not disregard. To crown all, if he surmounts these and secures his education and his position in the army, he must, under our system, wait for every imbecile above him to be removed by death or resignation before he can hope to rise in his profession. In this manner ambitious mediocrity has shaped the legislation of the country so as most effectually to shut the avenues to military distinction from men of ability, and open them to those only possessed of political influence.

It is a strange fact that while many professional soldiers admit all the evils of the present system, they declare themselves unable to see any remedy. This only shows more clearly what has been long evident to many, that, whatever reforms are made in the management of our military affairs, they will never spring from within.

The remedy is plain. Follow the example of all the literary and scientific schools of the country. Abolish the whole system of appointments. Throw open the Military Academy to every young man desirous of entering it, with such restrictions as common sense and experience dictate. Make the examination for admission so rigid as to exclude all above a certain number. A military education will then be open to every young man of military tastes without the tedious and disgusting process of currying favor with a political representative. The scientific and engineering talent of the country will be attracted to the Academy, and will not be repelled, as now, by lack of official patronage. The standard of admission can then be so raised as to keep the number of applicants within bounds. As a necessary consequence of this addition to the stock of previously acquired knowledge, a far greater amount of time can be devoted to those important special branches which are now but superficially studied.

YMIR.*

Under the brilliant Arctic morn
In clouds and mist the god was born.

Forth from his icy citadel
Swifter than fleet young Ariel—
Where, near the luminous polar fires,
Ice-cities lift their prismic spires,
Far as, with fierce Berserker wrath,
The North Wind cuts his frozen path—
Wild with mad frolic, looking back
Along his shining, silvery track,
To cot and palace just the same
With cunningest device he came.

Hearing his song about the house,
The sleepers from their dreams arouse:

"I walk the paveless roads of blue,
My art is old, yet ever new;
I revel in the Northern snows,
I ride the North Wind where he goes;
Formed by my word in Arctic skies,
The wondrous realms of Fairy rise.
The hills I robe in garments fair,
My steps I print upon the air;
I wreathe with rime the rocky dells,
Build palaces of icicles;
With feathered lace I glint the snow,
The broad fields glisten where I go,
And, kissed by me, the rainbowed trees
Mate with the gold Hesperides.

"Lonely with leisure, through long Junes
I studied Odin's mystic runes;
So, in the silent hush of night,
Upon the window-pane I write,
In cabalistic syllables,
About the giant Loki's spells;
How Thor his hammer lost and found;
Of Jotunheim's enchanted ground;
What bitter, ceaseless tears were shed
When the dark news through Asgard sped—
'Balder, the beautiful, is dead!'

"But, borrowing Nature's subtle speech,
My words far deeper meanings teach.
Chiefly I show the law that lurks
Within the form whereby she works;
How flowers and rocks divided are
Into the crystal or its star.
I tell by quaint and curious signs
The mystery of the growth of pines;
What threads of gossamer it takes
To weave the leafy ferns and brakes,
More delicate, held to the sun,
Than those which skilled Arachne spun."

Soft soughed the wind, the morning broke,
The sleepers from their dreams awoke.
They see through purple gleams of light
The marvellous magic of the night,
And trace the limner's airy thought
In syllables of silver wrought.
The icy frost-panes, dipped in gold,
Color with truth the fable old,
Where windows of a thousand dyes
Sparkled before Aladdin's eyes,
And of a night's enchantment born
Arose transfigured to the morn!

Joel Benton.

* The Scandinavian Frost God.

Correspondence.

"IRELAND'S WRONGS."

To the Editor of The Nation:

The Nation is so respectable a journal, and is so very fair and candid in its statements and arguments, that I read with some astonishment the following passage in the number for December 14 in reference to Ireland: "The wrongs which alone make English domination odious." Will you kindly specify those wrongs? I have often heard your countrymen talk of the wrongs of Ireland, and always asked them to describe these wrongs to me. I never yet found one who could point out any example of injustice of English rule. Irishmen rise to the highest positions in the state; there is no impediment to their progress at the bar or the other professions—to be sure, we do not make bishops of them often—and in all essential points they live under the same laws as everybody else in Great Britain. But, not to make any statement of my own, will you be so good as to inform me what are the "wrongs" to which you allude? Every just man would use his influence to remedy them, and I am sure English statesmen would be much obliged to you for suggestions, since the standing mystery with reference to Ireland is, that Irishmen are always going about the world whining about their "wrongs," and yet that no one can point out in what they are aggrieved. Pray, sir, clear up this difficulty. It is to America that we all look now for "more light," and you will greatly oblige us all by casting some on the great Irish puzzle.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

AN ENGLISHMAN.

BALTIMORE, 15th December.

[Our correspondent is evidently in the state of mind in which most of the "leaders" in the London Times on Irish questions are written. Irish grievances "bore" him. We are sorry we cannot spare the amount of space necessary to answer his questions. But we will do better, by referring him to a little book in which he will find all that any man needs to know in order to understand the condition of Ireland and what England can do to improve it. We mean Goldwin Smith's "Essay on Irish History and Irish Character." He will there read all we have to say on the subject, and much more, far better said than we could say it. In the meantime, we will mention two wrongs of the first magnitude under which Ireland has suffered for centuries, and which do contribute largely and justly to make "English domination odious." One is the pertinacity with which the English House of Commons assists Irish landlords in maintaining a system of land laws in Ireland which are utterly opposed to the traditions and habits of the people and the requirements of Irish society, and which, as administered, are barbarous and inhuman. The other is the maintenance of a state Church, which is not simply the Church of a small minority, though this would be bad enough, but the sign and memorial of conquest—a Church whose very existence as a political institution is a standing outrage to the population. And we consider the continued and bitter hostility with which the Irish Catholics still regard it as a most encouraging indication of the existence amongst them of a spirit which, in spite of Fenian folly, may yet make a healthy political life possible in Ireland.]

THE SOVEREIGNTY OF THE STATES.

V.

THE STATES UNDER THE CONSTITUTION.

THE first question which suggests itself is, Whether the Constitution is to be regarded as a substitute for the Articles of Confederation, abrogating them altogether, or as only an amendment to them? The former is no doubt the popular, but it is by no means clear that it is also the true legal, view of the matter. In legislation—and neither the Confederation nor the Constitution is anything but a law, enacted by the people instead of the national legislature—a new statute is held to rescind an old one only so far as it expressly repeals it, conflicts with it, or by implication supersedes it. The people which adopted the Constitution were the same people which had previously adopted the Articles. The general objects of both instruments were the same. The specific object of the Articles was to declare and to consolidate the perpetual unity of the nation; the specific object of the Constitution was to secure to the federal Government the powers which it had been found to want, in order to give it efficiency as the organ and minister of the national will. The Constitution nowhere in terms repeals the Articles, or even so much as mentions them; in very many particulars the new instrument does not conflict with the older, but rather requires reference to it as, if not supplementary to its provisions, at least explanatory of the meaning of them. For example, the Constitution is declared by the preamble to be the organic law of the "people of the United States," but it nowhere distinctly appears in the Constitution of what separate organizations the "United States" consisted; for the States are not named or enumerated in it except barely by way of recital in the second section of the first article apportioning representation in Congress. To know, authoritatively, who were the "people," and what was the territory of the "United States," we must refer to the Articles of Confederation, where the States are mentioned by name, as components of the "perpetual Union" declared by the Articles, and as assuming the style of "the United States of America." The Constitution does not give any name to the Union, or, except in the preamble and the attestation by the President, even indicate in what quarter of the globe the new republic is situated; and, of course, it impliedly refers to the Confederation for the specification and definition of its individuality. The preamble declares the purpose of the Constitution to be the formation of "a more perfect union." More is a comparative. "More perfect" than what? Evidently than the Union the perpetuity of which had already been solemnly proclaimed by the Confederation. These instances—and they might be multiplied—suffice to show that the Constitution is in the nature of an amendment to the Confederation, and, of course, that the older articles are in force, except as overruled by conflicting provisions in the newer instrument. The point is, indeed, not important with reference to the principal question we are considering, except as negativing the right of secession by the declaration of the perpetuity of the Union, which is embodied in more than one clause of the Articles. In this light it is of no small moment; for it is upon this alleged right (though disclaimed by Calhoun) that the argument for the sovereignty of the States—a Hibernian, or, in more complimentary phrase, a deductive argument, which begins with the conclusion and reasons back to the premises—has been very often grounded.

But let us proceed to the examination of the legal character of the Constitution. It is contended by very many that this instrument is a contract between the States. It is true that in the confusion of political ideas and of political language so common a few years earlier, the first written organic law describes itself as "Articles of Confederation and perpetual union between the States," which it proceeds to enumerate. But the Revolutionary period was full of political instruction, and in the ten years of fiery trial which elapsed between the two federal organizations, the nation had grown wiser; its statesmen understood better its condition and necessities, and had much clearer and more definite ideas in regard to the force of political phraseology. The framers of the Constitution felt that they were not brokers employed by opposite parties to chaffer a bargain. They knew it was their office to give shape to the utterance of the national will in a declaration of the mode by which the American people chose to govern itself and administer its common interests, and they fortunately committed the drafting of the most important secular written instrument (next to the Declaration of Independence) that ever proceeded from a human pen to one of the greatest masters of language who has employed the English tongue, Gouverneur Morris, a delegate from the State of New York. The Constitution, by the plainest implication, repudiates the character of a contract altogether. Contracts are necessarily between parties. The Constitution recognizes no parties, and but one sovereignty. It is not, as in the Confederation, the States who profess to stipulate, but "WE THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES" who "ORDAIN" and "ESTABLISH" a "Constitution for the United States of America." The power of the people is virtually declared to be unlimited; for though the legislative authority of Congress is in various ways restricted, yet by the fifth article, any amendment whatever may be made to the Constitution, except the repeal of the clause which secures to each State "its equal suffrage," its two votes in the Senate. It is important here to refer, by way of note, to a prevalent error in regard to the voice of the States in the Senate, which has been often asserted to be in the nature of a representation of the sovereignty of the States. The Senate is, first, a legislative chamber enjoying as such the same powers as the House of Representatives in all respects except the origination of bills for raising revenue; secondly, a high court of judicature for the trial of impeachments; and thirdly, an executive council, having power to confirm or reject appointments to office by the President, and to ratify, by a two-thirds vote, treaties negotiated by him. If the action of the Senate, in the exercise of these special jurisdictions, were of a representative character, the senators would give their voice by States; but all votes are taken and counted per capita, and the senators act as individual members of a national council, not as independent diplomats negotiating compacts in behalf of their respective governments. Besides this, if the Constitution had designed to secure to the States a corporate voice in the Senate, it would have conferred on them the power of recalling senators who should have disregarded the will of their constituents; but no such power exists, and the pretended right of instruction to the senators by the State Legislatures finds not a shadow of support in the Constitution.

But, however this may be, even this exception to the power of constitutional amendment—the only particular in which the people have apparently renounced its political omnipotence—might easily be rendered nugatory, for there is nothing to forbid an amendment which should abolish the Senate itself, and with it all "suffrage" in it.

Hence, by the very terms of the Constitution, the people of the States may so change that law as to take from the States every local jurisdiction, every attribute of sovereignty, every token of individuality they now possess. Is a State, which concedes to other States legal rights and prerogatives involving the power of extinguishing even its political existence, a sovereign State?

For our present purpose, the Constitution may be considered as dividing itself into two series of provisions: the one defining the powers of the fed eral Government, the other limiting those of the States, and upon comparing these provisions, it will be seen that every attribute of an independent, national, as distinguished from a dependent, local, municipal, corporate sovereignty, is declared to be vested in the federal Government, and, on the other hand, is expressly denied to the individual States.

By the seventh section of the first article it is declared that Congress has power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises" for all national purposes. These taxes, of course, are collected within the territory of the States, and the payment of them is enforced by officers appointed by the federal Executive, who may be not even citizens of the State where they are employed, and by methods provided by federal legislation. To borrow money on the credit of the United States. To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and "with the Indian tribes," who, in many cases, resided within the States. To establish a uniform rule of naturalization and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States. To coin money, regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures. To provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States. To establish post-offices and post-roads. To grant patents for inventions and copyrights. To constitute federal tribunals within the several States. To define and punish piracy and other offences against the law of nations. To declare war. To raise and support armies and a navy. To call out the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions. To organize, arm, and discipline the militia. And, finally, to make all laws necessary for carrying into execution these large powers and all others vested in the United States Government or its officers.

So much for the powers of Congress. What are those of the federal Executive?

By the second section of the second article the President commands the army and navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States when called into the service of the United States. With the consent of the Senate he makes treaties, whether of peace or of commerce and navigation, with foreign powers. He appoints all officers of the United States. He sends and receives ambassadors, and calls special sessions of Congress, and by the seventh section of the first article he is invested with the power of veto upon laws of Congress unless re-enacted by a two-thirds vote.

By the third article the federal judiciary takes cognizance of all questions arising under the Constitution or the laws of the United States; all cases affecting ambassadors or other foreign representatives; all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; all controversies to which the United States is a party; and controversies between citizens of different States; and

The sixth article declares that "the Constitution, the laws made in pursuance thereof, and treaties made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

By the ninth article of amendments, subsequently adopted, it was provided that "the enumeration, in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people;" and by the tenth article of the same, that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people," which, of course, is to be construed, reddendo singula singulis, municipal powers which they had always enjoyed to the States, political and sovereign powers to the people (not of the several States, which would have required a different form of expression, but) of the Union, in whom those powers had always been vested.

Looking at these provisions, a stranger to the political history of the United States would suppose it quite impossible that any territorial jurisdiction, within the limits of that commonwealth, could possibly lay claim to the attribute of political sovereignty; for, except upon the supposition that sovereignty is infinitely divisible, he would not be able to imagine any sovereign prerogative that could remain to a State after so many had been lodged exclusively in the federal Government, so much reserved to the people. But the Constitution goes even further. It expressly denies to the States every truly sovereign power which, by any possible implication, could be considered as reserved or conceded to the several States, every one of the indicia by which political communities are known to the world as independent, self-subsisting organizations. The tenth section of the first article declares that "no State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; grant letters of marque or reprisal; coin money; emit bills of credit; make anything but gold or silver a legal tender in payment of debts; pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts; grant any title of nobility; impose any tonnage duty; keep troops or ships in time of peace; enter into any agreement or compact with another State or with a foreign power; or engage in war except when actually invaded."

What one of the functions of sovereignty not more or less common to many municipal corporations could a commonwealth, destitute of these prerogatives and controlled in so many ways by a superior power, effectually discharge? How could it make its existence legally known to foreign states? How provide for the commercial interests of its people, or even for the security of their lives and property? How, in short, fulfil any one of the duties of an independent government to its people?

The practical construction of the Constitution has been uniformly irreconcilable with the notion of State sovereignty; and the Supreme Court, in the Dred Scott case, went so far as even to deny to the States the power of defining the qualifications of their own citizenship. Not only has Congress always exercised the sovereign powers specifically vested in it by the Constitution, but the administration of the Government has always proceeded upon the admitted ground that we were one undivided people inhabiting one indivisible territory. All the vast additions to our original bounds have been acquired at the common expense of the whole Union, and the proceeds of the sales of public lands, whether situated within the limits of the States or in unadmitted territories, have been paid into the common treasury. The survey of the coast, light-houses, and harbor improvements, the removal even of obstructions to navigation in great inland rivers, have been the work of the national Government. Our maritime defences have all been planned by federal engineers, constructed at the cost of the federal treasury, manned by soldiers enrolled and paid by the federal Government, and even the fortresses which enabled the rebels so long to resist the national arms at Charleston were erected by the nation for the security, not of always factious, always unpatriotic, and now treasonable South Carolina alone, but as part of a chain designed to defend other territory also from foreign aggression.

So with regard to the admission of new States which, having been framed out of territory either uninhabited or subject to foreign powers at the time of its acquisition by us, certainly came into the Union without any existing rights of sovereignty, or any political rights except such as are secured to them by the Constitution when admitted as States. When and how, then, did they acquire a sovereignty paramount to that of the Union? These States have, it is admitted on all hands, precisely the same rights and powers as the old States originally organized as British colonies, and, conversely, the old States have no other rights or powers than those belonging to the new. The Southern school of politicians contends that secession is one of these rights, and, in fact, it is impossible to separate the right of secession from the right of sovereignty. Admit the latter and the former necessarily follows, just as the right of secession involves the attributes of sovereignty. But when Florida, which had been acquired at the cost of millions, and defended at the cost of tens of millions, of national treasure, was admitted as a State, would her neighbors, Georgia and Alabama and South Carolina, have allowed that she might have seceded the day after, and sold herself back to Spain? Could Texas, after receiving the vast sum we paid for the purchase of her lands, have forthwith withdrawn from the Union and joined herself once more to the fortunes of anarchical but anti-slavery Mexico? We pretended to re-annex Texas as territory once ours, unconstitutionally surrendered by our Government. Did that territory become less ours than before, when Texas had been solemnly received into the family of States?

In the present condition of affairs, the establishment of the doctrine of State sovereignty would be of no advantage to the South; for, in that case, the Southern people is now in the position of any foreign enemy reduced by conquest; and, of course, has lost all political rights; though I should not be prepared to go so far as those who contend that, by such conquest, all the private property of the inhabitants of the rebel States has become vested in the Union, and ought to be disposed of accordingly. That the Union has all the legal rights which the laws of modern warfare ascribe to the conqueror, all that belong to a power which has put down a causeless rebellion by the sword, cannot reasonably be doubted; but the necessity or expediency of enforcing those extreme rights is quite another question. The true and the safe theory is that on which the late and the present Administration seem to have thus far proceeded, and upon which alone the action of Congress and the other departments of the Government, in the recognition and admission of Western Virginia, as a State carved out of the territory of another State without the consent of the latter, can be justified—namely, that the States are not sovereign under the federal Constitution; that the act of secession adopted by the legislatures of the rebel States, and accepted by their people, is a voluntary legal surrender of their corporate rights and franchises; that, independently of this point, the rebel States have, by actually withdrawing from the Union and rebelling against it, forfeited those rights; and that upon either ground, their municipal privileges are gone, and they are become part and parcel of the unorganized territory of the Union, and must be re-organized as they originally were at the period of the Revolution, by authority of the federal Government. It is evidently impossible for them to be legally re-constituted by any other means. The official life of every State functionary, every legislative, every judicial, every executive authority, under the former lawful government, has been determined by lapse of time or voluntary surrender, and even if we treat the old State constitutions as still in force, there is nowhere a power within the States to set the machinery in motion. They are, upon that supposition, a people without rulers, without official organs. There is no executive, no judiciary, no legislature, no officer who has authority to summon the primary assemblies for the election of a legislative body. That authority, all civil authority in short, can come from one source alone, the source from which, as I have so often said, it originally proceeded, the federal Government.

I have now completed the task I had proposed, of illustrating, by historical facts and familiar, untechnical arguments, the true relations between the Union and the great subordinate municipalities into which its territory is divided. I hope I have shown that the people of the Union acting through the federal Government is the sole sovereign of or in our commonwealth, and has the same power over the disorganized States as over the unorganized territory of the United States. It may impose such conditions upon the re-admission of those States as it shall think needful for the future security and common good of the Union. The people has entrusted this power to strong hands, firm wills, wise heads, and patriotic hearts. We need not fear that they will abuse it. G. P. M.

FLORENCE, ITALY, Nov. 30.

THE SOUTH AS IT IS.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

XXI.

COLUMBIA, S. C., December 5, 1865.

THE hardships of railway travelling over the swamps and uplands of South Carolina have been often set forth of late, and have not been exaggerated. Rails worn out, shaky, creaking trestle-works, the slow, thumping motion, the frequent transfers from dirty cars to dirtier ferry-boats and stages, the lack of hotels at the stopping places, and the long delays, with a dozen other inconveniences, rob the traveller of rest and peace of body and mind. After a few hours' ride, everybody becomes fatigued and thoroughly ill-humored, and only speaks to grumble. At Florence, in the dusk of the evening, I heard a small, smoke-dried, vicious-looking boy, a poor white of thirteen or fourteen years old, giving expression to his own feelings and those of his fellow-passengers. He stood on the car-platform, leaning over the brake in an attitude of exhaustion, and accosted me as I went up the steps:

"A'n't there no sellers round yer sellin' snacks?"

"No," I told him; "there 's a hotel, though."

"Yes, hominy for a dollar. There 'd ought to be sellers. I 'm starved myself and so 's ma'am. Dog-gorn sich roads anyhow. Wear me out. By G——, I could git down an' walk a heap faster 'n these cussed kyars. Creepin' along so durned slow! I 'd like to know if they think they 're goin' to make connections."

Then he pronounced the engineer and conductor "no account," and imprecated curses on his own head if he ever was hired to run trains on that road. Going into the car he joined his mother, a person even more irascible and fierce than himself, to whom he briefly reported his ill success, and then the two slept, curled up in one seat for the sake of warmth, till we reached Sumterville. A seven or eight hours' ride, at the rate of four miles an hour, brought us, at four o'clock in the morning, to Kingsville. The village never contained more than half a dozen buildings, and, as Sherman's men have been there, only two of these remain. A bed could be had at neither, and the passengers made themselves as comfortable as might be in the cars. The air was full of a white mist, obscuring the stars; but the night was not dark, for the moon was shining, and the weather was unseasonably warm. I walked about, therefore, a little while, and went along towards some fires that were burning in the open air at a few rods' distance. Close beside the track lay a confused heap of bundles and boxes and rude furniture, evidently the household property of negroes. There were small pots and pans, bags of corn, ground nuts tied up in sheets, three-legged stools, and coops in which hens and chickens were cackling and peeping. Behind this barricade were several rude huts, made of poles or boards, with a covering of canvas or rusty sheets of iron from the ruined locomotives. In front of each shelter was a fire, with men and women round it talking and smoking. Other negroes lay among the luggage guarding it, and the whole camp seemed to contain about a hundred people. I talked first with one of the old women. She rose from her seat on the ground as I approached and made a courtesy, while her companion, still older than herself, remained cowering over the embers. Both were without shoes and very ragged.

"You 're sitting up late," I said.

"Who for watch de tings, mawssa, ef we sleep? Who for watch my leel corn and grun-nut? Tell er, mawssa, 'bleeged to sit up late, 'less dey be gone 'fore day, clean."

"You 've got a good deal of corn, have you?"

"Got not but tree peck. Dat 's my sheer when dey sheered. Dunno ef I has tree peck."

"Is that what you 've got to keep you next year?"

"Dat leel bit o' corn keep me! Can 't. Not ef I was to eat it by grains. No, can't, can't, sister," said the other old creature.

"All we gang o' nigger," they told me, "is rice nigger." Three years ago, Mr. H. B., their master, who was a rice planter on the Combahee, had moved more than a hundred of them up into Richland District out of the way of the Yankees, and, having hired land, had kept them employed in raising corn. They had now for three nights and two days been "waitin' upon de train" that was to take them back to their former place of residence, and they seemed very glad at the thought of returning. I asked if any of their people had died since they were moved up the country. "Oh, 'nough dead," the old woman said, "'nough," and they called a man from the nearest hut to help them in counting. The three together recollected twenty-eight. Why had so many died? I asked. "Look yer, mawssa," said the woman, "shum? shum?" showing first one bare foot and then the other; "dat 's what do 'em. No shoe, no cloes, an' den de fros' git up into deir body, tell when de sun come down so hot, dey dies too fas'. Tight livin' what do 'em so; not'in' to eat. S' help me God, some day I trow my head back so, look up into de heaben—dear Christ, mawssa, I mos' starve to death."

The last time when blankets and clothing had been given them was the winter before the war broke out. During the season just closed they had been working for one-half the crop, and some of them had received ten bushels of corn and three or four bushels of ground-nuts. Others had received only a bushel of corn; but these were very inferior hands, such as old people who could do no field-work, but had been employed in spinning and minding the children. Their employer had also given them a monthly allowance of corn meal and molasses. I asked the man what were his plans for the coming year. He did n't know; he 'd prefer to get a piece of ground for his own, and he looked at me enquiringly. It was n't likely, I told him, that he would be able to do that. Then he 'd work for master, he reckoned, on the rice plantation. If he could n't be by himself, he and his family working land for themselves, he'd prefer to stay with his fellow-servants. Mr. B. wanted them all to go back to his place, and that was where they were going now. He 'd work for money or on shares.

One of the passengers, a mild-faced, mild-spoken little Irish gentleman, had walked down into the camp, having found it vain to hope for sleep in the uncomfortable car, and we whiled away an hour in conversation. He had been an instructor in the Catholic college or seminary at Columbia, and appeared to have taken no interest in politics or war. He talked of Kingsville as he had known it during the past four years. His home was in Sumter, and in going to visit his family he was often compelled to wait a day or two in Kingsville. The cars would be broken down, or all the cars would be needed for the transportation of soldiers or of federal prisoners going from Andersonville to Florence. It would have melted a heart of stone to look at them. Wirtz, the jailer at Andersonville, had been executed, he believed; if he was responsible for the horrible condition of those men, surely he deserved hanging. He never had gone but once to the place where they had them guarded; a second sight of them he could not have borne. All of them were shockingly filthy and hardly looked like human beings; some were nearly naked as they were born, some were starved down to skin and bone, some were begging pitifully for a drink of water, and some were in the very act of dying. He should not forget to the last moment of his life two or three that were crazed and ran about with loud cries and laughter. It seemed to him as if mercy and humanity had fled the land, and the earth had become a pandemonium. There was no pity or respect for the dead even; they were buried as you 'd bury an old horse. He pointed out the spot among the trees, on the north side of the railroad, where he had seen these things, and declared that he desired never to put his eyes on it again.

At seven o'clock a train of empty freight cars arrived, with the engine laboring in the rear, and in the course of the next three hours we were pushed along to Hopkins's Turn-out, where the road at present terminates. Here, too, were negroes encamped beside the road, with their corn and bedding piled around them, waiting till they could be carried down to the coast. I learn from the officers of the Bureau in this city that during November they sent down about two hundred and fifty persons each week, and they give transportation to those only who are too old or too young to make the journey on foot. Through the summer and early autumn transportation was given to none; but it is estimated that in each month more than a thousand negroes passed through Columbia on their way to the low country, most of them being negroes whom their masters had removed into the interior for safe keeping. The opinion that land is to be given them by the Government is, or was, undoubtedly prevalent—how generally prevalent it would be very hard to say, but in any case the people would have made very great exertions to get back to their former homes and the country in which they were born—" their old range," as they express it.

At Hopkins's the traveller chooses some one of the several stages which in four hours and for four dollars carry passengers through the mud to Columbia. Even at this distance from the sea the country, though somewhat rolling and not entirely sandy, is still a dreary pine forest, and in the twelve miles' ride we passed but very few clearings. The road, however, is well travelled, and we met more than a hundred wagons, of which most were getting, as best they could, to the railroad with heavy loads of cotton. Four or five Government wagons also we met. " What 's them comin' ? " said our driver. " Damned Yankee wagons. I hate to give 'em the road, but I 'll have to do it, I suppose;" and he gave as little as he could, honoring each teamster as he passed with a long stare, which was duly returned. He drove carefully, however, and brought us through without an overturn, and without obliging us to alight. My companions were two gentlemen, of whom one had been and one now is a high executive official of the State. Fatigue prevented much conversation, except such as grew out of the present perils of the road, or was suggested by the inconveniences of the night before. Even the negro and the reconstruction question were hardly mentioned. " Andy Johnson," one said, and the other assented, " has done a great deal better than we could have expected." One of the party remarked that he had read in the late New York papers that General Grant was decidedly in favor of war against Maximilian. " Well," it was replied, " he certainly talked that way to me. He said if he had n't felt confident last summer that war would of course be declared, he would have thrown a corps across the Rio Grande when Sheridan first went down to Texas. He said he thought he could have got a corps of Confederate soldiers into that service."

" Well, he 's mistaken then; he could n't."

" I do n't know. I think it 's more than probable he could. There seems to be such fascination about the life of a soldier that it 's difficult for a man to settle down to work after he 's tried it. You 'd be surprised, I venture to say, going into your own district to find the numbers of men that would enter the army."

" I can speak for one man from my own district, anyhow. I never want to see another soldier or hear another gun fired."

" I do n't; but I do n't know that we could do anything better with these negroes."

" Oh, if you could confine it to them."

It would have been a good thing, it was thought, if the Lieutenant-General had taken a run up to Columbia, and seen the handiwork of his friend Sherman. It was agreed that if Grant had commanded the federal army in its campaign in South Carolina, the American arms and the nineteenth century would not have been disgraced by such wholesale devastation.

The city is, indeed, a melancholy sight. In Richmond and Charleston the great conflagrations spared more than they destroyed, but in Columbia one is everywhere surrounded by ruins and silent desolation. Of the former great beauty of the city only so much remains as to cause one to regret the more that the work of destruction was so complete. The wide streets seem all the emptier for their width; the trees that shaded the walks were killed by the intense heat, and are now rows of dead trunks, and the pleasant slopes and hills light up the lonely chimneys and blackened walls into plainer view. The hatred of the Northern people, which makes itself manifest more or less distinctly in nearly every Southern community, the Northern visitor is better able to bear with in Columbia than elsewhere. It needs be so, for in no other city that I have visited has hostility seemed to me so bitter.

ENGLAND.

London, Dec. 9, 1865.

I am thankful to say that throughout the country a general outcry is being raised against the savage cruelty with which the so-called Jamaica insurrection seems to have been suppressed. Public meetings have been summoned in most of our great towns to call for rigid enquiry; and even the papers which at the outset indulged in the fiercest declamations against the " nigger" and in the loudest eulogies on Governor Eyre's rigor, are beginning to change their tone. The Saturday Review itself is shamed into humanity, and the Times is now forced to admit that the case demands investigation. God knows that such tardy reparation does not, in my eyes, atone in any way for the crime which I fear has been committed. But, still, it is some satisfaction to feel that the public conscience is not yet hardened to a sense of cruelty. The old anti-slavery party—of whom Mr. Charles Buxton may be taken as a type—who, as a body, refused to express any sympathy for the North during the war, and justified their Southern leanings by asserting that the question of slavery was not involved in the contest, have been recalled to their earlier and better creed by the reputed horrors of these Jamaica massacres. The Government is in extreme perplexity how to act. The traditions of our rule, and, to some extent, the just traditions, prescribe the support of all colonial officials by the home authorities till such time as they can be proved guilty, and any infraction of this rule would expose the Government to the bitter ill-will of the ruling class, from whom our colonial officers are in the main selected. Then, too, the sympathies of the aristocratic and military caste are in favor of the attacked governor. His recall, whether just or unjust, would be regarded as a degrading concession to a popular outcry, and as a most dangerous precedent. Every officer in the army, from the commander-in-chief to the youngest ensign at the " Rag and Famish,"* would swear that the service was going to the dogs if the Government were to repudiate Governor Eyre in obedience to public clamor; and I suspect that several of Earl Russell's aristocratic colleagues would resign sooner than support him in a step so hostile to the traditions of the service. On the other hand, the Premier, whose one great merit is, I think, an appreciation of the might of the English middle-class not common amongst his order, knows well enough that if the public feeling of the nation is once roused; if, as there seems reason to expect, the Low-Church party and the Dissenting communities are in earnest in their demand for justice, no ministry can resist the pressure brought to bear upon it. And the statesman who, on the occasion of a somewhat similar outburst of feeling, took advantage of it to lead the outcry against Papal aggression, is too shrewd not to know that he had better offend every member of the peerage and every one of the governing classes, than lose the support of the religious world. It is very currently reported, on well-informed authority, that the order for the governor's recall was sent out by the mail which sailed on Friday. But, personally, I doubt the truth of the story. If the Premier had resolved on so decisive a step he would, I think, have let it be known before now, in order to allay the raging agitation throughout the country. It has been resolved to send out a commission of enquiry; but this alone will hardly satisfy the public. To add to the embarrassments of the Ministry, no despatches from Governor Eyre were, it is said, received by last mail. The idea that his conduct would be questioned at home does not seem ever to have entered his head. That this should be so is, in itself, almost overwhelming evidence of his unfitness for the post he occupies. Sir Henry Storcks, the Governor of Malta, has been summoned from that island by telegraph, and is to proceed to Jamaica, though in what capacity is not yet determined.

There seems to be little doubt that the King of the Belgians is dying. He has long been a sufferer from two complaints, stone and heart-disease of an aggravated kind. He is close on his seventy-fifth year, and there is little hope of his rallying from a severe attack of dysentery under which he is now laboring. In fact, the news of his death is hourly expected. No doubt, indeed, would be entertained about his death if he had not been expected to die so often, and suddenly recovered his strength. There is not a newspaper office in London which has not had the narrative of his life in type for ten years or more; he has already survived, to my knowledge, the authors of many of his journalistic biographies; still, it seems as if the end had come at last. A sort of Palmerston of royalty, he will hardly be missed personally when once he disappears from the stage of public life. But, as I have before written to you, I believe his death will close an era in European affairs just as Palmerston's has done in English politics. To no living person will his loss probably be greater than to our Queen. As was once said, he is the only human being left who could call her by her Christian name. He was always happier in England, where his brightest years had been passed, than in the country over which he ruled; and his visits to Windsor were very frequent, and it is supposed very welcome. His death may possibly deter the Queen from carrying out her intention of re-entering public life; if so, it will be a real misfortune, as the country is growing impatient of the extraordinary privacy with which the court is surrounded.

* Junior United Service Club.—Ed. Nation.

As yet politics are at a discount. The excitement about Jamaica has nipped in the bud the faint indications of a reform agitation which had begun to manifest themselves, and we hear little of any meetings in favor of reform. Possibly the official ministerial announcement that the lowering of the borough franchise to six pounds is to be proposed as a Government measure may rouse up public feeling, but so far the rumor of such an intention has produced no great effect. In default of politics there is a great deal of languid discussion going on about social questions. The only controversy which appears to me likely to lead to anything is one concerning the extension of our English universities, in which our leading scholastic authorities have taken an active part. There is no doubt that Oxford and Cambridge were intended as schools of instruction for the nation; there is equally little doubt that, practically, they are now confined to the sons of the well-to-do classes who belong to the Established Church. No student can become a student of the university, very much in the same way as nobody, unless I am mistaken,* can become a citizen of the United States; he must become a member of some college, just as a settler must become a citizen of some State; and by virtue of that fact he becomes a member of the university. Now all these colleges have buildings and endowments and rules of their own, and at all of them the Episcopal religion is that to which the students are required to conform. Of late years certain modifications have been made in favor of Dissenters; but, as a matter of fact, any lad who is not a member of the Established Church finds himself in a false position at Oxford, and is debarred from gaining most of the scholarships and fellowships which form the chief pecuniary rewards of university study. Then, too, the rate of living at either Oxford or Cambridge debars students of small means from going to our universities. Whenever any complaint is made about the expenses of a college education, the tutors cite some instance of a model student who enjoyed every advantage of the university for under one hundred pounds a year. It is possible that such exceptions may be true; but, as a rule, an undergraduate, who is not extravagant, spends from two to two hundred and fifty per annum during his three and a half years of residence; and a father has not much ground for grumbling if his son costs him a thousand pounds between matriculation and the time of taking his degree. Under these circumstances Oxford or Cambridge is not the place for the sons of needy parents, and, to speak the honest truth, the university authorities do not wish it should ever become so. Perhaps I should be doing them more justice if I said that they would like to make our universities national schools, if they could do so consistently with keeping up the high tone of social breeding which does undoubtedly prevail to some degree at these academies, and which is due to the fact that the students, as a body, belong to the wealthy classes. In order to obtain these two antagonistic advantages, our Oxford and Cambridge reformers are constantly devising schemes for restoring the universities to their ancient character without losing their modern attributes. At last Dr. Temple, the head master of Rugby School, has proposed the obvious solution that students should not be obliged to live in college, but may occupy lodgings in the town. The scheme has roused bitter opposition from the dons, and seems to me not to go far enough for its purpose. The only real way to throw open the universities is to let every student come to the university without attaching himself to any college, and live how and where he likes. If you do this you destroy the collegiate system, with its manifold advantages; but, from my experience of the world, I should say that at colleges, as everywhere else, low prices involve the absence of selectness. There are advantages in having things cheap; there are advantages in having them select; and you must choose between the two. The reservation of the great national universities to a certain class, and to the members of a certain creed, is part of our aristocratic system; and before you throw open Oxford and Cambridge to the nation, you will have to effect a national revolution in our social polity.

The great Yelverton marriage case, of which you must have heard before now, has re-appeared once more before the public. Last year, Miss Longworth or Mrs. Yelverton, as you like to call her, obtained a final hearing before the House of Lords and failed to substantiate her marriage. On this the Saturday Review, which, for some reason or other, has always espoused the cause of Major Yelverton's present wife, writes a very savage article upon Miss Longworth's defeat. On this the unfortunate lady, who seems to have a passion for law, brought an action in the Scotch courts against the paper in question for libel. The object of the suit was to elicit an opinion favorable to the assumption of her alleged marriage. If the Scotch courts decided it was a libel to say she was not a married woman, it followed that, in their opinion, she was lawfully wedded to Major Yelverton. In Scotland, as in Ireland, the sympathy for Miss Longworth has always been extremely vivid; and it was thought she would carry her case. The judges summed up in her favor; but the jury found that no libel had been uttered. In the interest of the freedom of the press, I am glad that such a decision has been arrived at, as the article in the Saturday Review, though ill-natured and discreditable, did not, in my opinion, exceed the license of legal comment.

The works of "Artemus Ward" have had so much success in this country as to have given rise to a lawsuit. Two publishers have issued rival editions of his travels amongst the Mormons; and both claim to have the exclusive right of publishing. Mr. Hotten has set up a plea of copyright, on the ground, as far as I can understand, that a Mr. Kingston, an Englishman, is a joint author of the book under discussion. Some day or other, I hope we shall have an Anglo-American copyright law; till then, I am afraid "Mr. Ward" will derive very little profit from the popularity of his books in England, whatever his rival publishers may do themselves.

* He is mistaken.—Ed. Nation.

THE ENGLISH OF THE NEWSPAPERS.

There may be those who regard the corruption of the English language as of little consequence, and who enjoy their newspapers without being troubled by the solecisms, the barbarisms, and the vulgar phraseology which the readers of many public journals are fated to encounter. Those who are themselves careless in their conversation, and indifferent to the laws of elegance and propriety, will scarcely be critical in their judgment of a written style, and will be satisfied with the intelligence which they receive without quarrelling with the vehicle by which it is conveyed to them. It would be useless to point out to such persons the exquisite pleasure which mere propriety of expression, without consideration of the thought or information presented, is capable of imparting; and they might be only amused if they were told that inaccuracy of language, since it necessarily involves inaccuracy of statement, is both a departure from the standard of good taste and a serious offense against the rules of strict morality. Vulgarity of expression, it is true, does not always imply vulgarity of thought; but the coarse writer too often proves to be a coarse thinker, and he who constantly obtrudes printed slip-slop upon the public, can hardly have either the feelings or the manners of an educated gentleman. We are ready to make proper allowance for the rapidity with which newspapers must be manufactured; but it becomes their managers seriously to consider the influence, good or bad, upon the public taste which they inevitably exert, and to remember that the repetition in their columns of colloquial vulgarities, of cant phrases, and of verbal absurdities, gives to such enormities a certain respectability, and, by making them familiar, ensures their general adoption. There are newspapers in this city which constantly use the word "aldermanic." The authority given for this is "Worcester's Dictionary," and the authority of Worcester is the "Edinburgh Review." If Lord Jeffrey wittingly permitted this frightful word to be printed in his journal, he has much to answer for. There is and there can be no such termination as "manic" derived from "man." The only derivatives from this noun, of this class, are "manly," and, in a bad sense, "mannish," as applied to impudent and forward women. We have heard the word defended by the citation of "Germanic," but the termination here is purely Latin from "Germanicus," and between "aldermanic" and "Germanic" there is no analogy. One bad word breeds another, and no sooner is "aldermanic" naturalized than "councilmanic" comes fresh from the mint of the reporters—a coinage for the validity of which no argument whatever can be offered. What monstrous manufacture may follow, we do not venture to predict.

The reporters, it is well known, scorn to use any other than the longest and finest words in the language. The news from the Stock Exchange comes to us written in a jargon which may be Choctaw, but most certainly is not English. The musical critics employ words in senses which may convey some meaning to the initiated, but to the initiated only; and there is a mad style of writing about the opera which is very irritating to those who go there simply and innocently to enjoy the playing and the singing. We do not quarrel with the word "auditorium," although it is not English; but we are seriously disposed to quarrel with a writer who tells us that "the auditorium of the New York Circus has been enlarged." People go to the horse-riding to see and not to hear. The article before us informs us that at the circus "the company will appear in all manner of equestrian, gymnastic, and acrobatic feats." For what reason, then, has the auditorium been enlarged?—to hear the riders the climbers, and the jumpers? The word means literally a school—not in the sense of a hall or lecture-room, but in that of a collection of hearers. Shade of Fabius Quintilianus! what would you say to the auditorium of the New York Circus?

Another dramatic critic praises a new play by declaring that "it is full of telling situations." What does he mean? Certainly not that the situations tell the story of the drama forcibly. He merely means to say that they are striking or entertaining. Then, why does he not say so? Why does he have recourse to a threadbare verbal vulgarity worthy only of the pot-house or the prize-ring?

We must be permitted, however, to declare that, after all, we prefer the Doric simplicity of phrases unmistakably rude to the Corinthian embellishments and cheap finery of more ambitious writers. Why should a gentleman who wishes to state that yesterday was fine, inform us that "it seemed like the vision of an Apician banquet to a famished wretch, or the delicious whisper of hope to a despairing soul!" Why should he speak thus of any day, however nasty?

"Tuesday was certainly one of the most disagreeable days possible, and the pluvial powers that created it must have exhausted their resources for some time to come in their pessimistic effort."

There is such a word as "pluvial," but why not say "rainy?" There is no such word as "pessimistic," we are glad to say, in the English nor in any other language with which we are acquainted. There is such a word as "pessimist," as there is also "optimist;" but if we say "pessimistic," why may we not say "optimistic?" Besides, "pessimistic," if it means anything, does not mean "very bad," as this writer probably supposed. "A pessimist" is one who habitually looks upon the dark side of things, and an adjective derived from it must have a cognate meaning, which, as here used, it does not have at all. Will our readers tolerate another specimen?

"The white clouds floated slowly and dreamily over the violet heavens, as if they were wondering at the charmfulness of the day, and looking their last upon a thing of beauty that soon must die."

We confess that we no more understand "the charmfulness" of this style of writing than we do the meaning of "charmfulness" itself. Again, we say that there is no such word; and here its use is wanton, for "charm" would have fully expressed what little sense the writer had to convey. It is possible that this bad word may be found in Mr. Tupper, or in Mr. Walt Whitman, or in Mr. Robert Montgomery; but none of these masters of "poetical tumor" has yet been canonized by the makers of dictionaries.

Enough of unpleasant illustration. We have offered these strictures in no spirit of captious and finical fault-finding, but because we seriously believe that the loose and irregular methods of employing words which obtain in some newspapers, and we are sorry to say not seldom in the pulpit and in Congress, are of dangerous import to the purity of our tongue. To the reader who thinks this to be a trifling matter we have nothing to say, for he has yet to learn the true significance and value of language; and whoever fully comprehends these will require from us no apology.

Literature.

LITERARY NOTES.

UNDER the prevailing influence of the holiday season, the useful in literature is superseded by the ornamental, and until the present rush for gift books is over, no publisher would think of bringing out works of a standard or studious character, as, however great their merit might be, they could scarcely meet with proper attention while the current of public taste is running strongly in another direction. The production and sale of embellished books, all prepared with a special view to the wants of purchasers at this time, forms an important branch of the commerce of literature, as well as the link that connects it with art, sometimes to the manifest advantage of both, but oftener, it must be owned, with all the characteristics of an unequal and ill-assorted union. The trade this year in illustrated books has shared in the general prosperity of the country; what with home supplies and foreign importations, the market has been well stocked with novelties, and purchasers have had no reason to complain of want of materials for selection. The chief feature to be noticed in the kind of art most in demand is the growing fondness for color, as employed in illuminated books. With this, a regard for ecclesiastical tradition and what is called Christian art has much to do, though even without these associations there is no doubt that the educated eye hungers for color in all the surroundings and accessories of life to a degree that opens a wide field for decorative artists who have knowledge and enterprise enough to cultivate it.

—The artistic honors of the year, as decided by the voice of popular favor, unquestionably belong to Gustave Doré. His great illustrated Bible, in two splendidly printed folios, and designs for Dante's "Inferno," issued in connection with Cary's English version, have just made their appearance among us in good time for Christmas, and have thus been brought within the view of hundreds, perhaps thousands, not usually accessible to influences of art. They have, in fact, produced an actual sensation, due to the powers of this great artist and his wonderful mastery over the terrible and the grand. This is not the place to analyze his merits; but it is impossible even to glance at his "Bible" and at the costly "Illustrated New Testament," published by Longmans, without being struck with the fact how much an artist gains by understanding the peculiarities and capabilities of the material he works in. While in the English book the labors of the wood-engraver are frittered away in ineffectual attempts to rival steel-plate engraving by copying paintings of the old masters that depend for their value on physiognomical character and expression, Doré dashes his pencil in "the gloom of earthquake and eclipse," and, with a tenth part of the labor for the engravers, produces, on wood, effects—brilliant, startling, and astonishing—that no other style of engraving can, for a moment, compete with.

—An interesting incident mentioned in the "Life and Letters of Rev. Frederick W. Robertson" is his friendship with Lady Byron, the widow of the poet; and the fact that he heard from her the whole history of her life. To his hands was committed the charge of publishing, after her decease, her memoirs and letters. He said of her that she was one of the noblest and purest women he had ever met. "Her calm, subdued character (he writes), warm sympathy, and manifold wisdom have been one of my greatest privileges here"—during his residence at Brighton. Though, to her great regret, the early death of Mr. Robertson frustrated Lady Byron's purpose, it may well be supposed that an intention so deliberately settled—in which justice to others as well as herself was involved—would not be left dependent on accidental circumstances for its execution, and that we may yet see the memoirs, etc., whose existence is thus ascertained.

—The second series of Dean Stanley's "History of the Jewish Church" has just been received and put to press by Charles Scribner & Co., who will issue it as speedily as possible, uniform with their edition of the first series. The unusual delay connected with the publication of this volume in England, where it has been kept back more than a year, is probably due to the author's care to avail himself of the results of the explorations, now in progress from various sources, in the Holy Land. The period of Jewish history comprised in the volume is from the days of the Prophet Samuel to the Babylonish captivity, including the whole historic existence of the kingdoms of Judah and Israel. Very little has hitherto been done by English writers for the elucidation of this portion of the world's history. It assumes new life and interest in Dean Stanley's book, as he combines knowledge of the localities with all the learning of the subject, and a freedom of treatment not usually applied to its discussion. The second volume of Lange's "Commentary on the New Testament," including the Gospels of Mark and Luke, will also shortly be published by the same house. Its appearance has been somewhat retarded by the absence of the editor of the series, Dr. Schaff, on a visit to Europe, from whence he has just returned. Dr. Schaff received in Germany, where most of his time was spent, the most gratifying testimonies to the absorbing attention felt among the most eminent theologians and literary men of all denominations towards the result of the struggle for freedom in America. By invitation he addressed with great success two large and influential audiences at Berlin on the nature and true relations of the contest, and in various ways affected and enlightened public sentiment in Germany on the American question with the happiest results.

—The passages from Nathaniel Hawthorne's note-books, given in the January number of the "Atlantic Monthly," are of singular literary interest. They are extracted from his note-books, comprising several volumes of closely-written memoranda, found in his study after his decease. The specimens now given are dated thirty years back, at a time when Hawthorne was unknown to the world, and had published nothing, we believe, except, perhaps, a story or two in an "annual" or "souvenir," that no one comprehended or cared for. They show how a great writer is made; by what constant care and thought the felicities of genius are wrought out and moulded into lasting shape. The notes are of various kinds—studies of the aspects of nature at the various seasons of the year, executed with a Pre-Raphaelite minuteness, which he afterwards abandoned for a freer and bolder touch in his published writings; sketches of persons and people met with, hints for stories, etc. Many of these a careful student of his writings will find brought into later use; some single lines or reflections were pregnant with the richest future produce, while others remain an unworked mine. With many authors the handling of their private notes and memoranda would be a delicate task, but about all that Hawthorne did there was a finish and symmetry that renders his slightest jottings fit for the public eye.

—Few African explorers meet with the success uniformly the portion of Dr. Livingstone, due, no doubt, to constitutional tact and courage acting unconsciously to its very possessor. A gentleman who has claims upon American notice, M. Duchaillu, has been less fortunate in his late attempts to penetrate into the interior from Fernand Vaz in Western Equatorial Africa. After reaching a point about five hundred miles distant from the coast, a quarrel took place between his black servants and a party of the natives, in which a woman was killed. This led to a general attack on the expedition, from which M. Duchaillu barely escaped with his life, losing all his collections of natural history, but preserving his journals and astronomical observations, which will form the basis of the narrative already in preparation for the press. He has been warmly welcomed on his return in England, and will read papers at the Royal Geographical and Anthropological Societies on his travels, the physical and craniological character of the natives he came in contact with, etc. Another traveller on the eastern side of the Continent, the Baron C. von der Decken, a Hanoverian nobleman, who first made certain the existence of the snowy mountains of Kilimanjaroo, etc., in tropical Africa, has been stopped in his explorations by the loss of two steamers constructed expressly for river navigation on the bar at the mouth of the River Jubb, near the equator. The baron has, we believe, published no separate work, so that a connected account of his travels is wanting; but he communicates the results of his researches to the learned societies of Europe.

—The monument proposed by the friends of W. M. Thackeray has already been placed in Westminster Abbey, and was opened for inspection to the public two weeks since. It consists of a bust, sculptured by Baron Marochetti, placed upon a base of red serpentine, mounted on a bronze plinth, with a simple inscription of his name, and the dates of his birth and death. It is fixed against a wall column in the south transept, popularly known as "Poet's Corner," behind the statue of Joseph Addison, whose memory, in the more tardy justice of the last generation, was obliged to wait a century for a like recognition of its genius. It is to be hoped that the best monument to an author—a complete edition of his works—will not long be wanting. The copyrights of nearly all Thackeray's writings are now, by recent arrangement, the property of a single firm—Messrs. Smith & Elder, the originators of the "Cornhill Magazine"—and with whom, in the later years of his life, Thackeray was most closely connected. In this case, therefore, the difficulties that frequently prevent a complete and uniform impression of the writings of a deceased author do not exist, and the public would, unquestionably, respond liberally to any attempt, however costly (provided its execution corresponded), to present in a form worthy their merits the works of the last great writer on whom death has set the seal of classicality.

BOSH FOR BOYS.*

THE Headleys, like the misfortunes and the Abbotts, come not singly: there are in fact two of them. Mr. J. T. Headley is the Sacred Mountaineer, and the historian of Napoleon and his marshals, and a long line of ex uno disce omnes works of narration; while Mr. P. C. Headley has chiefly given his talents to the instruction of females and small children, if we may attribute such a purpose to books variously entitled "Josephine," "Women of the Bible," "Hero Boy," "Patriot Boy," and the rest. It would not be just to judge either of these gentlemen for the literary failings of the other, and we shall not presume to say which is the more tedious and absurd. Nor would it, again, be fair to contrast them both with Messrs. Abbott, for similar reasons, although the parallel nature of their occupations, and the like division of their labors, naturally tempt us to comparison of Mr. J. T. Headley with Mr. John S. C. Abbott, and Mr. P. C. Headley with Mr. Jacob Abbott. We merely note the resemblance, and pass to examine the lives and careers of Sheridan and Farragut.

These biographies, as prepared by the Rev. P. C. Headley, for the instruction of the young, seem to be intended to meet the wants of a class denied access to the correspondence of the newspapers during the war, for the vastly greater part of either book is made up of generous quotation from this authority. But there are two objections to Mr. Headley's theory of biography as thus developed: one, that the class of readers addressed is probably very small; and another, that it could have been made more lucidly and thoroughly instructive by a digested narrative. To this Mr. Headley may, of course, respond that his first object was to make a book of a certain number of pages, and that the purpose of instruction was secondary and incidental. His success in the chief enterprise is as undeniable as the printer's and binder's, and for the minor part of the undertaking each reader must pronounce his own sentence. The present writer, not being a young person (except in the warmth of sympathy and emotion naturally arising from a habit of criticism), has perhaps no right to speak in such a case; but he cannot help confessing that whereas before reading Mr. Headley's lives of Sheridan and Farragut he had some vague idea of their deeds and character, he has now no knowledge concerning them. We had some thought, indeed, of testing the effect of the volumes upon a really youthful mind, but at last gave up the notion of the experiment, as of something too nearly related to vivisection of animals—a thing useful to science, but repugnant to humanity.

We may speak more frankly concerning another point, and we cannot help blaming Mr. Headley for failing to name, in the greater number of instances, the sources from which he has helped himself with so much freedom. The newspaper correspondents who followed the perilous and laborious march of the armies, gathered their facts under the fire of the battles, and, before the fight was over or the toil of slaughter was done, wrote out the history of events still palpitating with danger and trembling between triumph and defeat, surely merited to be named as authority by a literary gentleman comfortably compiling their narratives in the leisure of his study. It was scarcely enough for him to indicate his indebtedness by apostrophes and inverted commas, since he meant to place the name of Rev. P. C. Headley as author on the title-page of a book nine parts quotation and one part feeble comment and slovenly introduction. Even the work of selection is not well performed, and there is no apparent attempt at arrangement. The compiler's literary honesty of purpose may be judged from the fact that he does not scruple to quote utterly irrelevant matter, if it can be made by any trick to do duty in the volume. General Sheridan goes to live at Zanesville, Ohio, in his boyhood, and we have, therefore, six pages concerning the settlement and early history of Zanesville, but no more concerning General Sheridan than the man in the moon. In like manner, when Sheridan goes to West Point, ensues the history of that academy, with a full account of the system and discipline there maintained. Because General Sheridan lived, breathed, and had his being when President Lincoln was murdered, his biographer gives at length the official statement of the assassination. In another place, Mr. Headley having transferred to his pages some officer's description of the cavalry service, quotes the description of the horse in Job, and then passes to a view of the horse in general, concluding with the noble burst of Christian morality: "How cruel and wicked in the sight of God and good men is the daily and hourly abuse of the brute, especially so of the princely horse!"

Mr. Headley's fitness to write for religious youth can scarcely be a matter of speculation with himself; but we venture to question it. In the course of his wholesale appropriations from the correspondents, he has gathered into his pages a great deal of profane language, for the newspaper people had no more hesitation in printing oaths than the soldiers in swearing them. Mr. Headley seems to be aware of some impropriety in the transfer of this profanity to his book, and tries to save himself by a daring homily at the end:

"General Sheridan is a member of the Roman Catholic Church; but, like too many of our officers, indulges in profane language in the heat of battle."

We imagine, however, that the mischief will have been done to the youthful reader before he reaches this passage, wherein he is further instructed that blasphemy is "a vice which Washington never allowed in his presence, and of which a greater than Washington has said, 'Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain!'" We must not suspect the Rev. Mr. Headley of a joke; but we leave it to his own candor if, considering the previously quoted blasphemy, his attitude in uttering this homily is not uncommonly like that of Tony Weller winking to the housekeeper while his infant grandson drains a porter-pot, and describing somebody as an awful young Turk.

* "Life and Military Career of Major-General Philip Henry Sheridan. By Rev. P. C. Headley." New York: Wm. H. Appleton. 1865.

"Life and Naval Career of Vice-Admiral David Glascoe Farragut. By Rev. P. C. Headley." New York: Wm. H. Appleton. 1865.

BROWNELL'S WAR LYRICS.*

WE who blamed Mr. Brownell for "The Rhyme of the Master's Mate," which he did not write, may be supposed to have a peculiar pleasure in praising him for these veritable war-lyrics, which he did write. Indeed, we wish to offer to their authentic power the most cordial welcome, and to say that in our mind Mr. Brownell remains as guiltless of poetic reproach as if we had never accused him of the "Rhyme of the Master's Mate." This is saying a great deal, and we hope Mr. Brownell will appreciate the virtue of so much candor; for we want him to take it into account with whatever disapproval we must mix with our applause of his book.

* "War Lyrics and other Poems. By Henry Howard Brownell." Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1866.

It is a very unequal book, and would have been much better if it had been much smaller. Nearly all the "Early Poems" printed in the volume might have been left out with singular advantage to the poet; and perhaps the reader would consent to lose every one, with the exception of the beautiful lines which follow:

THE ADIEU.

Sweet Falsehoods, fare ye well!
That may not longer dwell
In this fond heart, dear paramours of Youth!
A cold, unloving bride
Is ever at my side—
Yet who so pure, so beautiful as Truth?

Long hath she sought my side,
And would not be denied,
Till, all perforce, she won my spirit o'er—
And though her glances be
But hard and stern to me,
At every step I love her more and more.

For the most part, however, the early poems of Mr. Brownell suffer from that poverty of original thought and feeling observable in other people's early poems, and have only the interest of promise. Such efforts are, in fact, chiefly valuable when studied as part of men's lives rather than their works, for they are not literature; and Mr. Brownell might have safely concluded that as yet the world was less concerned in his biography than in his poetry.

Of the so-called "Miscellaneous Poems," the best is, undoubtedly, that by a "Parsinger" "A bored of a Californy Male-steemer." In this there is a racy humor, and a power of leaving the "Parsinger" to develop his own character in his own way, which is masterly and altogether admirable, and does more to prove Mr. Brownell's genius than ever so many fine verses of a serious nature. In other poems of the volume the author's gift of humor appears, and in that called "Honest Abe" he gives the old story of Aristides' ostracism a new life by infusing the flavor of modern manner and meanness. Is there not a fine sense of the unvarying essence of human "cussedness"—the same in Greece as in Connecticut—in these verses?

Once, while thus with general clamor
Athens eased her factious heart—
When the smith forsook his hammer,
And the huckster left his mart—

Past the scene of noisy riot,
Clatter of shells and windy talk,
Aristides, calm and quiet,
Chanced to take a morning walk.

Musing, in his wonted fashion,
On the double care of state—
On the Demos' fickle passion,
And the cold patrician hate;

When a voter pressed beside him,
Saying, "Stranger can you spell
Aristides? Wal, jest write him,
Square and straight, on this here shell."

Smiling, cheery as a cricket,
Wrote the old Republican—
Then, as he returned the ticket,
Asked—"And what's his crime, my man?"

"Wal, not much," said Snooks, appearing Puzzled, "only I'll be cussed
But I'm sick to death of hearing
That old critter called 'THE JUST'!"

The poem "Let us Alone," which had so great popularity in the first days of the war (because it presented in a light odious and ridiculous the rascal pretence of the rebels that they only asked to be let alone, while they attacked the Union and seized everything belonging to it), must be still acknowledged as funny; but, like Whittier's ballad of "Maud Müller," it is a poem without a country. The Old Cove of Secessia speaks in cockney dialect and cockney slang, and one is vexed with the want of harmony between the fine spirit of American sarcasm and its outlandish utterance. This, however, is but a single fault, and Mr. Brownell's humorous power is so great that but for the distrust which we have learned to feel of all literary prophecy not retrospective in its nature, we should predict for him great probabilities as a humorist. We dwell on this power of his the more because we fear that, while people recognize his graver force, there is danger that many will not see his excellence in that lighter quality which is seldom absent from genius. To our thinking his humorous poetry is vastly better than all his other lyrics, except the battle-pieces. The miscellaneous poems generally do not surprise us, and there is a lingering immaturity in their French and Latin titles which is not pleasant to the taste. Nor are the war poems of nearly equal merit; and the long, long ode on Abraham Lincoln seems to us labored in manner and very meagre in matter. Mr. Brownell is often obscure in his treatment of abstract themes, and he heightens the disagreeable effect of this fault by a profligacy of parentheses. The best of the more didactic poems (if we may so distinguish them from the lyric narrations of the book) is "Suspiria Ensis," a most lofty and noble-thoughted song, in which the poet touches the sublime truth that all the heroism and self-devotion displayed in a bad cause are but greater and more distinguished shame.

Concerning the larger number of Mr. Brownell's battle-stories, there can be but one opinion: they are magnificent. We happened to be reading, just before we picked up our poet's volume, Messer Torquato Tasso's melodious description of a most proper combat under the walls of Jerusalem, and the contrast between that elegant engagement and Mr. Brownell's wild battle-scenes was droll enough. We must confess that he impressed us as speaking more authentically of war than his elder and better. Nay, we thought he sang more sublimely of its scenes, and perhaps it would not be going too far to say that we have never read any poet who seemed to sing of them with so blunt and fierce a verity. Mr. Brownell has had the fortune, rare among poets, to assist at most of the events which he pictures. In him the bard speaks from the soldier's knowledge, and it goes well as long as the fighter remains subject and silent, but he now and then gets in a word of his prose—honest, and meant to be savagely effective, no doubt, but undoubtedly failing of the purpose. On the whole, "The Bay Fight," by which the poet is best known, is his best poem. "The River Fight" is a far less worthy effort. Of course there are faults in the poem we like most, but these we choose to attribute to the irrepressible soldier, and not to the bard. Is it not the soldier who delights in the sulphurous metaphor of hell, and succeeds in bringing it in half a dozen times, in spite of the poet?

"With breath like the fume of hell."
"Three hundred traps of hell."
"Came with a howl of hell."
"Of the roar and rage of hell."

Is there not rather more of hell here than the poet would have given us if he had kept the upper hand all the time? We suspect the soldier of some turgid and merely boisterous passages in other of Mr. Brownell's poems, and of a general delusion that hard talking is strong writing. Whereas the poet knows better, and has an original way of telling a great deal in a very few tough, bold words. All the wild tumult of the naval combat seems to enter into such lines as these:

"The storm of fight going on overhead,
Tramp and thunder to wake the dead!
The great guns jumping overhead,
And the whole ship's company cheering!"

Our poet is not wanting in pathos either, for that goes naturally with strength and humor; and one may find genuine and deep emotion in the poem "Suspiria Ensis," of which we have already spoken; and of feeling, ruder, but as manly and true, in "The Color-Bearer," who sits and muses by his flag under fire at Vicksburg.

In fine, Mr. Brownell's poetry is the best that the war has inspired. It is a great thing to have made the songs that he has made; and we perceive no good reason why a young poet, having lofty sympathies and generous beliefs; having a basis of good sense and good humor; having an excellent use of English, and no disdain of American; having won applause but not flattery, and being friends with the public—we say we perceive no reason why such a young poet as we take Mr. Brownell to be should not do even better in the future than he has done in the past.

Literature for Children.—Since our recent article on this subject other publications for the holidays have come to hand, and deserve a notice, however brief. Messrs. E. P. Dutton & Co., Boston (Hurd & Houghton, New York), send us "Ottalie's Stories for the Little Folks" (from the German), "Christmas Holidays at Cedar Grove," and "Cushions and Corners; or, Holidays at Old Orchard." They are tales—the first two especially—with a strong moral and religious flavor. Madame Ottalie's "Stories" are not wanting in ingenuity or imagination, but they are marred by an improbable jumbling of incidents and characters, and the "little folks" to whom they are addressed are sometimes credited with years that do not belong to them. The translation is too elevated, for the most part; but we notice the slang expression "top-heavy" admitted into good company without a brand. In "Christmas Holidays" a merry family of children are instructed in the history and meaning of the Christian festival. "Cushions and Corners" is a capital delineation of childish character, and is far the best of the three books named above. The conversations are managed very naturally, and the contrast between the dispositions so well symbolized by a cushion and a sharp corner, respectively, is wrought out skilfully and in a most interesting manner.—"Something New for My Little Friends" (J. B. Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia) contains original stories in verse which, without much diversity in form, being confined to two or three metres, are well told and smoothly, with a proper blending of humor, sentiment, and doctrine. The Children's Hour" (same publishers) is an amusing batch of rhymes and extravagant stories, perhaps the cleverest of any now before us. The fun is so palpable that it cannot fail to be appreciated.—Mr. Tilton's verses, "The Two Hungry Kittens" (Tibbals & Whiting, New York), complete the trio of his compositions for children this year. They are very much better than the illustrations, by Mr. H. L. Stephens, and are worth all the illuminated lettering and borders which the publishers have lavished upon them.—Oliver Optic continues his "Woodville Stories" with "Work and Win" (Lee & Shepard, Boston). The moral which is conveyed in the text is revealed by Mr. Adams in his preface, which parents may read and the boys and girls skip if they please.—"The Song without Words," by the author of "The Schönberg-Cotta Family" (M. W. Dodd, New York), has an interior beauty which we fear will be quite lost on the children to whom it is dedicated. Not that an acquaintance with nature may not lead to the worship of deity, but that "nautilus," "teredo," and "medusa" are rather blind guides for the tender wit of childhood. In other words, for nature we have here natural history.—"Patriot Boys and Prison Pictures" (Ticknor & Fields, Boston) is composed of Mr. Edmund Kirke's contributions to "Our Young Folks," which have almost wholly pertained to the war and its prison experiences. Mr. Kirke knows how to interest the young as well as adults; but we wish he had not undertaken to vouch for the truth of all that he relates. We prefer to enjoy his narratives as works of the imagination—in part at least.—"Sun-Rays from Fair and Cloudy Skies" (D. Appleton & Co., New York) is an old acquaintance, with whom neither freshness nor probability abides. A hero "poor but honest," succored by a family rich but not proud, and a terminal bridal scene to which the party of the first part contributes a sister, and the party of the second part contributes a son—is it not the well-worn stock with which we have been familiar from our youth upward? If the poor read this book, they will be deluded; if the wealthy, they may be flattered, but will not be deceived, by the unreality. Walker, Fuller & Co., Boston, publish the third volume of Mr. Wm. M. Thayer's "Youth's History of the Rebellion." The plan of this work consists in a conversational narrative of the events of the war by an uncle to his nephews and nieces. This excites in the youthful reader an interest that might otherwise be wanting, though of course it labors under the disadvantage of anticipating his natural reflections on the themes presented. The wood-cuts in illustration are of no value. The Gettysburg cemetery-gate is quite misrepresented. Mrs. Sarah W. Lander's series, "Spectacles for Young Eyes" (same publishers), is continued in a little volume on Rome. It tells, in the "Rollo" style, of a travelling family who have passed from Germany to Venice, and thence to the Eternal City. The proneness of the writer to pun is observable in this as in preceding volumes. For the rest there is little to be said. Some of the engravings seem to have been taken from photographs.

Melodies and Madrigals; Mostly from the Old English Poets. Edited by Richard Henry Stoddard. (New York: Bunce & Huntington.)—The difficult work of selecting the best lyrics from four centuries of English song has been done with rare success by Mr. Stoddard; and we have to express a feeling of delight, in looking through the book before us, which we have not known in our acquaintance with volumes of similar character. In fact, Mr. Stoddard has had all the difficulty of the undertaking, and has not left the greater part of it to the reader, as too frequently happens in enterprises of the kind. Cordial friendship with the subject and thorough learning in the elder English poetry, together with an unerring and sensitive taste, have produced a book in which, beginning with Sir Thomas Wyatt of the fifteenth century, you are tempted from epoch to epoch, through all the varying richness of the rarest and loveliest poesies in the language, down to the late poets of our own time. We take it in vivid proof of the excellence of Mr. Stoddard's work, that it gives you almost unfailingly any desired melody or madrigal of which you know a word or a line, while there is much in it that will be newly pleasant and precious to most lovers of our lyric poetry. Naturally, great part of the volume is given to the poets of the sixteenth century, when our verse was warm with the southern hues and sentiments caught from the study of Italian poetry, and when the lyric expression of our literature was most nearly effortless and perfect. The metaphysical feeling of the seventeenth century, when the muse often spoke to men with the beautiful seriousness, and fanciful elaboration of idea, and quaintness of imagery, which are lost arts to us now, is also well represented; and for the eighteenth century, barren in thought, and barren in feeling, and barren in language, Mr. Stoddard has done the best that any one could do.

"And sweetly on and on,"

The return, in our own cycle, to a better and more natural sentiment, and the consequent rejuvenescence of the poetic diction (people being commonly able to speak well as soon as they have something to say) find full recognition in the "Melodies and Madrigals;" and it is with surprise and delight that one observes, in looking over the familiar poems in the latter part of Mr. Stoddard's little book, how much of the finest thought of our age has sought lyrical utterance. The range of selection throughout the volume is good; not only the most notable characteristics of the lyrics of each time being developed, but that often far better expression which refuses to ally itself to any period being given. Of course, most of the "Melodies and Madrigals" are amorous praises and celebrations, but there is also a fair share of lyric utterances, of earnest and solemn speculation concerning life, and of meditation upon death. In fine, we think Mr. Stoddard has made a book unique in its excellence. Certainly it shows, among all the volumes for the holidays which we have seen, with unapproachable superiority. The manner in which it is published, with its quaint print on the fine saffron pages bordered with soft red lines, leaves nothing to be desired.

The Life of Abraham Lincoln. By J. G. Holland, member of the Massachusetts Historical Society. (Gurdon Bill, Springfield, Mass.)—Notwithstanding the haste with which this biography was produced by author and publisher, we esteem it the most satisfactory study of its subject that has yet appeared. Mr. Raymond's and Mr. Barrett's books were both composed for political effect, in view of an approaching Presidential election, or at least relied for their successful circulation upon the political popularity of Mr. Lincoln. The time had not come to consider his character apart from the accidents of office and the exigencies of a perilous crisis. Neither was access then to be had to the multitude of facts concerning his inner nature which his death has elicited in rendering them precious. It was chiefly, therefore, as a public man who deserved well of the people for eminent and faithful service in their behalf that Dr. Holland's predecessors were compelled to view our late Chief Magistrate. The present biographer has ventured upon the more comprehensive and analytical survey which is now possible, though only to a limited extent, as he is himself aware, because of yet undiscovered material and the closeness of the spectator to the colossal figure under contemplation. He has been little solicitous to reproduce the famous speeches and documents of Mr. Lincoln any further than they help to elucidate motives and principles of action, or reveal a reserved power not always conspicuous. With equal industry and care Dr. Holland has collected the most interesting particulars of the early life of Mr. Lincoln, illustrating those amiable and admirable traits which made the good man great, and kept the great man good. He has shown excellent discrimination in this compilation, and is never led away by excess of veneration into undue stress upon trifles. The story of Mr. Lincoln's integrity as a postmaster, which Mr. Barrett spoils by his absurd narration, here takes on its true significance, and becomes a valuable contribution to our knowledge. A large part of the anecdotes are fresh, and the reader's attention is riveted from the first chapter to the last. We anticipate the best results for the community in which this book shall obtain a wide familiarity.

The Political History of the United States of America during the Great Rebellion. By Edward McPherson. Second Edition. (Philp & Solomon, Washington.)—The "Rebellion Record," Senator Wilson's "Anti-Slavery Measures in Congress," and Mr. McPherson's "Political History," together exhaust the field of documentary research for whoever wishes to study the late rebellion in its breadth or in detail. Title and table of contents are insufficient to reveal the richness of the compilation before us. Every important fact, opinion even, speech, letter, proclamation, statute, that bears upon the development and career of treason, on the one hand, and on the striving of the federal Government to repress it, on the other, will be found in this full but compact octavo volume. The compiler's discrimination is equalled only by the labor which that word implies, and future historians will acknowledge their indebtedness to him for his extraordinary pains. The record opens with the result of the Presidential election of 1860, and the table of votes arrests attention at once, so strikingly does it exhibit the anomaly of our present electoral system. Thus: Mr. Lincoln carried 18 States, and yet had only 491,295 more suffrages than Mr. Douglas, who carried only New Jersey and Missouri; and was beaten on the popular vote by 947,289. Of what follows these singular statistics nothing, to our mind, is more instructive than the division headed "Proceedings of the Government in Relation to the Action of the Insurrectionary States." Here will be found the history of the disgraceful concessions by Congress and the "Peace Convention," in order to soften the wrath of the menacing slave power; and the wonder will grow with time that a nation which was so abject on the very brink of its attempted subjugation, rose at the first blow to vindicate the principles which it had just consented to sacrifice for "peace."

The American Angler's Book. By Thaddeus Norris. New Edition, with a Supplement. (E. H. Butler & Co., Philadelphia.)—Mr. Norris has undertaken to supply the omissions of those writers who have preceded him in describing American fishes, and to correct certain erroneous notions about angling, which have arisen from adopting too rigidly the English rules and practices. He also furnishes very clear and minute instruction in the art of making and repairing tackle. These are the distinguishing features of his work, which, for the rest, is unpretentiously written, and free from technicalities. After some general talk about the various kinds of anglers, about the habits and propagation of fish, and about tackle, the author takes up in detail the chief families of sporting-fish, both fresh-water and salt, illustrating most of them with excellent wood-engravings. The supplement is devoted to an account of the salmon rivers of Canada, inland sea-trout, and striped-bass fishing, and pisciculture—which last topic is also treated in chapter 18. In "Dies piscatoriæ" the reader is regaled, in the Waltonian fashion, with the discursive conversations of trout-fishers, whose experience embraces such well-known localities as the Lakes, the Adirondacks, etc The story of the Megalloway, in New Hampshire, borrowed from an old number of the "Knickerbocker," could be better told to-day by any one who has lately tried that fruitful stream, or the six lakes whose waters, mingling with its own, find the ocean through the Androscoggin. A fair amount of humor is interspersed throughout the seven hundred pages which constitute the volume, and is heightened by vignettes drawn pleasantly, if not always with perfect accuracy. The publishers, in conjunction with printer and binder, have done their part very handsomely.

The Radical: A Monthly Magazine devoted to Religion. For sale by Francis, 506 Broadway.—We have in this small but very handsome periodical a remarkable sign of the times. Differ as we may from many of the conclusions found upon its pages, it is certainly a very earnest and a very able magazine. Thus far it has contained three sermons by Samuel Johnson, whom anti-slavery men well know for his untiring witness to their highest aims, and each of them has had a peculiar excellence and value. It will not do for men to answer thoughts and arguments like these with mere abuse, nor will it do to pass them by. They are the criticisms of to-day upon existing facts, and they cannot be demolished by attacking infidelity that perished years and centuries ago. Radical as is this magazine in character as in name, it is eminently reverent and devout. It represents, ably and honestly, the thoughts of very many people in our midst. It has no concealments. It never for one moment tries to seem more orthodox than it really is. It is an interesting fact that among its principal contributors are some of the best workers in the social problems of the time. Thus, Johnson is one, John Weiss another, Wasson a third. Then we have Dr. Furness and Samuel Longfellow, O. B. Frothingham, Robert Collyer, and T. W. Higginson. These names ensure ability. It would seem that they ought also to ensure a circulation and success. Another writer is J. K. Hosmer, author of "The Color Guard," who prints in the December number a few verses that declare him a true poet, as his book declares him a true man of war.

Plymouth Pulpit. Notes from H. W. Beecher's Sermons, with a Sketch of Mr. Beecher and the Lecture Room. By Augusta Moore. (Harper & Bros., New York.)—This book is not so good as "Life Thoughts," and the introduction is not in good rhetoric or good taste; but it contains the secret of Mr. Beecher's wonderful success. It is full of nature, poetry, and common sense.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

The Resources of California. By John S. Hittel. A. Roman & Co., San Francisco; W. J. Widdleton, New York.

The Two Hungry Kittens. By Theodore Tilton. Tibbals & Whiting, New York.

The Seven Great Hymns of the Mediæval Church. Anson D. F. Randolph, New York.

Reconstruction in America. By a Member of the New York Bar. W. I. Pooley, New York.

The Late English Poets. Edited by Richard Henry Stoddard. Bunce & Huntington, New York.

Winifred Bertram and the World She Lived In. By the Author of "The Schönberg-Cotta Family."—The Song Without Words. Leaves from a very Old Book. Dedicated to Children. By the Same. M. W. Dodd, New York.

Eva: A Goblin Romance. By John Savage. James B. Kirker, New York.

Obscure Diseases of the Brain and Mind. By Forbes Winslow, M.D., D.C.L. Second American from the Third and Revised English Edition. Henry C. Lea, Philadelphia.

Inner Rome: Political, Religious, and Social. By the Rev. C. M. Butler, D.D. J. B. Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia. (Sheldon & Co., New York.)

Cotton Stealing. A Novel. John R. Walsh & Co., Chicago.

A Youth's History of the Rebellion. Vol. III. Murfreesboro' to Fort Pillow. By William M. Thayer.—Spectacles for Young Eyes. Rome. By Sarah W. Lander. Walker, Fuller & Co., Boston. (O. S. Felt, New York.)

Fine Arts.

AMERICAN PICTURES ON EXHIBITION.

There are many valuable European pictures now on exhibition in New York, and we hope to find, before long, time and space to discuss them. During this reign of the French and Belgian painters the American artists are not very demonstrative. Mr. Ward's "Indian Hunter" and his portrait bust of Dr. Dewey are still to be seen—the one at Mr. Snedecor's, the other at Mr. Schaus's gallery. There are several small pictures at "Goupil's," three by Mr. J. B. Irving, who painted "The Musical Monk," of which little picture we spoke some weeks ago. His work shows the effect of European training, and he paints with care and a certain acquired skilfulness. But there is nothing in any of his pictures which we have yet seen which demands or justifies serious criticism as of a work of art. None of his pictures are of any subject in particular or reflect the painter's interest in anything in particular. A small one now to be seen in Mr. Knoedler's gallery represents two "Wine-Tasters," gentlemen in costume of the eighteenth century, one in a blue coat and the other in a red, with the necessary accessories in the way of costume and furniture. It is skilfully painted—admitting of comparison with French and Belgian work, which the pictures of but few American painters will—and is utterly valueless and uninteresting. The picture will not be looked at; it will be glanced at, remarked upon, praised, and bought, and will find oblivion in a fashionably furnished drawing-room as a part of the fashionable furniture. There is a gleam of human interest in "What is the Matter with my Foot?" a little picture of two children. It has been removed by its purchaser. A female head, "Spring," is expressive; is probably a portrait, though not purporting to be so; is delicate and girlish, and very American, and seems to have been painted rapidly and easily, and yet effectively. Mr. Irving is certainly able to do much. His work is not "promising," only because it does not promise that he will try to do anything. The temptations in his path will be great not to try at all, or think at all, but to paint little pictures in Düsseldorf fashion, and sell them at good prices. Our hopes are not high, but it is worthy to be recorded that there is this American painter who is not unaware that the "business of a painter is—to paint."

Mr. Eugene Benson has no such knowledge or belief. A picture by him is in Mr. Knoedler's gallery, representing a young lady in the corner of a sofa, evidently the same young lady, apparently the same sofa, and nearly the same attitude as those to be seen in a picture in the Artists' Fund Exhibition, No. 134. In our notice of that exhibition we did not allude to this latter picture. Mr. Benson's contribution-picture to the Fund we mentioned as a poor landscape. These two in-door pieces are perhaps better. Perhaps Mr. Benson may yet find a subject that he can paint. As yet he has not found it. There is nothing in his painting of landscape to lead one to suppose that he has ever been in the country. There is nothing in his painting of interiors to lead one to suppose that he has ever been inside of a furnished house. His skill in drawing the figure, in rendering effects of light or in giving local color, is what would have been expected of Kaspar Häuser the day after his release from the dungeon of his childhood.

In the second room is a collection of drawings by Mr. T. C. Farrer—as a collection, and many of them singly, of unusual interest. There are twenty-two in all. Of these all are in water color but four, which are in pencil.

Water-color drawing is not a well-known or much practised art in this country. It is generally left to the more modest and painstaking students. Few of the painters who have acquired any considerable skill or any useful reputation care to practise it, and the more dashing and insolent students generally disregard it. But it is not necessary that any of the advocates of this art should plead for it. Every one knows that great things may be done in it; and successful drawings on public exhibition speak for the art better than words can.

The subjects of thirteen of the eighteen water-color drawings are small groups of fruit of the size of the reality. That sounds rather commonplace, and yet there is a certain novelty in the choice of some of the subjects. Four bananas, two yellow, one red, and one green; a great red pineapple (so red that the spectators are generally offended with it, as if red pineapples were unheard of); two hard, red apples and an immense yellow pear; a group, of which the central personage is a great, hard, knobby, run-to-seed, orange-yellow summer-squash, with red apples, butternuts, English walnuts, and one shagbark for its neighbors—all are odd enough. They are generally well chosen for the effect which the artist has sought—strength of shade and shadow and an almost deceptive projection, united with full local color. Consider, for instance, one of the most remarkable of the drawings—that one which represents an orange, a lemon, and a banana. All three fruits are in strong, full color, and all three stand out from the dark background in almost complete rotundity. There is certainly a very unusual facility shown, and the more closely one looks into the work to see how it was done, the more remarkable this skill appears. It is the result of a long course of laborious and well-directed study.

In criticizing these drawings in respect to their absolute artistic merit, we have only praise to offer. They surpass our previous experience of such things in the completeness of the success achieved. And the end which has been kept so steadily in view and so successfully reached, is not an ignoble one. It is essential, however, that we should point out this fact, that on this system of work landscapes cannot be painted, nor extensive and complicated subjects. Full color and projection are not to be had together in all pictures, but only in simple, feebly-lighted, in-door subjects. People who look at these drawings are quick to say that the manner is Rembrandtesque. So, indeed, it is, though recognizing local color more frankly than most of Rembrandt's work. Well, landscapes are not rightly to be painted in Rembrandt's manner, nor open air or daylight scenes of any kind; but best a head with plumed hat and jewelled aigret, or gleaming gold and glass.

In Mr. Farrer's drawing of an orange the whole fruit is darker than in nature, but the proportions of light and darkness and the relations of light to darkness are, doubtless, those of nature. The brightest light on a real orange will generally be inimitable with paint on paper. The artist, in the instance before us, has matched the color of the brightest part of the orange, his imitation being then, of necessity, lower in tone. Now, if he wants the orange to be round, he must make his darkest shade as much darker than the natural darkest shade as his high light is darker than the natural high light.* If the subject goes down to very dark shades, indeed, his work is lost in blackness long before nature is. This will not be so bad as long as our subject is simple and lighted by the feeble light of in-doors. But, obviously, landscape subjects defy such sort of work, and landscape pictures painted after this manner would be unduly tenebrous. In fact, something of the manner which has succeeded here has been tried in the picture of "Northampton," at the Artists' Fund Exhibition, and seems to be one of the two principal causes of the comparative failure of that picture as a work of art.

* Even then it will not project quite as much as the reality; we see the orange with two eyes and see around it, not around the painted image.

The backgrounds are happily chosen. The fruit in the drawings of the great master of this kind of subject, William Hunt, is generally laid on the ground, with a bit of moss or grass for background. There is something incongruous in the juxtaposition by a bank-side of a pear and a bunch of grapes, or an apple, three plums, and a handful of nuts. But the same group on a plate or table-cloth is comprehensible and looks real.

Probably the most admirable drawing of the collection, considering difficulty of subject, success in treating it, and beauty of result, is that of the purple and yellow plums. If any beholder should urge (as we think no one should) as a positive objection against these drawings that something is sacrificed to get projection, he will find this of the plums scarcely open to that objection. It is, moreover, very lovely in color. But some of the darkest and most lowered in tone are almost equally excellent. The round picture of two hard red apples and a yellow pear is an admirable instance of work well bestowed. Every stroke tells. The four bananas and the strawberries are faultless.

The inevitable tendency of this sort of work is shown by the little drawing of three eggs. Each egg is rounded with great subtlety of gradation into its complete form. But, in doing this, the painter has been compelled to lower the tone of the whole, and they are not white eggs that we have. That they were meant to be, the high light seems to show. But white or colored, the shaded side of an egg in daylight is not, by many degrees, as dark as the shaded side of one of these.

The drawing of the white lily plant is not wholly successful, nor free from what seem grave faults of color. The dead blue-jays are beautiful.

That is a good thought of the gilded mats or passe-partouts that hold the drawings of the plums, the strawberries, and the lily. Mr. Knoedler's assistant says that they do not cost as much as the passe-partouts of white paper. There was a silver mat within a gold frame, holding a drawing by Miss Siddal (now Mrs. Rossetti), in the first English Exhibition of 1858.

MUSIC.

MUSICAL TALK.

CONSIDERABLE discussion has been excited lately in England by the election of a professor of music in the Edinburgh University. Endowments of this kind are rare, and few professorships have so large an income. Some thirty years ago General Reid, an amateur flute-player and an ardent lover of music, died at Edinburgh, and, by his will, left about £52,000 as an endowment for this professorship. The present income of the chair is about £1,000, and there is also provision made for an annual grand concert, the conducting of which is one of the duties of the professor. Few other chairs are so well cushioned, and the musical professors of most universities have an exceedingly scanty income, or none at all. This was one of the few prizes in the musicians' lottery, and afforded a fine, easy place for one who was willing to endure the dulness of Edinburgh, with occasional opportunities of getting away, and with plenty of leisure for the production of great works. Several good musicians offered themselves as candidates, among others Mr. Macfarren and Mr. Hullah. The blindness of the former was a disqualification, but Mr. Hullah's great services in the cause of popular music, his fine lectures on its history, and his excellence as a music director, demanded public recognition and gratitude in some way, and he was accordingly quite prominent on the list.

But only a few days before the election a new candidate came forward in the person of Mr. Herbert S. Oakeley, B.A., of Christ Church, Oxford, younger son to a baronet, cousin to a ducal family, an ardent amateur of music, a player on the organ, and a writer of intelligent musical criticisms for a weekly paper. For him the majority of the "University Court" voted, and he was consequently elected, simply because he was a "gentleman by birth and education," and not because he was a proficient in the art he now attempts to profess. No doubt it was much more pleasing to Sir David Brewster, Dr. Wood, and Dr. John Brown, and the rest, who know nothing of music, to have a gentleman as professor whom they would like to meet at dinner, than to select one on account of talent alone. But it was hardly fair to the musicians, or to the university, or to the rest of the world. The university ought to have a teacher who is more than an amateur; the musicians ought to have some claim on the few good places that are reserved for them, and the objection that they are not gentlemen should not be raised when they are applying for a professional position, when society has always insisted that their occupation was in its very nature low and degrading; and the world might demand that Edinburgh should recognize genius in the way in which great continental bodies are very glad to do. But the matter is decided, at least for the present, that the chief qualification for an Edinburgh professor is to have a "good social status," and to be "a thorough gentleman in all respects." We quote from the testimonials.

It is not claimed by any one that Mr. Oakeley is a master of his art; that he knows how to write for an orchestra, or to conduct a band, which is one of his duties. It is as though a man should be elected professor of Sanscrit because he, besides being a gentleman, liked the language and knew how to write its alphabet.

We only add that since his election the musical professor has left England for some months to resume his duties as a travelling tutor on the Continent. Comment is needless on this discreditable fact.

—From the Journal of the Society of Arts we obtain some information with regard to the Conservatoire Impériale de Musique et de Déclamation of Paris. Auber is the director, the secretary is Alfred de Beauchesne, the librarian Hector Berlioz, and the director of the school is Duvernoy. There are 36 professors. The pupils number about 600, all of whom are outsiders except twelve young men in the vocal class, who are lodged, clothed, and fed in the building. The same number of female pupils receive a compensation of 800 francs a year for two years, in lieu of board. The tuition is free. All the in-door pupils and pensionnaires are bound to appear, if required, at any of the operas or theatres receiving a subvention from the government, and no pupil in the schools is permitted to appear in public without the special authority of the direction. Candidates for admission are required to apply in person, and must be between the ages of nine and twenty-two. Foreigners may be admitted by authorization of the Minister of State.

There are five provincial schools—at Lille, Toulouse, Marseilles, Metz, and Nantes—which have the title of succursales of the Conservatoire. That of Toulouse exerts a very powerful influence.

The education is divided into eight sections: 1. Sol fa, scales, and oral harmony. 2. Singing. 3. Lyrical declamation. 4. Piano and harp. 5. Stringed instruments. 6. Wind instruments. 7. Thorough-bass, organ, and composition. 8. Dramatic declamation. There are also courses of popular singing for adults, superior to those in the common schools. There is a fine library of music, and of works relating to music and the drama, and this is open not only to the pupils, but also to the public. There is also a good collection of musical instruments, to which the public are admitted on certain days. The Conservatoire contains a complete theatre, a concert-room, and class rooms, besides the offices, libraries, and apartments for pupils. The annual competitions take place in July, and last about twelve days. They are nearly all public, and are held in the theatre. As the theatre holds only 900 persons, on the occasions of the competition in opera, tragedy, and comedy the demand for places is very great. The prizes are awarded by a jury of nine members, who decide on each class before the next one is heard. The prizes are either instruments, books of music, or medals, besides diplomas in all cases. The awards this year amounted to 36 first prizes, 38 second prizes, 7 third prizes, and 81 accessits, in addition to 56 medals given to the pupils in Sol fa. Two of the prize-holders were immediately engaged by the director of the opera, and lately appeared with success, Mlle. Mauduit as Alice in "Robert," and Mlle. Bloch as Azucena in "Trovatore."

The Conservatoire is not the only musical institution in France supported by the State. The communal schools in Paris all teach music, and there are, besides, the Ecole de la Musique Religieuse and several other schools.

BE SURE AND EXAMINE
OUR LARGE AND CHEAP STOCK
OF
HOLIDAY BOOKS AND ALBUMS
BEFORE PURCHASING.

TIBBALS & WHITING,
37 Park Row and 145 Nassau Street, N. Y.

SEND IMMEDIATELY FOR OUR

HOLIDAY GEM,

A little book containing—

Calendar for 1866;
Post-office Regulations, and how to send money safe;
A Doctor's experience in Cholera in 1840, '55, and '65, and Receipt for Cure;
Fourteen Reasons for not engaging in Stock Speculations;
The kind of Books we want in this age for our Children.
It will tell you where to get your Books and other articles good and cheap for the Holidays.

Sent for 5 cents, post free.

TIBBALS & WHITING,
37 Park Row, and 145 Nassau Street, New York.

Another Sensation Novel,

FROM A VERY HIGH SOURCE

(intellectually), as any discriminating reader will see before perusing many pages, is

H E R M A N :

OR,

YOUNG KNIGHTHOOD.

The vicissitudes and changes of human life, in almost every phase, are drawn by the hand of a master in the pages of this graphic work. It cannot be read without leaving a most salutary impression upon every mind and heart. We call it a "Sensation Novel," not in the offensive sense in which the term is frequently applied to the wishy-washy emanations of the press, intended to pander to the most depraved tastes, but in that higher, better, and ennobling sense which we apply to the best productions of Scott, Irving, or Dickens. Buy it and read it as soon as published, and see if we over-estimate its power. Copies sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

READY DEC. 30.

LEE & SHEPARD, PUBLISHERS,
149 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

M A S T E R F O X !

NOW READY:

THE WOOING OF MASTER FOX.

BY

SIR EDWARD BULWER LYTTON, BART.

ARRANGED FOR CHILDREN BY O. D. MARTIN.

It is most elegantly illustrated with designs by White, superbly printed in six oil colors, bound in fine morocco muslin by Pauson & Nicholson, making it altogether the prettiest book for children yet issued. Price $1 50. Mailed on receipt of price.

Published by

ASHMEAD & EVANS, PUBLISHERS,
724 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS OF PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL,

501 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

In addition to our main business of PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS, we are Headquarters for the following, viz.:

STEREOSCOPES AND STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS.

Of these we have an immense assortment, including War Scenes, American and Foreign Cities and Landscapes, Groups, Statuary, etc., etc.; also, Revolving Stereoscopes, for public or private exhibition. Our Catalogue will be sent to any address on receipt of

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS.

We were the first to introduce these into the United States, and we manufacture immense quantities in great variety, ranging in price from 50 cents to $50 each. Our ALBUMS have the reputation of being superior in beauty and durability to any others They will be sent by mail, FREE, on receipt of price.

☞ FINE ALBUMS MADE TO ORDER. ☜

CARD PHOTOGRAPHS.

Our Catalogue now embraces over FIVE THOUSAND different subjects, to which additions are continually being made of Portraits of Eminent Americans—viz., about

100 Major-Generals,	100 Lieut.-Colonels,	550 Statesmen
200 Brig.-Generals,	250 Other Officers,	130 Divines,
275 Colonels,	75 Navy Officers,	125 Authors,
40 Artists,	125 Stage,	50 Prominent Women.

3,000 Copies of Works of Art,

including reproductions of the most celebrated Engravings, Paintings, Statues, etc. Catalogues sent on receipt of stamp. An order for One Dozen PICTURES from our Catalogue will be filled on the receipt of $1 80, and sent by mail FREE.

Photographers and others ordering goods C. O. D., will please remit twenty-five per cent. of the amount with their orders.

☞ Soldiers' Pocket Albums for 18 pictures, 75 cents.
☞ The price and quality of our goods cannot fail to satisfy.

THE BEST HOLIDAY GIFT

FOR

BOYS AND GIRLS

Is a Year's Subscription to

THE LITTLE CORPORAL.

Acknowledged by the leading papers to be the Best Children's Paper in America!

Published Monthly by

ALFRED L. SEWELL,

Chicago, Illinois.

PRICE ONE DOLLAR A YEAR, IN ADVANCE,
Including a
BEAUTIFUL STEEL ENGRAVING AS A PREMIUM TO EVERY SUBSCRIBER.

SAMPLE COPY, TEN CENTS.
CIRCULARS SENT FREE.

Every person who shall send six subscribers, and six dollars, will receive as a premium one extra copy for one year, and also a copy of the Engraving.

Other inducements for larger clubs.

All pages are electrotyped, and back numbers can always be furnished.

READ WHAT THE PAPERS SAY:

"It already excels every children's paper that we know of in this country."—Chicago Evening Journal.

THE LITTLE CORPORAL.—The Pittsburg Christian Advocate says: "The best paper for children published in this great country of ours, is The Little Corporal. It is a gem in the catalogue of monthlies."

Forney's Philadelphia Daily Press says of it: "The Little Corporal is destined to become the great children's paper of America."

"We cannot say too much in favor of this beautiful paper."—Bryan [O.] Press.

"The Little Corporal sparkles all over with vivacity and entertainment. It is, without doubt, the best and cheapest children's gazette published anywhere."—Marshall [Mich.] Statesman.

"THE LITTLE CORPORAL.—Though modestly calling itself by a subordinate title, it is really a very major-general among the children's magazines."—Chenango Telegraph [Norwich, N. Y.]

"The Little Corporal is the most interesting and instructive monthly in the Union."—Louisville Democrat.

"The Little Corporal is universally admitted to be the best juvenile paper now in existence."—Dubuque Daily Times.

"We like it better than ever."—N. W. C. Advocate.

"It strikes the right key, and is admirable—neither heavy nor silly, but simple, fresh, buoyant, and earnest."—Adams [N. Y.] Visitor.

"Its influence for good can never be estimated."—Grand Haven News.

"Indeed, there is no paper of the kind published that approaches it as a juvenile journal."—Poughkeepsie Daily Press.

"Of all the children's papers which are competitors for the patronage of the public, we know of no one which so nearly approximates to our standard of what such a paper should be. The terms are most liberal."—Batavia [N. Y.] Republican Advocate.

"The children will be better and happier from reading it."—Henry [Ill.] Courier.

"The Little Corporal really excels any child's paper we have seen. The premium picture is of itself worth a year's subscription."—Sandusky [O.] Reg.

"We consider it the best, decidedly the best, journal of the kind for children that we ever saw."—Star of the Valley [Newville, Pa.]

"We have the first two numbers of The Little Corporal, which are edited with unusual ability. They sparkle with originality, and are attractive on every page."—Worcester [Mass.] Palladium.

"The Little Corporal is the most readable and interesting and instructive paper for children we have ever perused."—Farmington [Maine] Chronicle.

"It is the cleverest thing of its kind yet realized in America."—Roxbury [Mass.] Journal.

"THE LITTLE CORPORAL.—Certainly, we have seen nothing in the shape of a child's paper which could compare with this, which comes to us from over the prairies."—Portland [Maine] Daily Press.

The above are only a tithe of the many beautiful notices our young soldier has received.

Address ALFRED L. SEWELL,
Care of Dunlop, Sewell & Spalding,
CHICAGO, ILL.

YE WHO ARE SOON TO START

ON

LIFE'S ACTIVE JOURNEY,

And who would have two beautiful characters as examples, read the story of HERMAN and CONSTANCE, in a book soon to be published by

LEE & SHEPARD,

BOSTON,

ENTITLED

H E R M A N;

OR,

YOUNG KNIGHTHOOD,

And there learn what constitutes noble MANHOOD and WOMANHOOD; see what can be borne and forborne for principle, and the triumphant results of duty nobly done.

It will be ready about December 30.

In two handsome volumes. Price, $3 50.

"PHYSIOGNOMY."—Ideality, Idiots, Imagination, Imitation (with 14 cuts). PSYCHOLOGY—Dr. Doddridge's Dream; Influence of Mind over Body; Foreseeing and Ghost-Seeing; Foreknowing; Ghosts and Prophets; Scriptural View of Apparitions, in PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL for Jan. 20 cents, or $2 a year. New vol.

STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS OF THE WAR,

obtained at great expense, and forming a

COMPLETE PHOTOGRAPHIC HISTORY

OF THE

GREAT UNION CONTEST.

Bull Run,	Dutch Gap,	Strawberry Plains,
Yorktown,	Pontoon Trains,	Deep Bottom,
Gettysburg,	Hanover Junction,	Belle Plain,
Fair Oaks,	Lookout Mountain,	Monitors,
Savage Station,	Chickahominy,	Chattanooga,
Fredericksburg,	City Point,	Fort Morgan,
Fairfax,	Nashville,	Atlanta,
Richmond,	Charleston,	Mobile,
Petersburg,	Etc., Etc.	Etc., Etc.

Everybody is interested in these memorable scenes.

Just published by

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

501 Broadway, New York.

☞ Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.

"OUR SOCIAL RELATIONS."—Love and Lovers; The World's Verdict, by Mrs. George Washington Wyllys; Love without Reason; Old Men's Children; Dress and Disease; Ventilation, in the Jan. No. PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, 20 cents. FOWLER & WELLS, N. Y.

THAT OUR ESTIMATE OF

H E R M A N;

OR,

YOUNG KNIGHTHOOD,

Is not overdrawn, we publish below the opinion of "GAIL HAMILTON." Her indorsement is full, complete, emphatic:

"But a story or a poem may comprehend the whole duty of man. I have read such a one. I recollect "Herman, or Young Knighthood,' which contained not only more wit, but more wisdom; not only more beauty, but more grandeur; not only more play of fancy, more power of imagination, more directness of purpose, more felicity of expression, and more elegance of diction, but more knowledge of human nature, more soundness of judgment; grander conceptions of human aspirations and human capacity to love and to suffer, to enjoy, to act, to die, and to rise again; a vaster sweep of thought; broader generalization; more comprehensive views; more logical and accurate reasoning; nicer analysis, and a higher standard of Christian manhood, than you would find in a column of your 'solid reading' that would reach from Maine to Georgia."—Gail Hamilton's "Country Living and Country Thinking."

READY DECEMBER 30.

LEE & SHEPARD, PUBLISHERS,

149 Washington Street, Boston,

NEW YORK CITY DESCRIBED.—Metropolitan Facts and Figures (with a View of the City); Advice to a Student. ETHNOLOGY—Heads and Hats; Ethnological Types in Canada; French and English Types (illustrated), in Jan. No. PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, 20 cents.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,

LONDON,

Have for sale at their American Agency,

129 GRAND STREET, NEW YORK,

A general stock of their

BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED AND ELEGANTLY BOUND BOOKS FOR LIBRARIES, PUBLIC AND PRIVATE.

Also for Presentation Books for the Holidays. Among others,

MOXON'S OLD DRAMATISTS.
9 vols. royal 8vo, half calf, $60.

LANE'S ARABIAN NIGHTS.
3 vols. 8vo, cloth, $15.

BULWER'S (Sir E. L.) NOVELS AND TALES.
23 vols. crown 8vo, cloth, $35; or the 23 vols. bound in 20, half calf, extra, $60; half Roxburgh, $62 50.

——WITH THE DRAMAS AND POEMS.
25 vols., full calf, $110.

DISRAELI'S (Isaac) WORKS.
In 7 vols. crown 8vo, half calf, $22 50; consisting of The Curiosities of Literature, 3 vols.; The Amenities of Literature, 2 vols.; The Quarrels and Calamities of Authors, 1 vol.; The Literary Character of Men of Genius, 1 vol.

BOSWELL'S LIFE OF DR. JOHNSON.
Including the Tour to the Hebrides. With numerous illustrations. 5 vols. 12mo, cloth, $6 50; half calf, extra, $15.

WOOD'S ILLUSTRATED NATURAL HISTORY.
With many hundred engravings by Harrison Weir and others, 3 vols. royal 8vo, cloth, $22 50; half calf, $27 50; full calf, $32 50; full morocco, $35.

STAUNTON'S MAGNIFICENT EDITION OF SHAKESPEARE.
With many hundred illustrations by John Gilbert. 3 vols. royal 8vo, cloth, $22 50; half calf, $27 50; full calf, $32 50; full morocco, $35.

——A new library edition, printed in a large new type on toned paper, but without the illustrations, 4 vols. 8vo, cloth, $17 50; half calf, $25; full calf, $30; tree calf, $35.

KNIGHT'S PICTORIAL SHAKESPEARE.
With all the illustrations, etc., of the original edition, upwards of 1,000 in number. 8 vols. royal 8vo, cloth, $50; half calf, extra, $70.

A ROUND OF DAYS.
Described in original poems by some of the most celebrated poets, and in thirty eight pictures by eminent artists, engraved in the very highest style of art by the Brothers Dalziel. 4to, cloth, $10; full morocco, $15.

HOME THOUGHTS AND HOME SCENES.
In original poems by the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," Amelia B. Edwards, and others. Illustrated in a series of thirty-five exquisite pictures from drawings by A. B. Houghton, engraved by the Brothers Dalziel. 4to, cloth, gilt edges, $10; full morocco, $15.

THE PARABLES OF OUR LORD AND SAVIOUR JESUS CHRIST.
Illustrated in forty-seven pictures from drawings by John E. Millais, engraved by the Brothers Dalziel. 4to, cloth, gilt edges, $10; full morocco, $15.

BIRKET FOSTER'S PICTURES OF ENGLISH LANDSCAPE.
Containing thirty elaborate illustrations, engraved by the Brothers Dalziel. 4to, cloth, gilt edges, $10; full morocco, $15.

 Send for a copy of new complete catalogue.

THE TWO PATHS OF LIFE.—How to Rise, and How to Fall. Effects of Temperance and of Dissipation. Useful for young men. See Jan. No. PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. 20 cents. FOWLER & WELLS, N. Y.

Announcement Extraordinary.

READY DEC. 30.

THE WONDERFUL TALE ENTITLED

H E R M A N;

OR,

YOUNG KNIGHTHOOD,

Which sent an electric thrill through every reader, as it appeared, from week to week, in the National Era, is in press, and will soon be published in two handsome 12mo vols., by

LEE & SHEPARD,

149 Washington Street, Boston.

Advance orders from the Trade solicited.

GET READY! GET THE BEST!

A New Volume! Look out for January Pictorial Double No. of the Illustrated PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, with Physiognomy, or "Signs of Character;" Ethnology, or the Races of Men; Physiology, the Laws of Life and Health; Phrenology and the Temperaments, with choice of pursuits; Psychology, the Science of the Soul; Our Social Relations, including Love, Courtship, and Marriage; Education and Self-Improvement, with such other matters as all ought to know, and can be found in no other publication. It is the best and cheapest work of its size and price. Terms—$2 a year; single numbers 20 cts. Subscribe at once. Address Messrs. FOWLER & WELLS, 389 Broadway, New York.

HEADS OF THE PEOPLE.—John Bright; Rufus Choate; John Marshall; Sir Matthew Hale, with Portraits, Characters, and Biographies. Also, Flat-Headed Indians; Our Claims on England; Patrick O'Rourk and the Frogs; Engineering; Immortality; A Happy New Year, in the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL for January—$2 a year. FOWLER & WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, N. Y.

H E R M A N ;

OR,

YOUNG KNIGHTHOOD,

Will be Published Dec. 30.

The author of the above charming Tale has dedicated it as follows:

"TO THE MOTHERS

OF

Putnam, Shaw, and the Lowells,

These volumes are dedicated,

IN REVERENT SYMPATHY."

A beautiful and touching tribute to the noble and brave, and a book in every way worthy of such a dedication.

LEE & SHEPARD, PUBLISHERS,

149 Washington Street.

Two volumes 12mo, price $3 50. Copies sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

THE GREAT LAWYER AND THE GREAT JUDGE,

Rufus Choate and John Marshall. See their portraits and character in Jan. Double No. PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. 20 cents, a year $2. FOWLER & WELLS, N. Y.

The Most Tasteful and Elegant

BOOKS FOR HOLIDAY PRESENTS

ARE THE VOLUMES OF THE

GOLDEN TREASURY SERIES,

Affording from their variety of character a great choice for different tastes and ages. They are all printed in the most elegant style at the University Press, and are bound in a neat vellum cloth, gilt tops.

THE SERIES COMPRISES:

I. THE GOLDEN TREASURY
of the best Songs and Lyrical Poems in the English Language. Selected and arranged by FRANCIS TURNER PALGRAVE. 16mo, vellum cloth, price $1 75. One of the best selections in the language.

II. THE CHILDREN'S GARLAND.
From the best poets. Selected and arranged by COVENTRY PATMORE. 16mo, vellum cloth, price $1 75.

III. THE BOOK OF PRAISE.
From the best English hymn-writers. Selected and arranged by ROUNDELL PALMER. 16mo, vellum cloth, price $1 75. A very choice collection of sacred poetry.

IV. THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS
From this world to that which is to come. By JOHN BUNYAN. With illustrations by Stothard. 16mo, vellum cloth, price $1 75.

V. A BOOK OF GOLDEN DEEDS
of all Times and all Lands. Gathered and narrated by the author of the "Heir of Redclyffe." 16mo, vellum cloth, price $1 75. A most delightful book.

VI. THE JEST BOOK.
The choicest Anecdotes and Sayings. Selected and arranged by MARK LEMON. 16mo, vellum cloth, price $1 75.

VII. THE BALLAD BOOK.
A selection of the choicest of British ballads. Edited by WILLIAM ALLINGHAM. 16mo, vellum cloth, price $1 75. Just published.

VIII. THE SUNDAY BOOK OF POETRY.
Selected and arranged by C. F. ALEXANDER. 16mo, vellum cloth, price $1 75. Just published.

For the Young Folks.

IX. DREAM CHILDREN.
By the author of "Seven Little People and Their Friends." 16mo, vellum cloth, price $1 25. The most charming juvenile that has been issued for years; full of individuality.

All the above sold separately or together, as a set, in a neat box. They are also for sale in all varieties of calf and morocco bindings.

AN IMPORTANT WORK FOR EVERY AMERICAN!

DE TOCQUEVILLE'S DEMOCRACY IN AMERICA.

Translated by HENRY REEVE, Esq. Edited, with Notes, the translation Revised and in great part Rewritten, and the Additions made to the recent Paris Editions now first translated, by FRANCIS BOWEN, Alford Professor of Moral Philosophy in Harvard University. Elegantly printed on linen paper at the University Press. Maroon vellum. 2 vols. post 8vo, price $6; half calf, $10; full calf, $12.

For sale by all booksellers, or sent free by mail on receipt of price by the publishers,

SEVER & FRANCIS,

CAMBRIDGE, MASS.

"SIGNS OF CHARACTER" in HANDWRITING and in SHAKING HANDS. What do they signify? See Jan. No. PICTORIAL PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. 20 cents, or $2 a year. FOWLER & WELLS.

English Magazines, Newspapers, and Periodicals.

WILLMER & ROGERS,

47 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

(ESTABLISHED 1844),

Supply on Subscription every Magazine, Newspaper, or Periodical published in Great Britain or on the Continent of Europe.

PRICE-LIST FOR 1866 NOW READY.

GET READY! GET THE BEST! GET THE PICTORIAL DOUBLE ILLUSTRATED PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, January number, with Physiognomy, Phrenology, Psychology, Ethnology. A year, $2. FOWLER & WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

FINANCIAL REVIEW.

NATION OFFICE, Saturday Evening,
Dec. 23, 1865.

WITH the approach of the holidays, business of all kinds naturally falls off, with the single exception of those branches which are connected with the season. The importations for the week are again heavy, $6,463,000 in gold; the exports are rather larger than usual, in consequence of some liberal shipments of cotton, which, at present prices, produce a large amount of exchange. For the month of October the importations at this port were over $23,000,000, against $10,000,000 same month last year, and nearly $17,000,000 same month of 1863; the exports were also $23,000,000—which is not much over the average for the season—but the latter, it will be remembered, are counted in paper, and only pay for about $16,000,000 of imports. In importing circles a large spring business is expected, and, unless the Treasury Department succeed in compelling the banks to curtail their discounts, it will doubtless be a profitable one. All sections of the country, except parts of the South, are prepared to consume large quantities of goods at high prices, so long as the pending bank expansion lasts. During the winter season it will not be safe to look for any material increase in our exports, unless the price of cotton should advance in England; but with the spring renewed specie exports on a large scale and considerable shipments of provisions and breadstuffs may be expected.

Congress, on the motion of Mr. Alley, of Massachusetts, passed almost unanimously, on the 18th, a resolution "cordially concurring with the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the necessity of the contraction of the currency," and "pledging co-operative action to that end as speedily as possible." Parties interested in national banks have clung to the hope that Congress would resist contraction, in view of the widespread mischief which a steadfast pursuance of that policy might involve. It is now apparent that such hopes are delusive. Now, as heretofore during the past four years, Congress will act in strict accordance with the wishes of the Treasury Department. So far as legislative action and Executive effort can go, contraction is certain; were it not that the laws of finance are superior to Congressional enactments and Department regulations, it might be safely predicted that the paper money of the country would soon be reduced to a moderate volume. Neither Congress nor the Secretary, however, can effect sales of bonds above their market price, or cancel paper money so long as every dollar received is required for the payment of public debts. Contraction is thus adopted on all sides as the true policy for the Government, but its practical application is postponed to a convenient opportunity. This was the gist of the remarks of the Secretary of the Treasury to the financial people who called upon him on his visit to this city yesterday. Within a few weeks a new "proposal for funding" will probably be issued, with a view to extinguish fifty millions more of interest-bearing legal tenders and debt certificates. And before many months elapse, a new loan—probably 5-20 bonds—to the extent of $150,000,000, may possibly be placed on the market to supply the remaining deficit in the budget of the current fiscal year, and to diminish the volume of temporary deposits. Until these loans have been placed, it will hardly be the policy of the Department to create disturbance in the money market.

Money has remained easy all the week. Call loans range from 6 to 7 per cent. Mercantile paper sells at 7 to 10 per cent. for prime names. At this season of the year money flows to the city from the country. There are many who expect a 4 to 5 per cent. money market in February. This, however, will depend on the policy of the Treasury Department. A considerable curtailment of compound legal tenders would lead to a scramble for greenbacks and to high rates for money.

Both gold and exchange have been inactive throughout the week. The former has fluctuated between 145 and 146¼; the latter between 109¼ and 109⅜ for bankers' signatures. There is little or no speculation going on in gold; the only excitement left to the Gold Room is occasioned by the sales of Government, which swell the Sub-Treasurer's apparent balance without reducing the premium on specie.

	Dec. 16.	Dec. 23.	Advance.	Decline.
United States Sixes of 1881	107⅞	107½	....	⅜
5-20 Bonds, old	103⅞	103¼	....	⅝
5-20 Bonds of 1865	100	100⅝	⅝	....
10-40 Bonds	91⅞	92¾	⅛	....
7-30 Notes, second series	97¾	98	¼	....
New York Central	96⅜	95⅝	....	⅞

	Dec. 16.	Dec. 23.	Advance.	Decline.
Erie Railway	93¾	95¼	1⅜	....
Hudson River	109⅜	108⅜	. ..	1
Reading Railroad	107 ex d.	107⅜	⅜	...
Michigan Southern	75⅝	74⅝	....	1
Cleveland and Pittsburg	92⅝ ex d.	84⅜	....	8⅛
Chicago and North-Western	36⅜	35⅜	....	1
" " " Preferred	62⅝	61⅝	....	1
Chicago and Rock Island	108	107	....	1
P., Fort Wayne and Chicago	105¾	105¼	....	⅜
Canton	45⅜	45⅜	....	....
Cumberland	44¾	44⅜	....	⅜
Mariposa	15¾	14¾	....	⅝
American Gold	145⅞	145⅜	....	⅜
Bankers' Bills on London	109¾	108¼	...	⅛
Call Loans	7	7	....	...

The week has been an active one in the stock market, with several well-marked features. Of these the chief was a "corner" in Erie. Of this stock a young house, closely connected with a leading director of the Erie Railway Company, has been for some time accumulating a large quantity. On Wednesday last the ball was opened by a recall of all the stock lent out by this house, and by a general refusal to lend any more. The consequence was a general scramble for stock, at the height of which, on Thursday, as much as ½ and ⅝ of 1 per cent. was paid for the use of stock for a single day. For some years Erie has been the favorite stock of Wall Street operators; it is bought and sold in larger quantities than all the other stocks put together. When the temper of the Street is bearish, twice the entire capital stock of the Erie will be sold "short" in three or four days. Taking advantage of this inveterate tendency of the bears of the Stock Exchange, the house in question—which is said to have owned on Thursday evening 65,000 out of the 90,000 shares of Erie in this market—forced up the price to 97 per cent., and inflicted severe losses on "the Street." On Friday, the "corner" was relaxed. Some 8,000 to 10,000 shares were sold, and deliveries were made without much difficulty. The market to-day has been feverish and fluctuating, but there has been no such scarcity of stock as there was on Thursday. The clique bought largely this morning, and many look for a further advance on Tuesday in consequence. The Pittsburg "corner" collapsed last week, the stock selling down at one time to 83½; it improved ¾ to 1 per cent. to-day. The rest of the market has been without material change. Parties are pretty evenly divided between bulls and bears on the Stock Exchange. The former expect inflation to grow out of the continued issue of national bank paper. The latter are confident that McCulloch's policy of contraction will sooner or later involve a general shrinkage in prices.

Among the minor events of the day may be noted the progress of a struggle between the two associations of brokers, the New York Stock Exchange and the Open Board of Brokers. For a year or more the two bodies have worked in harmony; the sessions of the one were at different hours from the sessions of the other; orders from members of the Stock Exchange were executed at the Open Board, and vice versa. On entering their new building, the members of the New York Stock Exchange inaugurated a new policy. They appointed sessions at the hours fixed for the sessions of the Open Board. They threw open their board room to the public; and they passed resolutions declaring that any member who sent orders to be executed at the Open Board should be expelled. To these measures of hostility the Open Board has made no reply. Judging from the printed lists of sales, the new policy has made but little difference in the volume of business transacted at the two boards. Among the brokers there appear to be three parties. There is a party, and apparently a controlling one, in the New York Stock Exchange which purposes to crush out the Open Board. There is a party in the Open Board which is bent on maintaining the existence of that institution as it stands, without regard to the Stock Exchange. And there is a third party, comprising members of both boards, which would like to see a compromise effected by which all responsible stock-brokers should be brought together under one roof, into one market, with a view to the transaction of business on business principles, without needless restrictions or embarrassments. It is difficult to say which of these three parties will prevail. At present, dealers in stocks labor under difficulties. The price of leading stocks often varies ⅛ a ¼ per cent. between the two boards at the same moment; operators cannot tell to which board their orders should be sent, and brokers experience the mortification of discovering that at the time they were buying Erie at 95¼ in the Stock Exchange, it was offered at 95 in the Open Board; or that while they were selling Pittsburg at 85 in the Open Board, 85¼ was bid in the building above.

BROWN, BROTHERS & CO.,
56 WALL STREET,
Issue, in New York, Circular Credits for Travellers, available in any part of the world

CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD

STATE AID BONDS.

Interest at the rate of

SEVEN PER CENT. PER ANNUM IN GOLD,

Payable Semi-Annually.

GUARANTEED AND PAID BY THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA.

The Bonds are secured by a mortgage on 160 miles of road, from Sacramento to the California State Line, forming part of the great Pacific Railroad Route, adopted and aided by the United States Government. They are further secured by a Sinking Fund of $50,000 in gold per annum, reserved from the earnings of the road, and pledged for their redemption. They are a first-class security in every respect, and a limited amount will be offered upon terms which render them a very attractive and desirable investment.

For further particulars inquire at our Office, No. 5 NASSAU ST.

FISK & HATCH, BANKERS.

GIFTS FOR CHRISTMAS AND NEW YEAR'S.

The interchange of presents among friends is the very surest cement of friendship. To confer a gift proves forethought, a desire to please, to serve, to be useful to a friend. Every one desires to be thought of by his or her friends when absent. To provide a present for a friend who is at a distance, is the most certain proof that you are thinking of that person.

If to think of our friends' present tastes, when at a distance from them, is to show a sincere concern for them, how much more strongly would this concern be manifested if we showed that our interest in them extended away into the future, and provided not for their mere personal gratification, but for their permanent welfare.

No better time could be chosen for advancing the generous principle of Life Insurance as applied to a provision for a wife or family.

If you stand in the relation of parent, can you manifest your affection for a married son or daughter better than by presenting him or her, as a gift, with the means of effecting a Life policy, for the protection of the young family?

If you stand in the relation of a wealthy brother or friend, can you not find an opportunity of making such a gift in a manner that will render it an acceptable compliment and an enduring benefit?

THE UNION MUTUAL

is one of those well-established and prudently managed Life Insurance Companies which distinguish this nation for enlightened benevolence, practical wisdom, and disinterested philanthropy. It offers superior advantages to the life-insuring public. It is based upon fundamental principles of soundness, and gives abundant security in large accumulated funds. Through the admirable economy of its management large dividends are secured to policy-holders. It is prompt in payment of losses, and accommodates the assured in the settlement of their premiums in life policies, by receiving a note for one-half, when the premium amounts to over $30.

THE UNION MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

This is one of the oldest wholly Mutual Life Insurance Companies in the United States, and has been uniformly successful, having always made large returns in Cash dividends to all the policy-holders.

NEW YORK OFFICE, 151 BROADWAY.
J. W. & H. JUDD, GENERAL AGENTS.

FOURTH NATIONAL BANK,

27 & 29 PINE ST., NEW YORK,

Has for sale U. S. 7 3-10 Notes, all sizes; also, One Year Certificates and all other Government Loans.

P. C. CALHOUN, President.
B. SEAMAN, Cashier.
ANTHONY LANE, Asst. Cashier.

NIAGARA FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY,

OFFICE, 12 WALL STREET.

CASH CAPITAL INCREASED TO	$1,000,000
SURPLUS, JAN. 1, 1865,	275,253

Losses equitably adjusted and promptly paid.

CHARTERED 1850.

Cash Dividends paid in fourteen years, 248 per cent.

P. NOTMAN, Secretary. JONATHAN D. STEELE, President.

HOME
INSURANCE COMPANY
OF NEW YORK,
OFFICE, 135 BROADWAY.

Cash Capital, - - - - - - -	$2,000,000 00
Assets, 1st Jan., 1865, - - - -	3,765,503 42
Liabilities, - - - - - - - -	77,901 52

FIRE, MARINE, and INLAND
INSURANCE.

Agencies at all important points throughout the United States.

CHAS. J. MARTIN, PRESIDENT.
A. F. WILMARTH, VICE-PRESIDENT.
JOHN McGEE, Secretary.
J. H. WASHBURN, Assistant Secretary.
W. C. NICOLL, Superintendent Marine Department.

Marine and Fire Insurance.

METROPOLITAN INSURANCE COMPANY,
108 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Cash Capital, - - - - - - - - - -	$1,000,000
Surplus, over - - - - - - - - - - -	400,000

This Company ensures at customary rates of premium against ALL MARINE AND INLAND NAVIGATION RISKS on CARGO or FREIGHT; also, against LOSS or DAMAGE by FIRE.

IF PREMIUMS ARE PAID IN GOLD, LOSSES WILL BE PAID IN GOLD.

The Assured receive 75 per cent. of the net profits without incurring any liability, or in lieu thereof, at their option, a liberal discount upon the premium.

All losses equitably adjusted and promptly paid.

SCRIP DIVIDEND, declared Jan. 10, 1865, FIFTY per cent.

JAMES LORIMER GRAHAM, President.
ROBERT M. C. GRAHAM, Vice-President.
JAMES LORIMER GRAHAM, JR., 2d Vice-President.
HENRY H. PORTER, Secretary.

THE
MORRIS FIRE AND INLAND INSURANCE COMPANY
COLUMBIAN BUILDING, 1 NASSAU STREET.
JUNE 1, 1865.

AUTHORIZED CAPITAL, $5,000,000.
CASH CAPITAL, PAID IN, AND SURPLUS, $885,040 57.

POLICIES OF INSURANCE AGAINST LOSS OR DAMAGE BY FIRE
Issued on the most Favorable Terms.

WM. M. WHITNEY, Secretary. B. C. MORRIS, President.

E. W CLARK & CO.,
BANKERS AND BROKERS,
35 SOUTH THIRD STREET, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS AND TREASURY NOTES, CERTIFICATES OF INDEBTEDNESS, QUARTERMASTERS' VOUCHERS, COMPOUND INTEREST NOTES.

STOCKS and BONDS of all kinds BOUGHT and SOLD on COMMISSION.

HOFFMAN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.
Office, 161 Broadway, New York.

Cash Capital, - - - - - - - - - - $200,000

JOSEPH W WILDEY, Secretary. WILLIAM B. DIXON, President.

PHENIX INSURANCE COMPANY,
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
OFFICES, 1 COURT STREET, BROOKLYN, N. Y.
" 139 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

CASH CAPITAL - - - - - - - - - -	$1,000,000 00
ASSETS - - - - - - - - - - - -	1,500,000 00

Insurance against Loss by Fire, Marine, Lake, Canal, and Inland Transportation.

STEPHEN CROWELL, President. EDGAR W. CROWELL, Vice-Presiden t
PHILANDER SHAW, Secretary.

Insurance Scrip.
WILLIAM C. GILMAN,
46 PINE STREET, NEW YORK,
BUYS AND SELLS INSURANCE SCRIP.

The Nation:

A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

THIS journal will not be the organ of any party, sect, or body. It will, on the contrary, make an earnest effort to bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit, and to wage war upon the vices of violence, exaggeration, and misrepresentation by which so much of the political writing of the day is marred.

The criticism of books and works of art will form one of its most prominent features; and pains will be taken to have this task performed in every case by writers possessing special qualifications for it.

It is intended, in the interest of investors, as well as of the public generally, to have questions of trade and finance treated every week by a writer whose position and character will give his articles an exceptional value, and render them a safe and trustworthy guide.

It embraces among its regular or occasional contributors the following names:

HENRY W. LONGFELLOW,
JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL,
JOHN G. WHITTIER,
SAMUEL ELIOT (Ex-President Trin. College, Hartford),
PROFESSOR TORREY (Harvard),
DR. FRANCIS LIEBER,
PROFESSOR GOLDWIN SMITH (Oxford),
PROFESSOR CHILD (Harvard),
HENRY JAMES,
CHARLES E. NORTON,
JUDGE BOND (Baltimore),
EDMUND QUINCY,
PROFESSOR W. D. WHITNEY (Yale),
PROFESSOR D. C. GILMAN (Yale),
JUDGE DALY,
PROFESSOR DWIGHT (Columbia College),
PROFESSOR TAYLER LEWIS (Schenectady),
N. TOURGUENEFF,
AUGUSTE LAUGEL,
JUDGE WAYLAND,
FREDERICK LAW OLMSTED,
REV. DR. McCLINTOCK,
REV. DR. JOS. P. THOMPSON,
REV. PHILLIPS BROOKS,
REV. DR. BELLOWS,
C. J. STILLÉ,
HENRY T. TUCKERMAN,
BAYARD TAYLOR,
C. A. BRISTED,
C. L. BRACE,
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON,
SYDNEY GEORGE FISHER,
THEODORE TILTON,
JAMES PARTON,
GAIL HAMILTON.

TERMS:—Six Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Four Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, PUBLISHER,
130 Nassau street, N. Y.

DISSATISFIED GAS CONSUMERS

ARE INVITED TO SUBSTITUTE

IVES'S PATENT LAMP,

and thus get a superior light for less money. It can be filled, trimmed, and lighted (AS QUICKLY AS GAS) without removing the shade or chimney. We have an elegant variety of Chandeliers and Brackets, Hanging and Table Lamps, etc. Also ATTACHMENTS for application to GAS-FIXTURES and Table Lamps now in use. From many testimonials we select a few from this city:

From H. C. BOWEN, Esq., of the Independent.

"Since our gas-burners were removed and your lamps attached in their place, we get a brilliant, yet mellow, light, far superior to what we have 'endured' heretofore. We have sixteen now in use, and all work well."

From CHARLES TAYLOR, Esq., President International Insurance Company.

"I know it to be the BEST, and I think it is the MOST ECONOMICAL light I ever had."

From Brig.-Gen. WM. HALL, 543 Broadway.

"The light is the best I ever saw, and I think less expensive than gas. It is so well liked that we expect soon to adopt them throughout our factory."

From R. F. MASON, North America Fire Insurance Company, N. Y.

"I consider it the best light in use. It is steady, clear, and the most comfortable light to read or write by that I ever seen. I have renounced the gas, and shall use the lamp till I find a better one.

Our lamps are also used and approved by

The New York Tribune,	Fowler & Wells,
J. M. Bradstreet & Son,	J. C. Derby, Esq.,
Theodore Tilton, Esq.,	Bowers, Beckman & Bradford, Jr.,
Morris, Wheeler & Co.,	Hugh Auchincloss, Esq.,
W. L. Cooper, Esq.,	E. T. Brown & Co.,
Smith Clift, Esq.,	The Iron Age,
J. H. Richards, Esq.,	Frank Leslie, Esq.,
H. W. Derby, Esq.,	Richard Brown, Esq.,
Widows and Orphans' Ins. Co.,	Marvin & Co.,
D. W. Vaughn, Esq.,	John Auchincloss, Esq.,
E. A. Stansbury, Esq.,	William B. Dana, Esq.,
James Buell, Esq.,	Prof. C. H. Hitchcock,
Sargent & Co.,	N. Y. City Lunatic Asylum,

Prof. D. G. Eaton.

Call and examine or send for illustrated circular.

JULIUS IVES & CO.,

18 Beekman Street, N. Y.

ONE PRICE ONLY.

Writing Paper cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Envelopes cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Blank Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Memorandum Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street
Pens and Pencils cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Pocket-Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Portfolios cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Cash Boxes cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Stationers' Tinware cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Account Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.
Black, Blue, and Red Ink cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau St.
Arnold & Boss's Fluid cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau St.
Scrap Books cheap at LEACH'S, 86 Nassau Street.

WE HAVE JUST OPENED

Ten cases, per steamer Lafayette, containing

FINE BRONZE GROUPS AND STATUETTES

AND

FRENCH MARBLE CLOCKS,

Making in all the finest and largest assortment of these goods in either city.

OVINGTON BROTHERS,

Fulton Street, near Clark, Brooklyn.

N. B.—Store open in the evening during December.

MAKE YOUR OWN SOAP WITH

B. T. BABBITT'S

Pure Concentrated Potash,

OR READY SOAP-MAKER.

Warranted double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other saponifier or lye in the market. Put up in cans of one pound, two pounds, three pounds, six pounds, and twelve pounds, with full directions in English and German for making Hard and Soft Soap. One pound will make fifteen gallons of Soft Soap. No lime is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest Potash in market.

B. T. BABBITT,

64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington st., N. Y.

A Fine Assortment of Goods for HOLIDAY SALES.

DECORATED DINNER SETS.

DECORATED TEA

AND TETE-A-TETE SETS.

BRONZE CLOCKS AND STATUARY.

PARIAN STATUARY.

MANTEL VASES AND SETS,

RICH CUT AND ENGRAVED GLASS.

FINE PLATED WARE, etc., etc.

Store open in the evening during the month of December.

OVINGTON BROTHERS,

Fulton Street, near Clark Street, Brooklyn.

N. B.—Goods delivered in New York.

Pacific Mail Steamship Company's

THROUGH LINE

TO CALIFORNIA,

TOUCHING AT MEXICAN PORTS,

AND CARRYING THE U. S. MAIL,

Leave Pier No. 42 North River, foot of Canal Street, at 12 o'clock noon, on the 1st, 11th, and 21st of every month (except when those dates fall on Sunday, and then on the preceding SATURDAY), for ASPINWALL, connecting, via Panama Railroad, with one of the Company's steamships from Panama for SAN FRANCISCO, touching at ACAPULCO.

DECEMBER.

1st.—HENRY CHAUNCEY, Captain Gray, connecting with CONSTITUTION, Captain Farnsworth.

11th.—ATLANTIC, Captain Maury, connecting with GOLDEN CITY, Captain Bradbury.

21st.—NEW YORK, Captain Horner, connecting with COLORADO, Captain Watkins.

Departures of 1st and 21st connect at Panama with steamers for SOUTH PACIFIC PORTS. Those of 1st touch at MANZANILLO.

Through Passage Rates, in Currency.

	FIRST CABIN,	SECOND CABIN,	STEERAGE,
ON STEAMERS....	$325.	$225.	$100.

Panama Railroad ticket invariably $25 additional, in currency.

A discount of ONE-FIFTH from steamers' rates allowed to second-cabin and steerage passengers with families.

One Hundred Pounds Baggage allowed each adult. Baggage-masters accompany baggage through, and attend to ladies and children without male protectors. Baggage received on the dock the day before sailing, from steamboats, railroads, and passengers, who prefer to send down early.

An experienced Surgeon on Board. Medicines and attendance free.

A steamer will be placed on the line January 1, 1866, to run from NEW ORLEANS to ASPINWALL, via HAVANA.

For Passage tickets or further information apply at the Company's ticket office, on the wharf foot of Canal Street, North River.

F. W. G. BELLOWS, AGENT.

COLLEGE HILL MILITARY SCHOOL,

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.

OTIS BISBEE, A.M., PRINCIPAL.

"The Poughkeepsie College Military School paid a visit to this city yesterday (April 3). The pupils were uniformed in blue military style, and numbered between fifty and sixty in line. It was a beautiful affair, witnessed by thousands, many of whom are of the opinion that the cadets are under better discipline, and, in the military exercise, far superior to the celebrated Chicago Zouaves who visited our city some years ago."—Albany Express.

"Yesterday afternoon (April 3) the College Hill Cadets, of Poughkeepsie, visited our city on a pleasure excursion, and for the purpose of paying their respects to the Governor. After the review the Governor briefly addressed them. He said he was glad of the opportunity to welcome the company to the Capital of the State, and thank them for their visit. He was glad of this evidence of the success of the teachers, and the proficiency of the taught."—Albany Evening Journal.

KEYS'

AMERICAN UNION WRITING FLUID,

AND COPYING INKS.

THE CHEAPEST AND THE BEST.

Always clean, and flowing freely from the pen, these inks are rapidly taking the place of all others, and merit the special attention of the penman.

On trial they will be found superior in every respect to the imported inks now in use.

REEVES & CO.,

(Successors to J. G. Keys,)

MANUFACTURERS AND SOLE PROPRIETORS,

303 Washington Street (near Reade), N. Y.

The Fourth Exhibition in New York

of FRENCH, ENGLISH, and FLEMISH PICTURES is open daily from 9 A.M. to 5 P.M., and on Monday and Thursday evenings from 7 to 10, at the Studio Building, 15 Tenth Street. F. J. PILGERAM, Secretary.

E. GAMBART, Director.

SERPENTS DE PHARAON,

OR,

SERPENTS' EGGS.

The scientific Miracle of the Age! On lighting the cone, a small snake uncoils itself.

"They are truly marvellous and apparently inexhaustible."—London Times.

Wholesale and Retail by OLDEN & SAWYER,

246 Canal Street, New York.

Price 50 cents a Box, mailed free. A liberal discount to the trade. Agents wanted.

EDWARDS'S WHITE SUGAR-CURED

WASHINGTON HAMS

w ready for sale.

Name branded in full.

ALSO ALL KINDS OF SMOKED MEATS.

GEORGE W. EDWARDS,

227 and 229 Christie Street, N. Y.

AMERICAN WATCHES.

J. H. JOHNSTON & CO., 150 BOWERY, N. Y., sell at lowest rates

American Gold and Silver Watches,
English Lever Watches,
Fine Swiss Watches.

The handsomest Detached Lever Watch in the market for $25.

PURE GOLD WEDDING RINGS.

Fine Jewelry, diamonds, silver ware, and best quality silver-plated ware of our own manufacture.

Articles sent free of expense to all parts of the country, and satisfaction guaranteed.

PHELPS, DODGE & CO.,

Importers and Dealers in

TIN-PLATE, SHEET-IRON, COPPER, BLOCK-TIN, WIRE, AND METALS GENERALLY;

Manufacturers of

COPPER, BRASS, and WIRE,

19 and 21 Cliff st., New York.

Economical Housekeepers Use

PYLE'S SALERATUS. | PYLE'S O. K. SOAP.
PYLE'S CREAM TARTAR. | PYLE'S BLUEING POWDER.

Articles designed for all who want the best goods, full weight. Sold by best Grocers everywhere. Each package bears the name of JAMES PYLE, Manufacturer, New York.

The Scientific Miracle of the Age.

PHARAOH'S SERPENTS.

"The lovers of the curious will be highly amused at its appearance."—Scottish American.

TWO IN A BOX. 50 CENTS. (Mail free.)

London Stereoscopic and Photographic Company, 579 Broadway.

JAMES L. WARNER, Manager.

Liberal discount to the Trade.

BOYNTON'S FURNACES.

Boynton's Brick and Portable Furnaces, Fire-place and Parlor Heaters, Kitcheners, Ranges, Parlor and Office Stoves, are warranted o give satisfaction. Send for circular.

RICHARDSON, BOYNTON & CO.,

234 Water Street, near Beekman, New York

WILLIAM KNABE & CO.'S

GRAND, Celebrated Gold Medal SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT

PIANOS.

These instruments have been for thirty years before the public, in competition with other instruments of first-class makers. They have, throughout that long period, maintained their reputation among the profession and the public as being unsurpassed in every quality found in a first-class Piano.

650 BROADWAY,

AND

CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE, CHICAGO, ILL

J. BAUER & CO., Agents.

SPECIAL GOLD MEDAL.

(From Watson's Weekly Art Journal.)

AWARDS TO MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—A Gold Medal was awarded, at the late Fair of the American Institute, to CARHART, NEEDHAM & CO., for the best Reed Instrument on exhibition—a most just testimonial.

"They are an exceedingly good substitute for an Organ, and I can speak of them in the highest terms." GEO. W. MORGAN.

"I have found them to be the finest Instruments of the class I ever saw." GEO. F. BRISTOW.

"They are entitled to be ranked as the first and best among instruments of their class." WM. A. KING.

"The tone is incomparable, and they are far in advance of any other instrument of a similar kind." CHARLES FRADEL.

THE PARLOR ORGAN,

with the recent improvements of Mr. J. Carhart, is, without exception, far superior in QUALITY, POWER, SWEETNESS, VARIETY and EXPRESSION OF TONE, DURABILITY OF CONSTRUCTION, ELEGANCE OF CASE—POSSESSING IMPROVEMENTS APPLIED BY US ONLY.

A Descriptive Catalogue and Price List sent by mail.

CARHART, NEEDHAM & CO.,
97 East Twenty-third St., New York.

PIANOS.

RAVEN & BACON'S PIANO-FORTES.

(ESTABLISHED 1829.)

A full assortment of these Instruments, which have been well known in the New York market for more than thirty years, constantly on hand. We are continually adding improvements to our Pianos, and our facilities enable us to furnish them at terms and prices satisfactory to purchasers. Pictorial circulars sent by mail.

Wareroom, 135 Grand St., near Broadway, New York.

The Horace Waters

Grand, Square, and Upright PIANOS, MELODEONS, HARMONIUMS, and CABINET ORGANS. Wholesale and retail, at reduced prices. To let, and rent allowed if purchased. Monthly payments received for the same. Second-hand Pianos at bargains, prices $60, $75, $100, $125, $150, $175, $200, and $225. Factory and Warerooms, 481 Broadway. Cash paid for second-hand Pianos.

COOKING AND HEATING BY GAS.

EAGLE GAS COOKING STOVES AND RANGES,

GUARANTEED TO BAKE PERFECTLY.

HEATING STOVES, GUARANTEED TO HEAT ROOMS PERFECTLY.

Also,

KEROSENE OIL COOKING STOVES,

The best in market, have regular SIDE OVENS, and guaranteed to BAKE PERFECTLY, and not to Smoke or Smell.

EAGLE GAS STOVE MFG. CO.,
474 Broadway, N. Y.

☞ Illustrated Catalogues sent free.

ESTABLISHED IN 1823.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT PIANOS.

At the Great Mechanics' Fair, held in Boston in October, 1865, Messrs. CHICKERING & SONS were awarded

THE FIRST GOLD MEDAL

For the BEST GRAND PIANOS.

The FIRST SILVER MEDAL
For the BEST SQUARE PIANOS.

The FIRST SILVER MEDAL
For the BEST UPRIGHT PIANOS.

This Fair called forth an UNUSUAL COMPETITION—35 Pianos being represented. The report of the judges is very thorough and very decided on the merits of the CHICKERING PIANO.

THE MICHIGAN STATE FAIR, of 1865, awards Chickering & Sons THREE FIRST PRIZES.

THE INDIANA STATE FAIR, of 1865, awards Chickering & Sons THREE FIRST PRIZES.

THE IOWA STATE FAIR, of 1865, awards Chickering & Sons TWO FIRST PRIZES.

THE WISCONSIN STATE FAIR, of 1865, awards Chickering & Sons TWO FIRST PRIZES.

FOURTEEN FIRST-CLASS GOLD AND SILVER MEDALS IN THE MONTHS OF SEPTEMBER AND OCTOBER, 1865.

Making a total of FIFTY-FIVE PRIZE MEDALS awarded to CHICKERING & SONS, as

FIRST PREMIUMS OVER ALL COMPETITION for the SUPERIORITY OF THEIR PIANOS.

OPINIONS OF EMINENT ARTISTS.

THALBERG.

"I consider Chickering & Sons' Pianos, beyond comparison, the best I have ever seen in America."

GOTTSCHALK.

"I consider Chickering & Sons' Pianos superior to any in the world."

WEHLI.

"I believe that, in every particular, your Pianos are superior to any I have ever seen in this country or in Europe."

SATTER.

"For volume and fine quality of tone, with nicety of articulation, the Chickering Pianos are unequalled."

BASSINI.

"I always use and always recommend your Pianos to my pupils and friends."

MUZIO.

"I consider your Pianos the finest I have ever played upon."

Watson's Art Journal, of November 11, in its criticism of Mme. Abel's concert, says: "Madame Abel performed on the new Chickering Grand, which took the Gold Medal at the Fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanics' Association, held at Boston last month.

"IT IS THE NOBLEST INSTRUMENT WE EVER HEARD IN A CONCERT-ROOM.

"Grand in power, without noise; capable of sustaining any amount of forcing, without losing the rich purity of its tones; clear, bright, and beautiful throughout the entire range, every tone is a pearl of sound, sympathetic and vocal as the finest human voice cultivated to the highest point of perfection."

AGRAFFE BRIDGE.

Pianos with or without the Agraffe Bridge, which we have constantly used for the past twelve years.

WAREROOMS.

652 BROADWAY, N. Y.
246 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.
914 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

GROVER & BAKER'S

SEWING MACHINES

WERE AWARDED THE HIGHEST PREMIUMS
At the State Fairs of

New York,	Illinois,	Virginia,
New Jersey,	Michigan,	N. Carolina,
Vermont,	Wisconsin,	Tennessee,
Pennsylvania,	Iowa,	Alabama,
Ohio,	Kentucky,	Oregon,
Indiana,	Missouri,	California,

And at numerous Institute and County Fairs, including all the Fairs at which they were exhibited the past three years.

The GROVER & BAKER ELASTIC-STITCH SEWING MACHINE is superior to all others, for the following reasons:

1. The seam is stronger and more elastic than any other.
2. It is more easily managed, and is capable of doing a greater variety and range of work than any other.
3. It is capable of doing all the varieties of sewing done by other machines, and, in addition, executes beautiful embroidery and ornamental work.

GROVER & BAKER S. M. CO.,
495 Broadway, New York.

THE BEST SEWING-MACHINES IN THE WORLD.

THE WEED MACHINES,

With all their valuable improvements, entirely overcome all imperfections. They are superior to all others for family and manufacturing purposes, simple in construction, durable in all their parts, and readily understood. They have certainty of stitch on all kinds of fabrics, and are adapted to a wide range of work without change or adjustment, using all kinds of thread. Will hem, fell, bind, gather, braid, tuck, quilt, cord, and, in fact, do all kinds of work required by families or manufacturers. We invite all persons in search of an instrument to execute any kind of sewing now done by machinery to inspect them, and recommend all parties engaging in the sale of sewing-machines to make sure they secure the best by examining the WEED before purchasing. They make the shuttle-stitch, which cannot be excelled for firmness, elasticity, durability, and elegance of finish. They have received the highest premiums in every instance where they have been exhibited in competition with other standard machines. The company being duly licensed, the machines are protected against infringements or litigation.

Reliable agents wanted, to whom we offer great inducements. Every explanation will be cheerfully given to all, whether they wish to purchase or not. Descriptive circulars, together with specimens of their work, will be furnished to all who desire them by mail or otherwise.

WEED SEWING-MACHINE CO.,
STORE, 506 BROADWAY, N. Y.

FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE CO.,

505 BROADWAY, N. Y.

THE BEST FAMILY MACHINE IN THE WORLD.

Wonderful REVERSIBLE FEED MOTION. SELF-ADJUSTING TENSION. No Snarling and Breaking Threads. FOUR distinct Stitches.

WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES,

625 BROADWAY, N. Y.,

MAKE THE

LOCK-STITCH,

and rank highest on account of the elasticity, permanence, beauty, and general desirableness of the stitching, when done, and the wide range of its application.—Report of American Institute.

FINKLE & LYON'S

IMPROVED

LOCK-STITCH SEWING-MACHINE.

N. B.—Money refunded if the Machine is not preferred to any in market for family use.

AGENTS WANTED. 538 Broadway, N. Y.

Lock-Stitch Sewing Machines

FOR FAMILIES AND MANUFACTURERS.

THE HOWE MACHINE COMPANY,

ELIAS HOWE, Jr., Pres.,

629 BROADWAY.

Agents wanted.

SCHOOL FURNITURE!

Lecture-Room and Sabbath-School Settees

IN EVERY STYLE,

MANUFACTURED BY

ROBERT PATON,

24 GROVE STREET, NEW YORK

A CARD.

For the purpose of more fully supplying the wants of the public, and in order to prevent unscrupulous dealers from palming off inferior and worthless goods as the MORTON GOLD PENS, I shall hereafter SELL NO GOODS AT WHOLESALE excepting only to duly Appointed and Authorized Agents, to whom a Certificate of such Agency will be given, and who alone shall be able to sell the MORTON PENS in that city or village.

To my Agents I shall give a liberal discount upon their agreeing to supply the public at my published and well-known prices.

Jewelers or Stationers will, in all cases, be preferred as Agents.

Conditions and Terms for Agency will be stated upon application by letter or otherwise.

Where no Agency is established, those wishing the MORTON PEN must send to my store, where prompt attention will be given to their orders.

A Circular, with fac-simile Engravings of all Sizes and Prices, will be sent to any one on receipt of letter postage.

Address A. MORTON, No. 25 Maiden Lane, New York.
Dated New York, Nov. 1, 1865.

DEMULCENT SOAP,

FOR CHAPPED AND TENDER HANDS,

FOR TOILET AND BATH USE.

MANUFACTURED ONLY BY

J. C. HULL'S SON,

32 PARK ROW, N. Y.

Upwards of 100 styles of Toilet and Staple Soaps. For sale by all Dealers.

Bradbury's Pianos "the Best."

Pronounced "THE BEST" by the most renowned artists. "SUPERIOR in tone, touch, power, DURABILITY, and elegance of finish." Warerooms 425 and 427 Broome Street, corner of Crosby. Call or send for circular.

WM. B. BRADBURY.

WILLIAM SELLERS & CO.,

1,600 HAMILTON STREET, PHILADELPHIA,

MACHINISTS', FOUNDERS', SMITHS' and BOILER-MAKERS' TOOLS.

SHAFTING, with Ball and Socket Bearings and Double Cone Vice-Couplings, admitting of the easiest possible adjustment.

A complete assortment of PULLEY and WHEEL PATTERNS, from which Castings or finished work will be furnished.

RAILWAY EQUIPMENTS, TURNING and TRANSFER TABLES, and PIVOT BRIDGES.

Sole Manufacturers and Licensees of GIFFARD'S INJECTOR, For Feeding Boilers.

WILLIAM SELLERS. JOHN SELLERS, JR.

Improvements in Piano-fortes.

One of the simplest and most truly valuable improvements yet made in the Piano-forte is that invented and patented by

DECKER BROTHERS, 91 BLEECKER STREET,

in this city. By correcting the only imperfections arising from the use of the full iron-plate, and that, too, by not detracting in the slightest degree from its many positive advantages, the Messrs. DECKER have developed in their instruments a tone at once admirable for its purity, fulness, prolongation, and sweetness, and the high estimation in which their improvement is held is well shown in the rapidly increasing business of their firm.—Tribune.

MARVIN'S

PATENT FIRE AND BURGLAR SAFE.

Superior to any others in the following particulars
They are more fire-proof.
They are more burglar-proof.
They are perfectly dry.
They do not lose their fire-proof qualities by age.
Manufactured only by

MARVIN & CO., 265 Broadway.
721 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

Send for a descriptive Circular.

NEW YORK LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY,

112 AND 114 BROADWAY.

This is one of the oldest institutions of the kind in America, having been chartered in 1841, and commenced business in May, 1845.

EVERY ONE SHOULD ENSURE.

While we live we may protect those dependent upon us; but when death severs the tie of all others most dear, it is a consolation to know that our prudence and foresight have made provision for the wants to which we can no longer minister; and the man who has the power, and neglects the opportunity, of providing in this way for the comfort and independence of his family, fails in the duty which he owes to them and himself. Therefore let every one who has not obtained a policy of Insurance upon his life no longer neglect this imperative duty. GREAT CARE SHOULD BE MANIFESTED IN THE SELECTION OF A COMPANY. The

NEW YORK LIFE INSURANCE CO.

Offers the following highly important essentials:

It is a strictly Mutual Company;
It has had Twenty Years' Business Experience;
It has large Accumulated Assets;
It gives Liberal Assistance in the payment of Premiums;
Its Dividends are declared Annually;
It is prompt in the Payment of all Losses.

IN FACT,

Special care in the selection of its risks, strict economy, and a safe and judicious investment of its funds, emphatically characterize the management of this Company.

Assets over

$4,500,000.

Annual Dividend, January 1, 1865,

50 PER CENT.

Amount Returned Premiums (Dividends) paid,

$1,700,000.

Amount Claims by Death paid,

$3,500,000.

During its existence it has issued

Over 36,000 Policies.

TEN-YEARS NON-FORFEITING POLICIES.

The New York Life Insurance Company originated, and was the first to bring before the public, the Ten-Year Non-forfeiting Plan, which has so fully commended itself to the judgment of thinking men that it has become the most popular mode of assurance, and is rapidly superseding the old method of life-long payment. It has received THE UNQUALIFIED APPROVAL OF THE BEST BUSINESS MEN OF THE LAND, large numbers of whom have taken out Policies under it as an investment.

TEN-YEARS NON-FORFEITING PLAN.

A Party ensuring by this table, after the second year, cannot forfeit any part of what has been paid in, and his policy becomes a source of income to him while living.

ANOTHER NEW FEATURE.

TEN-YEARS NON-FORFEITURE ENDOWMENT POLICIES.

A party ensuring by this table the amount is received by the assured himself, upon his attaining a specified age, while full provision is made for death occurring prior thereto. As a sure and profitable investment for one's declining years, they deserve the attention of all. These policies are coming into general request. The New York Life Insurance Company have recently prepared A NEW TABLE BY WHICH THE PREMIUMS CAN ALL BE PAID IN TEN YEARS AND THE NON-FORFEITURE BENEFIT ALSO SECURED.

POLICIES ISSUED IN ALL THE USUAL FORMS.

MORRIS FRANKLIN, President.
ISAAC C. KENDALL, Vice-Pres't.
WILLIAM H. BEERS, Actuary.

☞ Parties desirous of acting as Agents will please apply personally or by letter.

UNIVERSAL CLOTHES WRINGER,

WITH COG-WHEELS.

The World's Fair in London, the Mechanics' Institute, and Eleven State Fairs have decided that the U. C. W. is THE BEST.

We also WARRANT IT THE BEST and most durable Wringer made. Over 200,000 have been sold, and each family can testify to its superior merits.

"It saves its cost in clothing every year."—ORANGE JUDD.

"One of the most useful articles in my house."—MRS. HENRY WARD BEECHER.

"I heartily commend it."—REV. DR. BELLOWS.

Call or send for illustrated circular, with testimonials, retail prices, and terms to salesmen.

Money can be made rapidly selling them in every town.

R. C. BROWNING, GENERAL AGENT,
347 Broadway, New York.

JOHN V. FARWELL & CO.,

WHOLESALE

DRY GOODS AND NOTIONS,

42, 44 & 46 WABASH AVENUE,
CHICAGO,

AND NO. 5 COLLEGE PLACE, NEW YORK.

DECKER & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS OF PIANO-FORTES,

419 BROOME STREET,

One Block East of Broadway, N. Y.

These Pianos stand unrivalled in regard to their singing quality; volume and purity of tone; sympathetic-elastic, and even touch; and durability of construction, which enables them to remain in tune much longer than ordinary Pianos.

JESSUP & MOORE,

27 NORTH SIXTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
128 WILLIAM STREET, NEW YORK,

PAPER MANUFACTURERS,

Have on hand, or make to order at short notice, all qualities of Book and News Printing Papers at current market prices.

UNITED STATES STEEL PEN WORKS,

FACTORY, CAMDEN, N. J.

R. ESTERBROOK & CO.,

STEEL PEN MANUFACTURERS,

WAREHOUSES, { 403 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia. / 42 JOHN STREET, New York.

Samples and prices on application. Lots made to order of any pattern or stamp required.

CAUTION.

These Pens are of genuine American manufacture, and equal in finish, elasticity, and fineness of point to the best imported. They are, therefore, sure to gain the confidence of the American public. The fac-simile of our signature is sufficient security against foreign imitation.

R. ESTERBROOK & CO.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

OF THE OLD STANDARD QUALITY.

TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Warranted.

or Descriptive Name, and Designating Number.
New Series, Good and Cheap, from No. 700 to No. 761.

TRADE MARK: Joseph Gillott, Birmingham. With Designating Numbers.

For sale by JOSEPH GILLOTT & SONS,
91 John Street, New York.
HENRY OWEN, Sole Agent.

FRANCIS & LOUTREL,

45 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK,

STATIONERS, STEAM PRINTERS AND BLANK-BOOK MANUFACTURERS,

Supply everything in their line at lowest prices. Every kind of Writing Paper, Account Books, Fancy and Staple Stationery, Diaries for 1866, Expense Books, etc. Orders solicited.

MAR 3 1937